Mr. T. DUNCOMBE—Cordially concurring, as I do, in the measure before the house introduced by her Majesty's ministers, and believing as I do this measure not only to be honourable to the minister who introduced it, but that it will reflect credit on the Parliament which shall adopt it (hear, hear)—believing also, after the speech of the right hon. baronet, that by public opinion, and through the influence of public opinion alone, he can hope to overcome the difficulties in his way, notwithstanding the obloquy the bigotry and ignorance with which he is assailed (cheers)—I think that it behoves those who do not owe their seats in this house to the nomination of peers, and therefore must vote as they are directed, but who are sent by the free and independent choice of the people to vote for such measures as they can approve of—not to give a silent, lukewarm, and jealous support to it (cheers). Far be it from me, in the few observations which I shall make, to say anything which will lead hon. gentlemen opposite to believe that I am insensible to the false and painful situation in which they are placed. I can make every allowance for those gentlemen who cannot keep pace with the change of opinion with those who sit around them (hear, hear). No doubt great changes have recently taken place in opinion on the part of public men on both sides of the house, and in conformity with the advice of the right honourable baronet to the cabinet in November last. It does not become us on this side of the house to cavil or quarrel with this change of opinion; it is sufficient for an humble individual like myself to be satisfied with this change of opinion, and to the results to which it will lead, and to the ability with which it is carried out (hear, hear, hear). But those honourable gentlemen for whom I have expressed some sympathy do not understand the change which has taken place in the opinions of those who sit with them, and they certainly do not take a wise or the right course to extricate themselves from the false position in which they are placed (hear, hear, hear). They make every kind of attack on the right honourable gentleman and his colleagues, and then conclude with some hypocritical and canting observation. They said that they were sure that the right honourable gentleman and his colleagues had acted upon the most honourable and the purest motives, but that still they had no confidence in them (hear, hear, and laughter). The learned Recorder of Dublin went further than any other gentleman in this respect. What did he call the ministers of the Crown with whom he was in the habit of associating? Why he called them political cowards (hear, hear). After praising the right honourable baronet and the other ministers with whom he was in the habit of associating, and stating that they were constrained to pursue the course which they did from a sense of public duty, the learned gentleman turned round, and said that he had no confidence in such political cowardice (hear, hear). If this was the case, why not at once come forward and move a vote of want of confidence in the Government (loud cheers). Why not at once come forward with a vote of censure on the Treasury bench (hear, hear). Such a course would be mainly intelligible, and parliamentary (hear, hear). I say that it would be a parliamentary course, because you in 1841 then proposed a vote of want of confidence in the then government, and why did you vote it? It was then proposed to introduce some measure like the present concerning the commercial interests of the country (hear). What was the nature of the amendment that you then proposed? That a Government which proposed to legislate on the commerce or the revenues of the country should possess the confidence of that house—"We assure your Majesty that we are deeply sensible of the importance of those considerations to which your Majesty has been graciously pleased to direct our attention in reference to the commerce and revenue of the country, and to the laws which regulate the trade in corn. That in deciding the course which it may be advisable to pursue with reference to such matters, it will be our earnest desire to consult the interest, and promote the welfare of all classes of her Majesty's subjects. That we feel it to be our duty humbly to submit to your Majesty that it is essential to the satisfactory results of our deliberations upon these and other matters of public concern, that your Majesty's Government should possess the confidence of this house and of the country; and respectfully to represent to your Majesty that that confidence is not reposed in the present advisers of your Majesty." (hear, hear, hear). That was your opinion in 1841, and was a mainly, intelligible, and parliamentary course (hear, hear). You now say that the Government opposite has not the confidence of the country and of the house—why not, then, move a similar resolution now (cheers)?

Sir JOHN TYRELL: Will you give it your support (hear, hear, and laughter)?

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE: How do you know which way I shall vote (great laughter)? Why not try this honest proceeding, and bring the matter to a test?

Sir JOHN TYRELL: Will your party vote for it?

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE: I am of no party, but the party of my country; and I only vote for those matters which I believe to be favourable to my country (hear, hear). Gentlemen would do better by acting thus, than heaping all sorts of obloquy on the Government, and bringing charges of treason (hear, hear). Treason against whom (hear, hear)? What was the right hon. baronet to do in the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed in November last? What had he told them? They had been told by the right hon. baronet in the explanation which he made, and which was so satisfactory to the country and honourable to himself (cheers), of the conduct which he pursued on that occasion (hear, hear). He resigned office; were you prepared to take it (loud cheers)? Mr. Gladstone, in his address to the electors of Newark, said that those who were against any relaxation of protection were not prepared to take office (hear, hear). The noble lord had an opportunity of taking office, but he did not succeed in forming an administration. You wanted confidence, the Whigs wanted concord (hear, hear). You must admit that the country must be governed, and for that purpose there must be a Government. There must be some Government, and how was this to be but by the course taken by the right hon. baronet, who, as was stated elsewhere, was determined, if he stood alone, that her Majesty should have the opportunity of meeting that Parliament with a confidential and responsible adviser (hear, hear, hear). I wish that the noble lord had done the same (hear, hear), and if he had only ten more to follow him, I am sure that public opinion would have supported him as it does the right hon. baronet (hear). As for the charge of treason brought against the right hon. baronet, was it treason to Her Majesty, treason to the people, or treason to his own honour (hear, hear)? If there was treason, it must be towards somebody. That would, indeed, have been treason if the right hon. baronet had forfeited and sacrificed the interests of a great nation to the interests of a party (cheers). There are treasons of which the right hon. baronet can be guilty. It would be treason to the people and the country if the right hon. gentleman is guilty of vacillation in the course which he has marked out for himself (hear). This is the only description of treason which I can understand. But we were told that the people are with you. Has there been any public exhibition which will show that this is the case (hear, hear)? Look, however on the opposite side (hear, hear). Was the election in the West Riding of Yorkshire nothing (hear, hear)? Was the Westminster election yesterday nothing (hear, hear, from the protectionists)? Where was your protection at Westminster yesterday (cheers from the same quarter)? Why was not a protection candidate brought forward at Westminster yesterday (cheers)? For myself, I do not think it was very material which of the two gentlemen was chosen yesterday; but why, I ask, when you tell me that public opinion is in favour of protection, did you not bring forward a protection candidate for Westminster (hear, hear)? Why not hoist in this city the flag of protection (hear, hear)? Your candidate might have stood up to his knees in the fetid cabbage of Corn Law proprietors (laughter and cheers). No doubt we may be told to look to the opinion of tenants-at-will and other farmers, and the hon. baronet the member for the University of Oxford said, the other evening, that the clergy and the church stood alarmed at the effect that a repeal of the Corn Laws would have upon the operation of the Tithe Commutation Act. But he did not tell us why (hear, hear, hear). It so happened, that whenever anything is brought forward for the good of the people, some one is sure to stand up and exclaim, "Oh! you do not recollect the clergy" (laughter). Whenever we hear any talk of the church or the clergy, it is sure to be in some way or other connected with tithes. This is not a measure for the church—for, as I understand it, the church means religion (laughter). It should be remembered also that at least one-third of the tithes at this moment belong to lay improvers, and this measure must as much affect them as the tithes of the clergy. My own opinion is, that the tenant farmers do not care one pin about protection, and if the vote by ballot existed, they would not support it; but, as it is, they dare not vote against their landlords. With respect to this, however, they had an authority on the subject, whose opinion I will read, for the satisfaction of the honourable member for the University of Oxford, which I trust will allay some of the alarm he feels. I say I am sure the authority to which I am about to refer is one to which the honourable baronet will pay great deference—it is the charge of a bishop to his clergy—namely, the charge of the Bishop of Rochester. If I understood the honourable baronet rightly the other night, he said that in passing the Tithe Commutation Act, we entered into a compact with the church, and that therefore tithes ought not to be injured, or prejudiced, or deteriorated, but that this act for the repeal of the Corn Laws would deteriorate them. The honourable baronet said that he opposed the Tithe Commutation Act at the time it was introduced. Now, I have more than once joined the honourable member in opposing bills in this house; but it so happened that we always did so on very different grounds (a laugh). For instance, we both opposed the Maynooth Bill last year. The hon. baronet did so on high-church principles; whereas I opposed it, as I was opposed to all state endowments of religion (hear, and laughter). The honourable baronet opposed the Tithe Commutation Act on some ground connected with the church; but I opposed it because I thought that it would prove injurious to the landed interest, and more especially if there was a repeal of the Corn Law, for I felt sure that when the Corn Laws were repealed, certain light lands must be thrown out of cultivation, and that under the Tithe Commutation Act they would still remain chargeable with the payment. I also objected to it because it gave tithes a stronger claim on the land than they ever had before. Previously to this act, tithes were not a direct lien on the land, but now they are made a positive rent-charge. Now, this is the opinion of the Bishop of Rochester on the subject:—"Taking into account the state of political parties in the country, the Tithe Bill may be considered to be as favourable an arrangement towards the clergy of a very difficult question as could have been expected. Happily for the church, a powerful and influential body of the laity were also holders of tithe property to a very large amount, and were as much interested in a fair settlement of the question as we were; the clergy therefore, in this instance, have experienced a greater degree of justice than has been extended towards them in the discussion of other subjects connected with their temporal affairs." For a person in Parliament to impute motives would be irregular; but here we have a bishop who charges parties legislating on this subject with being influenced by feelings of self-interest, and that they never would have acted in the way they did but for these circumstances. If I had said anything of this kind it would have been called a Radical opinion; but coming from a right reverend prelate it is no doubt right and orthodox (a laugh). The right reverend prelate went on to say, "The criterions which have been fixed upon to determine the future value of the tithes is also considered by some persons, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, as a dangerous and delusive arrangement, which will hereafter lead to great diminution in the property of the church, and it is said that any considerable decrease in the value or quantity of the articles which may have been fixed upon to regulate the future relative value of the tithes would produce the evils here anticipated; but it must be remembered, that as the incomes of the clergy were derived under the old system from the articles of produce, they would equally have been affected by, under any circumstances, a diminution in their quantity or value. I am not therefore disposed to think that any just cause for alarm exists on this point." I think this must be satisfactory. The extracts I have read are in a charge of the Bishop of Rochester, delivered in 1837, and reported in the Times of that year. Unless the honourable baronet is prepared to prove that the sliding scale has the same divine origin as tithes, they cannot be affected by a repeal of the Corn Laws. I can easily understand the right honourable baronet opposite despairing and desponding of making any impression on the reasons of honourable members on his side of the house, and that consequently he appealed to their fears; but I do think that when he did so appeal to their fears, they ought to do justice to this side of the house. They ought to recollect that, in 1842, when those dreadful occurrences took place—when such great distress existed—and when there was every appearance of disturbance and confusion—that previous to those events continual motions were made in this house by honourable members sitting on this side of the house—motions involving exactly the same principles that are now put forward by her Majesty's ministers. We told these ministers, over and over again, that "if you would but give effect to those sound principles of commercial policy with which you began this session, and more especially as regards the food of the people, you will put an end to all the distresses under which the people are suffering." In the end of July, in that year, I moved an address to the Crown, founded on arguments the particulars of which I will not now trouble the house with, and which motion was, after all, negatived by but a small majority, considering the force of the party at the time by which I was opposed. The object of the address which I suggested was, "that the distress in the manufacturing districts, to which her Majesty had alluded in the speech from the Throne, still continued; and that if after the termination of the session no decisive improvement should take place in the condition of the people, her Majesty might be graciously pleased again at an early period to call Parliament together, with a view of giving fuller effect to those sound principles of commerce to which some approach had been made by her Majesty's Government in the early part of the session, and which, if fairly and impartially carried out, more especially as regards the food of the people, would, by giving an impulse to trade and industry, avert those calamities with which the country was threatened." That motion was rejected; but we are now told that the measures to which I then alluded are the very measures that could remove distress and confusion. We have therefore a right to say that the same measures would have prevented them on that occasion, and would have relieved the right honourable baronet from the painful necessity under which he found himself, but in which he seemed to glory, of sending down regiments of guards and a park of artillery among the starving operatives in the manufacturing districts (hear, hear). If the right honourable baronet had sent down this measure which he has now brought forward on that occasion, there would have been no necessity for his guards and his artillery, and peace would have been restored without them (hear, hear, and cheers). I believe that if he had taken this course, it is impossible to estimate the extent of misery that then might have been prevented, the suffering that then might have been spared, and the crimes that then might have been avoided. Sir, whoever governs this country, whoever are the rulers of this empire, it should not be forgotten that they rule over a loyal, a peaceable, and an honest people (hear, hear)—and I will add, too, a forgiving people (hear, hear, and loud cheers). Yes, they are a forgiving people, and they already forgive and forget the errors that you then perpetrated; and all that you can now do is to pass these measures as quickly as you can, and as honestly and sincerely as you can, and not leave the people for a moment to regret or look back to the days to which I allude (hear, hear). A question was put to the right honourable baronet this evening by the honourable member for Norfolk, and a question has been also put to him by the noble lord opposite, with regard to the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The right hon. baronet has told them, that if it should be the wish of gentlemen here and protectionists elsewhere, that the total repeal of the Corn Laws should be immediate, why, that he and this house will be but too happy to accommodate them. But there is another part of this measure to which I beg leave to call attention, in answer to the question put by the honourable member for Norfolk. When this measure was first proposed to us, we were told to take it as a whole (hear, hear). Now, let me tell you that the part of this measure that after all is, and will be most valuable to the operative classes, is that which makes the great, the important changes in the law of settlement; and I say this, if you strike out that part of the measure; if you do not pledge yourselves to that portion of the measure, as you do to the part relating to the Corn Law, your whole measure will become valueless in the eyes of the operatives in the manufacturing districts (hear, hear). The right hon. baronet says, that he does not wish to press that part of the question until the Corn Law part—the portion referring to the relaxation of duty in the articles of provision and of clothing—is completed and concluded in this house. But if there be an idea going abroad, as I am informed there is, though I hope it may not prove true, that in some of these great manufacturing towns a great and powerful opposition is intended against that portion of the measure of her Majesty's ministers; if the language that is used in those towns be this—"Let us get the Corn Law part of the question settled (loud cries of hear, hear, from the protectionist benches), and then we will deal with the law of settlement (hear, hear, hear); I say again, if you permit that course to be adopted and to succeed, there will be an agitation got up against this measure throughout the country that will render it completely valueless; and I therefore call upon her Majesty's ministers to give us an assurance that they do consider the proposed change in the law of settlement as an essential part and parcel of their measure (hear, hear). What is the benefit intended? It is to give a settlement to parties having an industrial residence in the towns for five years, and to make this have a retrospective effect.

Sir R. PEELE.—That an industrial residence for five years shall give them a right to relief.

Mr. DUNCOMBE.—I mean that it shall give them a right to relief; that is to say, that these towns shall be saddled with the expense of that relief (hear). Now, suppose you had had a law of that sort in operation in 1842, do you suppose there would be half the crime—do you suppose there would be half the misery—do you suppose there would be half the distress, or half the suffering which was then witnessed in the country? Why, it is notorious that in Stockport alone there were 3000 houses vacant and empty in that year 1842. These had been inhabited by persons paying half a crown a week rent, or some trifle of that sort. But what became of these unfortunate people? They were sent travelling over half the country (hear, hear). Great numbers of them were Irishmen, and were sent back to Ireland with their families, with the greatest cruelty—with the utmost inhumanity—by those capitalists for whom they had worked for years (hear, hear). I understand there are at this moment two-thirds of the operative population of the town of Manchester, who are not entitled to relief from those persons whose fortunes they had made; and what is the result? You send those people with their families back to their country parishes. When they arrive there what happens to them? Why, they are disowned by the parish, and a small sum is offered to them to go away again elsewhere, and then they are left tramping over the country, nobody owning them, society seeming in fact to be conspiring to starve them; and who can be astonished if under such a system these persons should commit crimes? Can you be astonished if there should be discontent, or disaffection if you wish, or sedition if you think proper to call it so (hear, hear)? I say, if you look to these facts, if you consider that poor persons after many years of labour in the manufacturing districts have been sent abroad with their families starving, and tramping through the country without having any hope or chance of their misery being put an end to, save by death or the hulks—if these unfortunate victims of this detestable system are thus made to suffer, then I do hope that her Majesty's Ministers will think the change of the law of settlement as being also a most important measure. I do not ask it as a matter of compensation to the agriculturists (hear). It will be a boon, it is true, to them; but it will be also a great act of justice to the unfortunate people who are made to suffer from the existing law. Though all opposition to this question may now be in abeyance, that is no reason why you should not look after it with great care, and with a jealous eye (hear, hear). I believe, however, that her Majesty's Ministers are sincere, and are determined to carry this great and important measure (hear, hear, from Sir R. Peel), which can only be objected to by some of the great capitalists of the country. It is, I say, with these views and expectations that I give my cordial support, both in and out of this house, to the measure of her Majesty's Government—believing that it is a measure calculated not only to extend commerce and manufactures, but that it is calculated to promote the interests of agriculture, to relieve the resources of the empire, and to advance the condition of the people; and, above all things, to enlist in favour of our common country the goodwill, the friendly feelings, and the respect of the civilised world (hear, hear). But as to that portion of this house, commonly called the agricultural interest, I really do believe that as soon as the protection shall have been removed, which is now so unworthy of them, and so degrading to their party—that as soon as these days of protection shall have passed away, they shall be themselves the very first to acknowledge that their apprehensions had been unfounded; and that when they see trade flourishing—when they see the people in the provinces in good and constant employment—when they see prices fixed and rates reduced—when they see that, notwithstanding all their fears, the value of their estates has not really been diminished—when they see all this, they will, I am convinced, be the very first to acknowledge that their alarms had been unfounded, and to regret the errors in which they had so long and so pertinaciously continued (loud cheers).

Sir T. ACLAND rose, with great warmth, to defend the agricultural interest against the charge of ignorance and bigotry which the last speaker had preferred against it. He had never been a friend to extreme protection. He had welcomed Sir R. Peel's measure of 1842. But the reasons which Sir Robert Peel now advanced in support of the sweeping change and the further reduction which he now proposed, were by no means satisfactory to his mind. Eloquent in language, no doubt they were, and of great excellence in debate; but convincing they certainly were not. Sir Robert Peel seemed to use every effort to put his opponents in the wrong; but took very little pains to place himself in the right (hear, hear). It was a most unjust imputation on the agricultural interest to assert that it upheld the Corn Laws because they starved the labourer for the benefit of the landlord. Believing that the existing Corn Law had worked well for the landlord, the farmer, the labourer, the manufacturer, and the exporter, he could not accept the measure which Sir Robert Peel now offered to him; for he could not in three weeks learn to read backwards the lesson which Sir R. Peel and he had learned in the same school for 50 years. He believed that the League was at the bottom of all this change; but a greater agitation even than that which the League had raised, might have been put down by ministers firm and resolute, though it could not be met by ministers who, in heart and in spirit, by some process or other, had secretly arrived, at the same conclusions with the League itself. In conclusion he informed Sir R. Peel that he would not join in any factious opposition to his government. He would not even worry his measure. If parliament should pass this measure, and the crown should sanction it, Sir Robert need expect no further trouble from him; but if the division should be close on the present debate, then Sir Robert would not be able to carry his measure, and the sooner he dissolved the present parliament the better.

Lord A. PAGET had listened with a good deal of attention to the debate as it had gone on, and he confessed he thought that a good many gentlemen had been rather hard upon the right hon. gentleman. He was convinced that nothing but a sense of public duty could have induced that right hon. baronet to have brought forward the present measure. He had been at the head of a large and united party; now, whether he went east, west, north, or south, nothing but the renegade minister was talked about (cheers). He thought that the right honourable baronet was one of the greatest instances of sacrifices of self that had ever been made from conscientious motives (hear). He quite agreed that the noble lord (the member for London) would have been the proper person to have brought forward this motion. He had had the honour of supporting the noble lord since he had been in Parliament, and he hoped that he should long have that pleasure—his undoubted bravery and manly straightforward conduct entitled him to their highest regard (hear, and cheers). He (Lord A. Paget) should give the right honourable gentleman's measure his most cordial support (hear). He had belonged for several years to that forlorn hope which went out annually with his honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers); but now he was glad to say that their position was altered (cheers). He had always agreed that no law could regulate the price of wages; admitting that axiom, he said also that no law could regulate the price of food. The Corn Laws were near their end. His family derived their income from corn, and he knew that the head of it apprehended no danger from the repeal of the law; therefore, though he should support the measure of the right hon. baronet, yet he must hope that it would not be long ere they should have an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws (cheers).

Mr. W. B. BARING, in a voice scarcely audible amidst the noise occasioned by members retiring, next addressed the house. We understood him to say that protection had been granted to the British farmer when, from a variety of circumstances, he would otherwise have been utterly unable to have competed with the foreigner. Now, however, things had changed. Tithes had been commuted, cultivation had been improved; the farmers admitted themselves that they could make the soil produce double what used to be an average. These, and other things combined had enabled the farmer to compete with the foreigner without protection, and for that reason he thought that protection might be dispensed with. This was an appeal to the justice of the landed interest. To be satisfactory the measure must be unanimous; and he trusted the landowners would not, as judges in their own cause, give a verdict in their own favour (cheers).

On the motion of Mr. CUMMING BRUCE the debate was adjourned.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—As the writer of the "Shoemaker," in Knight's series of Industrial Guides, and editor of the "Cordwainer's Companion," a correspondent, in the person of a master boot and shoe maker, in an important provincial town, has sent to me to say, that he has just purchased the first named little volume in consequence of a paragraph in THE LEAGUE, of Jan. 31st, concerning the foreign and home boot and shoe trade; but that he has been much dissatisfied in not finding any mention therein of the matter he was led to expect, and upon which he was desirous of obtaining information. The passage in your Journal is this one, and which I thus transcribe for the purpose of clearer understanding the few observations I would wish to add:

"In the case of the bootmakers, to which Sir Robert has alluded, protection has acted as a check and discouragement to ingenuity and economy. The author of the 'Shoemaker,' in Knight's Industrial Series, has stated that the reliance of the London bootmakers on protection has induced them to neglect several improvements adopted by their brethren in Paris, which save material and induce a better fit."

Now, although it might be inferred that the reasons for the statement here made were to be found in the "Shoemaker," still it is not so, but in a pamphlet I had printed about eight years ago, and hence several years prior to the first great change in our commercial system of 1842. This pamphlet was also written before the "Shoemaker" was published by Mr. Knight, but may still be had of Mr. Strange, in Paternoster-row, or, through him, from any other bookseller—the title of it being, "The Boot and Shoe Trade in France, as it affects the interests of the British Manufacturer in the same Business." It is true, however, that in this production, I argued that "protection" had in some degree—to use your own words—"acted as a check and discouragement to ingenuity and economy," though the main scope of my proofs on this head were more exclusively directed to the inferiority of our dressed calf leather, as used for the upper parts of boots and shoes, than to the artistic abilities of the maker of the boot or shoe. Yet even here I likewise urged the necessity for improvement; and also stated the case as strongly as I could against the fondly-lingering belief of the great majority of the trade, that the then heavy scale of "protection" might be still rendered more heavy, and that the Government ought to be memorialised to do so.

This, then, was one of the statements advanced by the "author of the 'Shoemaker,'" and although at the time—and as I still am to a certain degree—even vituperated in the foulest manner for the "cut-throat," as it has been called, cast of such advice, yet have I now, withal, the satisfaction to say, that since the eight years this pamphlet has been placed before my fellow-tradesmen, the British boot and shoe manufacture has not at any rate been retrograding; but on the contrary, has advanced so considerably in taste, and in every other way, and in all places alike throughout the United Kingdom, that the French boot and shoe—ladies' or gentlemen's—are no longer considered the superior articles they were some ten or twelve years ago, or even down to the time of the last change in the tariff. That change produced a greater abundance of the so-much-needed better dressed leather of our neighbours; and although the price of this material was still high—and has still kept high, and will, no doubt, still longer keep so, through the greater demand which the present proposed alterations will further induce, yet, in the words of my pamphlet, allow every portion of our industrial population but to live as "cheap as the people of other countries" in having cheap bread and cheap taxation, and then, nor shoemaker, nor currier, nor Spitalfield's weaver, will care what customs' impost is taken off, assured—as I feel it will be with the shoemaker—that he doffs not his "hand-leather" to his fellow-craftsmen of any country. In old times—to use a familiar technical phrase of our "order"—we were all "dons," veritable "prize" workers,—men who made it their dearest ambition—to be very "goods off-leather;" and with a big loaf, cheap house rent, and cheap everything else, not forgetting a cheap and broadly-expanded voice as our own due share in the choice of the "People's Parliament," we will courageously go on, sewing and singing, happy as Charles Wesley's inimitable cobbler; or reading, and learning languages, and authorising as "Cooper the Chartist," who was once, also, a member of the "gentle craft."—Yours, &c.

LET US HAVE IT AT ONCE.

"Let us have it at once." Such is now the common expression in farm, field, and market-town. At first, when Sir R. Peel's three years' scheme came before them, the farmers said, "Better have it at once;" but many of them added such bitter expressions as showed they were only speaking in a fit of vexation. They then said, "Sacrifice us at once!" "Destroy us if you will; but do not keep us in torture." "What be the good of being particular about we? Knock us down, and slay us, and rob our dead bodies; what good be it to give us three years' notice to stand on our own defence?" and so forth.

Now, since conversation has become calmer, cooler, and reflection has penetrated into the question of Free Trade, the thoughts of the farmers going into it, and examining it on all sides, which few of them ever did before, they say more earnestly, though with less passion, "Let us have it at once."

Even the man who has no hope of good from it believes that it must come; and he says he would like to have it over. But this kind of man is day by day growing rarer. I can now see a farmer leaning over his barn-door, his face directed to the farm-yard, his score or two of pigs before him with their exploring snouts in the straw, gathering the lost grains, himself, like them, busied—or buried—in deep cogitation about maize, and beans, and oats, to feed pigs and cattle (for he has read Sir Robert Peel's speeches, and though he never read Free Trade speeches before, he begins to understand that a farmer may derive advantages from Free Trade),—such a farmer, with such thoughts in his head, so standing with arms folded on the barn door, may now be met with frequently. I have met many of them within the last fortnight, and every day they are becoming more plentiful, and his words are, "If it be to do good, let us have it at once."

So speaks the flock-master, standing beside his shepherd. "It is true," says he, "that wool sells better since there was no protection on it. It is true that we can now feed sheep, where up to a few years ago we only bred them and sold them for others to feed, we having bought foreign grown food since that time, and foreign manures to grow turnips; I am beginning to think that Sir Robert Peel must be right. The farm-yard manure, if we have enough of it, is the best of all manures; and we should import the food of cattle, to have our manure for nothing, rather than pay one million and a quarter of pounds sterling, as it is said we did, last year, for the dung of foreign birds, to grow turnips at home; but why should we wait three years to do this?"

So says the farmer, as he walks across his ploughed land, and plans what crops he shall have on this field, and what on that, and kicks the clods as he plans and turns over in his mind all that has been said about the advantage of having the lean cattle of the foreigner admitted free of duty, and the provender to feed the cattle, also free of duty—the oats of Poland, and the beans of Egypt; and is certainly of opinion that it is greatly preferable to admit the lean beast and the food for him, than to admit the fat beast on an equality with the lean, and keep out the food; but on looking at the new scheme of the Prime Minister, he finds that the lean beast is to be immediately imported free. But the food is not to be free for three years, unless it be the article of maize, the uses of which, however, the farmer knows much less about than of the uses of barley, beans, peas, and oats. Whatever plans he intended for the cropping of his farm, they are now frustrated, when he comes to this hitch in the ministerial plan. He says, "Why not let us have it at once;" and he adds to it some such observation as this, "Look at those men making the new railway; when they began work, they had their shovels and their wheelbarrows given to them at the same time. What use would their wheelbarrows have been alone, without their shovels to fill them? So of what use is the importation of cattle for us to feed, if the food is not admitted at the same time?"

At the market-tables, though there is some grumbling—still a few murmurs of "treachery," "done for," "taken in," "sacrificed," and so on—there is now a prevailing tone of fair discussion, and that is emphatically for immediate repeal in preference to prospective repeal. In several market-places I have heard it said by those who have been leading protectionists, "If you can so frame a petition to Parliament, asking for immediate repeal, without committing us as seeking an abolition of the Corn Laws we will sign that petition. We will rather have it at once."

It is hardly possible to set eyes on the farmer who is favourable to the three years' scheme. Occasionally a man, from some political connection, with the Ministerial party, may be found in a market-place giving his approval of it. One of these I saw a few days ago in a certain city of the south. He was selling wheat. A well-known miller came and looked at it, and offered the price of the previous week, but the farmer wanted two shillings more. The miller said nothing, but was moving towards some other samples. "But you have not given me an answer," said the farmer, "What am I to do?"

"Friend," said the miller, "I will not keep you three years in uncertainty; in five minutes thou shalt have an answer."

Not the least favourable sign of progressive intelligence among the farmers, relative to this question, is the fact that they are now tolerant enough to quote the opinions of opponents, and speak respectfully of Free Traders. "Have you read Cobden's letter?" asks one. "Ah! but do you see what Mr. Cobden says?" exclaims another. And these are men who twelve months ago would not have sat at the same dinner table with a man who would mention Mr. Cobden's name.

But of all the evidences of altered opinions, the strongest, the richest, is one I heard in a market-place a few days ago. The letter of the honourable member for Stockport was once more the subject. One expressed his concurrence in every word of it. Another agreed with that one, and gave words to his wonder that the honourable gentleman should be so well-informed, should know so much of the world, and everything in the world. "Oh!" replied the oracle of the party, "don't you know he be's a farmer's son?"

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

MR. COBDEN.—We have great pleasure in informing our readers that Mr. Cobden's health is so far re-established, as to render it probable that he will be able to resume his parliamentary duties in a day or two. It is expected that he will make his appearance this (Friday) evening in the House of Commons.

DEATH OF J. P. BURNARD, Esq.—We regret to have to announce the death of J. P. Burnard, Esq., who died on Tuesday last, at his residence, Formosa Cottage, Holloway. Mr. Burnard has been an energetic and active supporter of the League for many years, and many of our readers will probably recollect the efficient services rendered by Mr. Burnard as the superintendent of all the arrangements for the stage and platform, during several years, at the League meetings in Drury Lane and Covent Garden Theatres. Mr. Burnard has suffered severely from a pulmonary affection for several months, and death has at length terminated a zealous career of useful and patriotic exertion.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION. THE NOMINATION.

The first public demonstration connected with the election of a member to serve in Parliament took place on Tuesday, on the occasion of the nomination of the candidates ambitious to represent the good men and true of Westminster, and the result of the nomination fully proves, whatever the election may show, that the majority of the people at least give their hearty support to Sir De Lacy Evans, the consistent advocate of Free Trade.

The Westminster nomination is notoriously one of the most riotous in the kingdom—the spot where it is held—its proximity to Covent Garden market—the facilities which are thus afforded for the physical expression of one's feeling, through the medium of rotten apples, oranges, cabbages, and such like missiles, so effectual in electioneering warfare, which there abound—its proximity to some of the lowest localities of the metropolis, all tend to render it a noisy and boisterous affair. Tuesday was no exception to the general rule. The vast space in front of the hustings was crammed with a motley group; and though every exertion was used to preserve order, the most discordant noises prevailed throughout the whole business, and the most disagreeable missiles were ever and anon discharged at some one or other of the more prominent individuals on the hustings.

There could not have been less than 10,000 persons present; and though tolerably free in the expression of their opinions, a general good-humour seemed to prevail, which, spite of other disagreeables, made the matter pass off more pleasantly than usual.

Precisely at twelve o'clock General Sir De Lacy Evans entered on the platform, amidst the most unequivocal expressions of approbation from the vast assemblage in front of the hustings. He was accompanied by Lord M. Hill, Lord C. Fitzroy, M.P., Lord Moreton, Baron de Sedwitz, the Hon. F. Byng, Hon. E. P. Bouverie, M.P., the Hon. R. Colborne, the Hon. Capt. Boyle, Colonel Fox, M.P., Mr. T. D'Eyncourt, M.P., Mr. B. Hawes, M.P., Mr. H. Elphinstone, M.P., Messrs. Proutt, Berkeley, Allen, Trott, Kemp, M'Leod, Keogh, &c.

Captain Rous and his party followed immediately after. Their approach was the signal for combined cheers, hisses, and groans. Amongst his supporters we observed Lord F. Egerton, M.P., Lord E. Bruce, M.P., Lord Cantaloupe, Lord W. Graham, the Hon. Mr. West, Captain Meynell, R.N., Lieutenant-Colonel T. Wood, M.P., Messrs. Merewether, J. C. Wood, Miller, Smith, Fitzgerald, Hedges, Wilson, Kensley, &c.

When something like the semblance of a calm had been procured,

Mr. F. SMEDLEY, the high bailiff of Westminster, came forward, and spoke as follows:—Electors of Westminster, I have the honour of attending here to-day, as the returning officer for this ancient city. The object for which you have assembled is to return a member for this great city to Parliament, in consequence of your late member, the Honourable Captain Rous, having accepted an appointment connected with the Government (groans and loud cheers), whereby he has vacated his seat in Parliament. Gentlemen, the constitution of this country requires that every member of Parliament who accepts a situation connected with the Government should vacate his seat (loud cheers, and a voice, "Good job, too"). He may come forward again, however, to be elected (uproar, and cries of "We won't have him," "Go home," &c.). Captain Rous is in that position (conflicting cheers and hisses, mingled with groans, cat-calls, and every species of noise). Gentlemen, that gives you an opportunity of expressing your opinions as to whether he shall be your member, and of shewing whether the Government measures, which he is about to support, are in accordance with your own views and wishes. Captain Rous, then, is one of the candidates who seeks the honour of being returned to Parliament as your representative. General Sir de Lacy Evans (loud cheers and uproar), who before was your member, also seeks that honour (renewed cheers). I intreat you to give to both these gentlemen, and to the electors who may propose and second their nominations, an impartial and patient hearing, for by such means you will be best able to judge who shall represent you in Parliament (confusion and general manifestations of impatience). There are certain forms which it is necessary for me to go through before proceeding to the more important business of the day. I ask your patience while those forms are being gone through, and I promise that they shall not occupy more time than is absolutely necessary (cheers).

Mr. OWEN, the high constable, then read the proclamation; and the usual formalities which have so often been recorded of late, having been gone through,

Mr. JOSEPH CARTER WOOD came forward to propose the nomination of the Hon. Captain Rous. His appearance was greeted with yells and groans, a "bravo Rous" or two, and a few cheers. He said, "We are assembled to-day for the exercise of the Englishman's most valued privilege; and I trust there is not a constituency who values its free and unbiased exercise more than the electors of Westminster (cheers). The results of their decisions have always been viewed with deep interest, and their influence is extensively felt. The present election takes place at a moment of peculiar anxiety and excitement—an anxiety felt by all classes of the people, and an excitement co-extensive with the varied and important interests at stake. I must confess to you, that in appearing again on the hustings, I am deeply sensible of the responsibility of that duty, which as a citizen of Westminster I am called on to perform (uproar, groans, and cheers); and I trust you will believe me when I say that nothing but a prevailing sense that it is my duty would induce me to attempt it (groans). Gentlemen, I stand here to-day to nominate the Hon. Captain Rous as a fit and proper person to represent this city in Parliament (terrific confusion); but I feel that his fitness will depend very much on the part he has taken in that great question which now occupies the public attention—Free Trade, or not Free Trade—that is the question (bravo). For, allow me to say, I have never heard the slightest complaint that my hon. friend has been deficient in all attention and courtesy to, and zeal for, the interests of his constituents. I cannot, therefore, anticipate that having served you faithfully, you will consider his acceptance of an office, wherein his professional knowledge as a naval officer may render him most useful to his country in promoting the welfare of our navy, as any disqualification for his re-election (oh, mingled with cheers and hisses). I cannot disguise from myself that on the great question to which I have alluded there is a feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of many of his former supporters; but let me put his case fairly before you, and I trust we shall find English spirit enough in the electors to do him justice, and reconstitute him in Parliament as your tried and approved representative. Does it not appear extraordinary that at the same period of time so many minds seemed to be directing their enquiring energies towards the subject of Free Trade in corn, if at the same time there should appear no external circumstances, as it were, forcing that subject on their attention? But, gentlemen, those external circumstances did exist. Not only was the alarm extensive with regard to the potato murrain; but had it not pleased a gracious Providence to suspend the falling rain—had it continued another two or three weeks—what must have become of the wheat crop, and what must have been the privations of the poor of this country? It was at such a juncture, gentlemen, that the Conservative ministry, and Conservative members of Parliament, began to review their past votes on the corn question, to avail themselves of the result of those Free Trade measures which had already been introduced, and thus looking onward from them to what was likely to be the result of more extended measures of the same character—to contemplate the introduction of that alteration in the relations of the country, a Free Trade in corn, by which the long-contending parties for agricultural and manufacturing interests were to be amalgamated, new channels opened, and new sources created through which capital may flow into the agricultural districts, unequal burdens equalised, and the industry of the country relieved by lightening every weight that pressed upon it. Now, here is the head and front of my honourable friend's offending—that he was almost the first to draw the public attention to the advanced and advancing views on this subject (cheers and groans). I candidly admit that I at first disapproved of his early avowal of these views; but, subsequently, my attention, like others', has been drawn to this matter; and though I once thought agricultural protection a sine qua non to the safety of the country, I own that the time has arrived to abandon it with safety—at least if under the guidance of her Majesty's present Government, for in their integrity and ability I feel the fullest confidence. Why, gentlemen, have we not seen the agricultural labourer reduced to wages—I will not say wages, but a pittance, that affords no just remuneration for his services? Do we not see fertile districts half farmed, and consequently not yielding half the produce nature intended; and if these are the results of protection, is it not time we said farewell to it? Now, gentlemen, I beseech you to consider with what views, but those of deep and absorbing interest in your welfare, could my honourable friend have taken up the advanced post in the Free Trade movement? Then show him now by your votes and earnestness in his cause that you are grateful for the measure. I am here to-day to ask your support of my honourable friend, and that you will thereby testify to the honourable baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government, that you duly appreciate the sacrifice he has made to meet the wishes and promote the happiness of the people, that you will avail yourselves of the first public opportunity to merge any political differences of minor importance in the gratifying opportunity now afforded you of recording your sense of the value of those measures, proposed by the most able, conscientious, and decisive minister this country ever possessed. But you will, perhaps, tell me I am advocating the cause of the ministry rather than that of my hon. friend. Gentlemen, they are one and the same cause. Let me, therefore, appeal to every honest Conservative to come forward and record his vote in favour of it. Let no feelings of personal interest damage so good a cause. Let the aristocracy, gallant and noble as they are, be not, as a noble lord has said, laggards, but leaders of the people. Let the middle class, honest, enterprising, and firm of purpose, rally round my honourable and gallant friend Captain Rous—whom I now nominate as a fit and proper representative for this city in Parliament. Let every elector rise in honest rivalry, that he be once more sent from these hustings honoured by your approval, and he will still be found to do his duty with honour to himself, advantage to his country, and courtesy to all (general uproar).

Lord F. EGERTON, in seconding the nomination, said he saw the minister, unavoidably perhaps, but as he thought, unfortunately for the country, deprived of the assistance of many valued adherents (hear, hear). He was not the man, under these circumstances, to withhold from a Minister so situated the small assistance which he could bestow, and he had reason to believe that little as it was, it would be best esteemed in the shape in which he was endeavouring to give it (cheers). He thought by so doing he should best facilitate the introduction of measures involving a principle which he hoped to see henceforth embodied in our commercial and fiscal regulations (cheers).

Mr. BOUVERIE, who was received with cheers, came forward and said—We are met together to choose a representative for the House of Commons, and I beg to propose Col. Evans as a fit and proper person (great cheering). Five years ago a Tory and monopolist was chosen to represent this great city. Since then we have had no vote or voice in Parliament (cheers). We have had one of our members voting one way, the other the other. On every great question of importance to the people, we have had one member voting one way for it, and the other against it—the one saying yes, the other no (cheers). We have now an opportunity of redeeming ourselves from this disgrace, and of re-establishing ourselves in the proud position Westminster used to occupy, as the first and greatest liberal constituency in England (great cheering). We have a place to dispose of; not one of emolument, though in Captain Rous's case it would seem to lead to emolument, but one of proud eminence—the honour of representing this great constituency (cheers). We have two applicants for the situation. One who has been always a Free Trader, and is so still; one who has always opposed the Corn Laws, and does so still; one who has always been a reformer, and is still; one who has always stood forward for the rights and liberties of the people, and does so still (great cheering). Did he believe Free Trade was for the benefit of the country? he believes it now. Did he believe that the Corn Laws ought to be repealed? he believes so now (loud cheers). The other applicant was a Tory and monopolist—what he is now I cannot tell. He is neither one thing nor the other—a sort of amphibious animal, something like a horse-marine (laughter and cheers). Sir Robert Peel has asked us two questions: Do we approve of Free Trade? I trust we shall answer, Yes; and send General Evans, a thorough Free Trader, to vote for it (cheers). Do we place confidence in Captain Rous? I trust we shall answer, No; that we place no dependence on him, that we cannot trust him (cheers). I beg, in conclusion, to propose General Sir de Lacy Evans as member for this city (cheers).

Dr. BAINBRIDGE said he rose for the purpose of seconding the nomination of General Evans, who had ever been the consistent advocate of liberal principles (cheers), who had ever been the opponent of all abuses in the Government, whether fiscal, commercial, religious, or connected with the representation (cheers)—who had ever been the stern defender of the rights of the people, even when it was not fashionable to be so (cheers). He was the consistent advocate of Free Trade principles, when the profession of these opinions was not expected to lead to place and to emolument (cheers). The hon. gentleman (Captain Rous) told them he was unchanged, and let them recollect that he originally came into Westminster as the adopted child of the Tories, and the opponent of Free Trade (cheers). He spoke on the hustings against the repeal of the Corn Laws, and he told the advocates of Free Trade in Parliament, that the triumph of their doctrines would lead the labourers and artisans of the country to the condition of being obliged to live on bread and an onion, and to take a suck at the pump (cheers). Either the judgment of the hon. captain must be defective, or he was guilty of dishonesty, for he told them he would vote for the repeal of the Corn Laws (hear, and cheers). If at that time the continuance of those laws he believed to be good, his judgment was defective; and if he had voted for those laws believing them to be bad, it was an act of political dishonesty (cheers). And in either case he was unfit to represent the electors of Westminster, and he would leave him on either of the horns of the dilemma which he chose to select (cheers). There were many other reasons which he (Dr. Bainbridge) could add why they ought to vote on this occasion for the Liberal candidate, but he would leave them to be descanted upon by the gallant general himself, who would deal with them much better than he (Dr. Bainbridge) could possibly pretend to do (cheers). They were now called upon to emancipate themselves and their great city from the disgrace of being misrepresented by an apostate Tory—by a man whom no party could understand—who was a sort of nondescript politician—who was neither fish, flesh, nor fowl (cheers and laughter), but some strange marine monster, with a log of a thousand pounds weight tied to his tail (cheers and laughter), and who stole into Westminster with the express purpose, it would seem, of getting into a good place. He (Dr. Bainbridge) would call upon the electors, by one united effort, to resuscitate their declining fame, and to re-establish themselves in that high and proud eminence which they had so long held in this country (cheers), as the defenders of the great principles of freedom, and the defenders also of the rights and privileges of their fellow-countrymen (loud cheers). In conclusion he seconded the nomination.

Captain Rous then presented himself, and was received with great applause by the "roughs" on his own side of the hustings; but with a preponderating amount of groaning from the other side. Amidst the utmost confusion, which prevailed throughout his whole address, and of which we should not have been able to have caught a word had he not obligingly addressed the reporters instead of the audience, he said—Gentlemen, electors of the city of Westminster, no man can regret more than myself that the peace of the city of Westminster should be disturbed as it is at this moment (groans). It is the duty of every man who wishes well to the Sovereign and to the measures of Sir R. Peel to hold fast by his principles at a time when many are deserting their colours, to consider well what are, and to defend, the true interests of the country. In 1841, when I before had the honour to address the electors of Westminster, I well remember that at that time there was great agricultural distress—that the country was engaged in two wars—that the funds were low, and that a general despondency pervaded all classes. Sir R. Peel shortly afterwards introduced his amended tariff. The consequence was, that the funds rose, peace was restored, and universal prosperity again prevailed. If that was the result of Sir Robert Peel's measures, as it must be admitted that it was, I say, that to Sir Robert Peel alone must be awarded all the merit and all the praise (cheers and confusion). Every branch of business received a stimulus, and general advantage to all classes resulted from the working of Free Trade principles; and seeing that, I could come to no other conclusion, long ere this time, than that the adoption of free trade principles was actually necessary for the country (cheers). I therefore proposed in the House of Commons that Australian wheat should be admitted into this country on favourable terms. I also advocated a Free Trade with our colonies, and in September last I gave it as my opinion that there should not only be a Free Trade in corn, but that as the population increased the Government should give a bonus on its introduction, that the people of this country should be supplied with food. No man can say then, gentlemen, that I have changed my opinions to suit the minister of the day; for it is known to every man in Westminster that my opinions were changed long before Sir Robert Peel changed his (cheers, groans, and confusion)—and, if there be any merit in the plans of Sir Robert Peel, I think you will agree with me that no man could carry those measures so well as himself. My Lord John Russell once tried to forward those measures and failed, and it was the opinion of all parties, including the honourable gentleman on my left, that Sir Robert Peel was the only man to carry them (cheers, groans, and other discordant noises). If the electors of Westminster have any fault to find with my votes, they will please to recollect that on every occasion when their interests have been threatened or assailed, I have been found in the van defending their privileges (loud cheers and uproar). The electors of Westminster will be pleased to recollect also that on one particular point of the utmost importance—I mean the window-tax—I seconded Lord Duncan's motion for its repeal; whilst my honourable antagonist, General Evans, though pledged to use his utmost endeavours to repeal that obnoxious tax, absented himself from the division, and never acted up to his pledge. The electors of Westminster will also recollect that I resisted the proposals which were recently made to introduce alterations in our vestry system, and there is not a vestry in Westminster but will bear testimony to the feeling with which I combated that proposal (cheers and confusion). If then, gentlemen, during the four years that I have had the honour of representing the city of Westminster, there is no single act or vote of mine which has been prejudicial to your interests, I ask why the gallant general now comes forward to oppose me, when he knows that my sole object is to support Sir Robert Peel in carrying those measures of Free Trade which are of the utmost importance to the country, and which no other man in the country can carry to a successful termination (great uproar). As regards my having accepted a public appointment, gentlemen, the question is, can I be more useful in performing an official duty, than in leading a more idle life. The gallant officer knows that it is absolutely necessary that the great measures proposed by the government should be carried through, and does he think that he will forward those measures by preventing my return (groans)? I ask you not to return me for my own sake—it signifies not in the least to me personally whether I am returned to Parliament or not. It is not for myself, but for the real measures which I go to support, that I ask you to return me (great uproar). The election will have a great moral effect upon the constituencies of this country, for it will then show whether or no the electors of Westminster approve of the measures of Sir R. Peel, and by its decision many future elections will be guided. And now, gentlemen, I have only to assure you that, if I am returned again, I shall, though in a public office, have no hesitation in giving my best advice and assistance to gentlemen of any political persuasion who may apply to me. Such is the course I have hitherto pursued, and I defy any man to say other than that I have taken more pains with those who differed from me in politics than with my supporters, knowing that as a gentleman and an Englishman I was bound to make no difference between parties when I was elected to represent all (cheers and groans). Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, whether I am returned or not as your representative, nothing shall ever efface from my mind the gratitude which I owe to the constituency of Westminster. You brought me forward and elected me in the room of the party which had represented the city for near a quarter of a century—you reposed your confidence in me, and I am not aware that I have done anything to forfeit it (cheers and uproar). To-morrow I shall meet you again; in the mean time I beg you to recollect that no improper notice, no reproach of any kind, no gentlemanlike placards have issued from me, and that I deprecate the employment of any abuse whatever. Let me ask the same good humour, and the same conduct from my opponent (uproar). I again repeat, that whether beaten or no, my only object has ever been to do my best to serve my country (cheers, and great uproar).

Sir DE LACY EVANS came forward to address the assemblage, and was received with loud cheers, but owing to the noise and confusion which prevailed it was impossible to hear distinctly a portion of his observations. He spoke to the following effect:—"I always felt great gratification in the honour of appearing before you on former occasions as a candidate for your suffrages, but never on any preceding occasion have I felt more so, or more reliance in the justice of our cause, than in the present instance (cheers). Gentlemen, this election, at this unseasonable time, is none of our seeking, and I was about to go into a statement that would show you how it came to pass, but the returning officer has relieved me from that necessity, for he stated to you in a few words that the acceptance of an office, I believe a very valuable office—under the Government, by Captain Rous, has led to it (cheers). My best course to adopt is to refer at once to all that I have been able to hear of my honourable and gallant opponent's observations (hear, hear, hear). But before doing so, I must beg, in all fairness to him, to express my conviction of his excellent personal qualities (cheers). There is not, I am sure, a more good-humoured, a more urbane, a more manly character in society (cheers); and I wish it to be understood that in any observations I make with reference to him, I solely allude to his political conduct and principles, and if I transcend in the slightest degree the courtesy and good feeling which is due to a man of his excellent private qualities, I trust and hope sincerely that he will believe it was utterly unintended on my part, and that I have no intention but to enter into a fair disquisition of our rival claims to your confidence (hear, hear, and cheers). The most marked observation that my noble and gallant opponent has made is, that there will be a great moral effect arising from this contest (cheers). A great moral effect will certainly arise from it, not only with reference to my honourable and gallant opponent, but also with reference to the Prime Minister of England (loud cries of hear, hear); and, what I esteem quite as much, with reference to the honour, reputation, and fame of this great constituency (cheers). And I confidently trust that between this and to-morrow night that moral effect will be triumphantly established throughout the land (loud cheers). He made a statement which I think rather extraordinary: he seems to attribute to himself the conversion of Sir R. Peel (cheers and laughter) to Free Trade principles. He states, forsooth, that he has a long time been convinced of the propriety of Free Trade principles; but it was only the other night—I believe a few nights since—that a great meeting of the constituency assembled at the Crown and Anchor, for the purpose of supporting the measure of Free Trade now before Parliament, and my gallant opponent was specially invited as one of your representatives to come to that meeting and declare his sentiments on the subject; but no application—no entreaty—no request—no argument, however earnest, could induce him to show himself on that important occasion (cheers). He has said that Sir Robert Peel has only one object in all his measures—namely, the welfare and happiness, and I suppose the liberty too, of the great body of the people (hear, hear). Now, gentlemen, was it in order to sustain the principles of liberty that he perseveringly opposed the emancipation of the slaves in the West India colonies (hear, and cheers)? Was it to further the rights of the great body of the people that for about twenty years of his life he resisted—unhappily with great power—the emancipation of our Catholic fellow-subjects in Ireland (hear, hear)? Was it to further the rights, liberties, and welfare of the people, that throughout his whole political career he has resisted Parliamentary reform (cheers); and when beaten out of his opposition to it—as he has been beaten out of his opposition to every other measure he opposed—has sought to restrict the operation of reform by resorting to all the technicalities of the Registration Court (cheers)? He, with a naïveté and innocence quite amusing, asks how is it possible I can come forward to oppose him, professing myself at the same time to be the friend of Free Trade, and seek to deprive Sir Robert Peel of his co-operation (hear, hear)? I have been the advocate of Free Trade for some 20 years, and I would now go into the house not only to support the Government measure, but the full and immediate repeal (loud cheers). I wish to discharge my duty by examining into the pretensions of my honourable and gallant opponent, and the extraordinary manner in which he comes before you. He says, in the speech made by him, that he repels the insinuation that he was guided by any interested motive in adopting Free Trade principles, or adopting the course that he now pursues. I will not judge him by prejudiced opinions; but will apply to him a rule which was laid down two or three nights back by Sir James Graham, one of the principal members of the Government with which he is now connected. Sir James Graham states that the true test of a disinterested and conscientious conversion is to inquire whether a man's worldly interests are promoted by his conversion. Well, sir, it is but fair for me to take this test, which is applied by one of the principal leaders of the Government, as applicable to his hon. colleague, my hon. and gallant opponent, as a candidate who has obtained office, and to myself as a candidate without any office. He, I think, falls under Sir James Graham's test, and it is an excellent test. He has succeeded to an excellent office with a very handsome salary. I am quite sure that, in doing so, his motives are honourable, and that he has been guided by a high and most excusable personal ambition; but we have nothing to do with his personal ambition; our business is to inquire into the probable causes of his conversion, and here they are stated by Sir James Graham (cheer). I have been always in the opposite category. It happens that very many years before the honourable gentleman appeared as a supporter of Free Trade, I was a supporter of it (loud cheers); but I was not a supporter of it with any result of advantage to myself, but the contrary (hear, hear). I have supported it when my advocacy of it produced to me most severe professional discountenance, and also professional persecution (cheers). This is the advantage my honourable opponent possesses over me, that at the period of his conversion he succeeded to a comfortable berth, while I have been exposed to the very reverse (cheers). I now beg leave to remind you of the consequences that followed on your supineness and over-confidence at the last election (hear, hear). The first question that came before the house was this very identical question of the Corn Laws, and what did my honourable and gallant opponent say on the subject? He said, if you repealed the Corn Laws, you would be reduced to utter destitution; you would be reduced for subsistence to bread and an onion and a suck at the pump (laughter)—instead of the beer and gin that you now enjoy. I don't think that was a very good proof of his political wisdom, though perhaps it was a most excellent proof of his oratorical taste (cheers and laughter). The next question was one in which you and the great body of the people, and all benevolent people, are interested—I advert to the motion brought forward by Mr. Walter, with reference to the dietary system of the poor (hear, hear). I will refer you to a letter which was published in all the newspapers from Mr. Walter, a most honest and philanthropic supporter of the rights of the poor—I will refer you to that, and not to anything I shall say, with regard to myself, as to the relative conduct of my honourable opponent and my conduct with regard to the poor on that occasion (cheers). I deem it necessary here to advert to some statements made at the last election with respect to our friends the licensed victuallers (hear). It was represented that they were extremely displeased with me, because of some 10 per cent. that was imposed upon them by the late Government. I regret that cause of annoyance should have taken place, but I suggest to our friends—our impartial friends, the licensed victuallers' body—to cast their eyes back through the statute-book, and I think they will find a good many statutes in that book originating with the party of my honourable and gallant opponent, that are ten times worse than the 10 per cent. measure (cheers). For instance, the Beer Bill. I think the Beer Bill originated with them; it is not attributable to the late Government, at all events (hear, hear). I now come to speak of my conduct on several occasions. I doubt if it be not altogether superfluous to detain you by entering into detail as to my political principles, which are really unchanged, and which are quite opposed to those of the honourable and gallant captain (cheers). I have been always the supporter of civil equality, as applicable to all sects and denominations (cheers). I have at all times supported the abolition of penal laws affecting the dissenters (cheers). I have likewise been the advocate, of course, of the abolition of the laws which oppressed the Catholics of both kingdoms (loud cheers). And let me also tell you that I never failed to give my vote and support in favour of the most barbarously oppressed people in Europe—the Jews (cheers); a people as respectable—as industrious—as deserving—as good subjects—and as well entitled to enjoy the rights possessed by their fellow-subjects, as any other portion of the people of the country (hear). Need I tell you that I shall continue to support them (cheers)? I doubt if my hon. and gallant friend will have the power to do so, even though he should have the will. His hands are now tied up; however good and excellent his intentions may be, he will be under the necessity of holding his tongue and giving his vote as the head of the Government may direct (cheers). I beg to remind you that in going to Parliament as your representative on this occasion, I go there to support and carry out to the utmost the measures of Sir Robert Peel (cheers). But remember that those measures will not be complete until a period of three years has elapsed. Recollect that for many years Sir Robert Peel was opposed to the repeal of the Corn Laws; a sudden conversion on his part has taken place, but can we be quite sure that another sudden conversion may not come over him during the next three years (cheers)? Look back to the conduct of Sir Robert Peel on former occasions (hear, hear). When beaten on the subject of the Test Act—when beaten on the subject of the emancipation of the Catholics of Ireland (cheers) when those great measures were passed, did he cordially endeavour to carry out practically the results of those measures (hear, hear)? No, up to this day the Dissenters, the Catholics, and the Jews, are practically deprived of the benefits of those laws, so far as it is possible for the Government to deprive them of it (hear, hear). My hon. and gallant friend tells you that Sir Robert Peel is entitled to the whole merit of granting those measures. Now, I ask, did Mr. O'Connell do nothing for emancipation (cheers)? Did Mr. Cobden do nothing for Free Trade (cheers)? Did Lord J. Russell do nothing with regard to Parliamentary Reform or the Test Act (cheers)? This is the most audacious pretension that ever was heard of (hear). He says Sir R. Peel is the only man who can carry this Corn Law measure into operation. If that statement had been made two months ago, I would entirely concur with him. At that time the great Conservative party was not broken up, and if Sir R. Peel was then ready to sacrifice his political consistency, he was possessed of great power. But Sir R. Peel has since turned about (hear). He has laid his measures before the house, and he would not do so if he were not compelled to adopt that course. But now the Conservative party is broken up, and so far now from being the person to bring about this alteration of the law, Lord J. Russell is really the proper person to carry that measure; but you will permit me to say that the measures of Free Trade depend now neither upon Sir R. Peel, their present proposer, nor upon Lord John Russell, the consistent and honourable advocate of those principles; for the people of England have determined in favour of Free Trade, and it matters not a straw who is the minister or which is the administration (vociferous applause). Free Trade is already virtually enacted, and it is nonsense to tell you that the traitor or rather the deserter of his principles is the only person to carry it into effect (cheers and confusion). Now, gentlemen, allow me to refer to another point. My honourable opponent said in his speech of last night (and I have no doubt that he referred to me) that he was so strong in your good opinion that he could well dispense with the glitter of aristocracy amongst his supporters. On his election in 1841, gentlemen, I think nothing of that kind fell from the lips of my honourable opponent; but, for my part, I have no disposition upon this occasion to dispense with what he calls "the glitter of aristocracy." On the contrary, though myself tolerably democratic in my sentiments, as you know—though myself one of you, of and from the people—yet I hesitate not to say that I am proud to number amongst my supporters many noble and illustrious families who have faithfully served the people's cause, and who are a pride and an ornament to the country to which they belong (loud cheers and the usual interruption). That is my answer to the charge of depending upon the glitter of aristocracy; and now let me ask you what sort of a candidate must that be who is abandoned by the aristocracy of both parties, save by that excellent nobleman who seconded his nomination, and to whom I render all personal and political respect (loud cheers)? Except by that noble lord, my honourable opponent is literally abandoned by the aristocracy of this country. Then I come to the press; and again let me ask you, what sort of a candidate can he be who is not only deserted by the aristocracy, but who can find no supporter amongst the whole public press of the metropolis, that great exponent of public opinion in this country (loud cheers)? Let us take the newspapers which rank first as the representatives of the high Tory party of this kingdom, the Standard and the Morning Herald, and let us see what they say. They have not one idea in common with me, yet they are firmly of opinion that the honest and honourable men of all parties will vote for me (cheers). Now, gentlemen, I will mention to you one sentence more, as an indication of the feeling of that high and respectable Tory party which returned my honourable opponent to Parliament in 1841. Immediately after announcing that I was your candidate, I met a member of Parliament of great eminence as a public man, and of the highest character, both in political and private life. Though directly opposed to me in politics, he said, "I am delighted that you are a candidate. On the last occasion I was opposed to you, and I did my best to return Captain Rous; but now I shall give my whole support to you." I said that I was extremely gratified to hear that from a man whose sentiments and character were well known to be so sound and unimpeachable as his, and that I was the more delighted, because I regarded it as a key to the opinion of the whole of his great party. He answered, "I hope it is; but allow me to say that it is not a key to the opinions of my party only, but to the opinions of the great mass, in fact, of the whole body of the English people, who love fair play, honour, and consistency, and detest the contrary" (loud cheers, mingled with disapprobation). One word more:—Gentlemen, I am simply an instrument in your hands; I do not invite you to exert yourselves on this occasion on my personal account; but I invite and entreat you to omit no exertions, both now and to-morrow, to advance those great principles of liberty and Free Trade which I have ever supported; and I entreat you, in the words of my honourable opponent, to teach your representatives the great moral lesson that political rectitude can alone receive your approbation and support (loud cheers and uproar).

No other candidate having been proposed, The HIGH BAILIFF called for a show of hands on behalf of Captain Rous. About 50 hands out of the whole vast assemblage, which had by this time considerably increased, and now blocked up the main thoroughfare of the market, were all that were held up for the hon. captain.

Another show, for Sir De Lacy Evans, was next called for, and amidst the loudest cheering and applause a perfect forest of hands was exposed.

The nomination was declared to be in favour of General Sir De Lacy Evans, and a poll having been demanded on behalf of Captain Rous, the assemblage soon after quietly dispersed.

RESULT OF THE ELECTION.

The polling for this election commenced on Wednesday morning at 8, and closed at 4, resulting, as will be seen, in the triumph of the Liberal candidate. At four o'clock, it having been evident for some hours previous that the fortune of the day would be with Gen. Evans, crowds of Liberal electors, and friends of the cause, flocked from all directions to the front of the Ship Hotel, Charing-cross, to congratulate their old and gallant representative, now once more reinstated in his proper position. About half-past four o'clock Sir De Lacy Evans presented himself at the balcony of the hotel, and was immediately hailed with deafening shouts and huzzas, intermingled with waving of hats and handkerchiefs, which continued for some minutes. When silence was in some measure obtained the gallant general briefly addressed the crowd from the window. He said, that although the state of the poll would not be officially announced till to-morrow (this day) he had great pleasure in informing them that he believed the majority in his favour would be at least 800 on the day's canvass (loud cheers). He thanked them and all his fellow-citizens for the zeal and public spirit they had exhibited during the day, and throughout the whole of this highly important struggle. It would do honour to them (cheers). A glorious victory having been obtained, they might return home for the present. To-morrow he would address them at greater length. In the meantime they might congratulate themselves that they had amply and nobly vindicated the ancient reputation of this city, and given a lesson to the Tories and the new Government (loud cheering). He had not then five minutes breath in him, but he would do both the triumph and the true and honest Liberals who had achieved it greater justice, and address them more at length from the hustings to-morrow (cheers). Once more, he begged to congratulate them on the result of their exertions, and to thank them all from the bottom of his heart.

Three hearty cheers were then given for Sir De Lacy Evans, and for civil and religious liberty, and the crowd broke up.

The following is the hourly state of the poll throughout the day, as given by General Evans's committee:

It may be worth while to append the numbers polled by the same two candidates at the last election, in 1841. They were as follow:—Rous, 3338; Evans, 3258.

OFFICIAL DECLARATION OF THE POLL.

On Thursday, at two o'clock, the High Bailiff (F. Smedley, Esq.) attended at the hustings at Covent Garden Market, for the purpose of officially declaring the final state of the poll.

The crowd was very great, but not so noisy as at the nomination of candidates. General Evans, attended by the Hon. Mr. Bouverie, Lord Marcus Hill, and a number of his friends, arrived a few minutes before two o'clock; they were most enthusiastically cheered. Captain Rous, and a number of his most influential supporters, shortly afterwards presented themselves on the hustings. They were received with the most deafening and discordant yells and hisses, intermixed with some cheers from their friends.

The High Bailiff then announced the numbers polled for each candidate to be as follows:—

Gen. Evans 3843
Capt. Rous 2903

Majority for Gen. Evans 937

The announcement of the numbers was received with tremendous cheers and hisses, amidst which General Sir De Lacy Evans came forward and addressed the thousands assembled, thanking them for the honour conferred upon him.

STATEMENTS OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.

Torrington, Devon, February 1, 1846.

SIR,—I have attended many of the poor which Mr. Geo. Toms, our indefatigable Secretary, has reported upon, and whose cases he will send to you by this day's post; and I can confirm his statements relative to their destitution and misery. I believe there are many families in even a worse condition than those he has sketched. Trusting soon to witness the abolition of the starvation laws, I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,

G. Wilson, Esq. T. K. TAPLEY, Surgeon.

Torrington, Jan. 31, 1846.

SIR,—I beg to hand you the statement of different agricultural labourers of this district, as you requested me, and I am greatly obliged to you for the offer of some beds and bedding for them. I do assure you that the labourers in this locality are in a most deplorable state, as you will see by the statement which I have sent. Within the last week I have had application from a hundred labourers, giving me a most awful account of themselves and families. Be pleased to direct the beds and bedding to me. I will, with our friend Mr. Rous, deliver them out as you may direct. Also, I beg to state that Pickford & Co., carriers, as a communication from Manchester to Exeter, will be the best conveyance for you to send it by. I beg to remain, Sir, yours, &c.,

G. Wilson, Esq. GEO. TOMS.

P.S.—The 'squires are rampant almost to think of the League's sending beds amongst the labourers, and inquiring into their state.

Samuel Perryman, of Saint Giles, aged 36 years, wife aged 40, mother of 11 children in 13 years. I have 7 children now at home, 6 of them under 9 years of age. I have worked for 14 years with Mr. Hookway, of this parish. My wages is 7s. per week. I pay 4s. per bushel for barley, rent 2l. 10s. a-year. I have no potatoes; nothing more than the penny goes for. My family is the most distressed in the whole parish. I am now under the doctor's care, and I am fearful I shall be a cripple. The 7s. is all we have to live upon.

George Hoare, wife and 5 children; of the parish of Fristlestock, wages 7s. per week. I work for Mr. John Fisher, living on his own estate. I had my goods all sold up for rent, and was obliged to go to the workhouse. I have been in great distress, me and my family.

Statement of the wife of Philip Morrish, labourer to Mr. Mann, of the parish of Fristlestock. The estate Mr. Mann rents of Lord Clinton.—My husband's age is 34. I am about the same age. I have had 7 children in the whole, with a great deal of sickness. I have buried 3 children. His wages is 7s. per week. I have rented the house for two years and a half of Mr. Mann, my husband's master, but I am obliged to leave it, it being ready to fall down. My rent is 1s. 2d. per week, or one day's work. After my rent is paid I have 6s. 10d. to live upon. My husband's master pays me in cash, and I go to Torrington market, and make the best of it. I seldom or ever buy any meat. I buy a pound (a week) of bacon, at 8d. per pound; I get a half-bushel of wheat a-week, and then my stock is nearly gone. I get a little sometimes myself, which helps us along. My husband has been ill, and has only done five and a half days' work since Christmas. He belongs to a sick club, and now he gets 5s. per week. I have also two children ill. I am sure you can have no idea of the state of my affairs.

Statement of the wife of James Short, Great Torrington, aged 36 years.—She says that he has not been able to get any employment for some time. He served his apprenticeship with Mr. Ward, a farmer of Great Torrington, and he is considered a first-rate labourer. We have 4 children, all very young; neither of them gets a penny. He has been employed on the parish road for some time. His work averages about 3 days a-week, for which he gets 3s. 6d. My rent, including poor-rates, &c., is 1s. 2d. per week. I buy half-a-pound of suet or lard weekly, for six of us to live upon, and the remainder I lay out in potatoes. We have very seldom any bread, or any food some days to eat. I often hear my children crying for bread, and I have nothing to give them. I seldom or ever taste any animal food; I often grieve when I pass through the market and see it, and think that there is none for me. I am often without fire or food; you can well judge of my other matters.

Richard Scott, labourer, aged 41 years; works for Mr. Shopland, farmer, of the parish of St. Giles; the estate belongs to Mrs. Morrison, of Yeovil, in the parish of Peppercombe:—He says that he has had 8 children in the whole; two are dead. I have now 5 home with me; 4 of them get not a farthing. My wages are 7s. per week. I buy my corn of my master at one stated price at all times, viz. 7s. per bushel for wheat, and 3s. 6d. for barley. I settle with my master once a month, and then I have to allow for three bushels of corn. I sometimes settle up for months and months, and never receive a farthing, and then in debt. I have my bacon and other things of him. My rent is 5l.—house, orchard, and small spot of ground, which I till my potatoes in. My family have seldom tasted fresh meat this last fortnight. I have not had anything more in my house for 7 to live upon but one pound of suet. I take my dry bread with me, and my master allows me one quart of cider per day. I am very short of bedding, having no money left to buy anything with. I buy a small pig, and rear it, and sell it to pay my rent.

James Vicary, agricultural labourer.—He has 5 children, rent 3l. per year; to maintain this family, his wages are 7s. per week, and seldom in full employment at that rate. The above-named labourer gave evidence of the state of his fellow labourers in this district before the League in Palace Yard, London, and was there remarked for his intelligence. Since that time, he has suffered great privations. I have frequently heard him say he has been obliged to rise from the table before he had half sufficed his stomach, to leave the coarse food for his children.

William Bunbury, labourer, of Langtree, has a wife and 8 children. Neither of his children get anything. Wages 7s. per week. Works for John Tucker. Believes that the estate is his master's.

William Mitchell, labourer, of the parish of Shebbear—Wife and 4 children; wages 7s. per week. Rent 2l. 12s. per year. His family are very bad off.

George Jewell, labourer, of this parish; he now being a tenant of mine. In removing his goods at Michelmas, I found him in a state of poverty. His earnings are 7s. per week. He has a hard family; his wife is shortly expecting the 8th child.—GEO. PHILLIPS, Hantsaws, Jan. 28.

Statement of the wife of George Jewell, of the parish of Hantsaws, labourer; he works for Mr. George Phillips, a tenant of Lord Clinton:—My husband's wages is 7s. per week. My barley I buy of Mr. Phillips, for which I pay 4s. per bushel; and he charges us 7s. 6d. for wheat, should we at any time want any. I am daily expecting the 8th child. I am very poor; I have no change of any bedding. I have not a child that can earn a farthing. My husband's master gave me this paper to give you, to show that I am in great distress. I have 4 children living—one always ill. The parish allows me 6d. per week. My house rent is 3l. 10s., which I pay to Mr. Phillips. The house belongs to Lord Clinton. I buy a pound of suet at 6d. per pound, per week; some weeks we manage to buy a pound of bacon. That is all we get per week as animal food.

John Lockyer, Great Torrington.—I am a labourer in the employment of Mr. Hunt, a tenant farmer of Lord Rolle. My wages is 14d. per day. One shilling we pay for rent; then we have 6s. to maintain six of us; and by the time we have bought fire, candles, and soap, we have 4s. 6d. to maintain six on. Meat we never get any, unless we have a half-pound of suet, or a pennyworth of bacon. We never eat anything but barley bread, and not enough of that; and as to our bedding, we have one blanket and one whole sheet for us all; our beds are straw, and the rain comes in in different places. We have but one small table and three broken chairs and two stools. We have had 10 children; five living; four we have at home, and one lives out; five we have buried, three of whom were completely starved to death through the means of a severe parish, and one we have very ill now, and my wife went to the relieving officer for an order for the doctor; and my wife asked the doctor if he could do anything for the child; but he said no; there was a private mark on the order; and he could not do it at the time. I lost my three children. I had nothing but stones to break, and had to go nine miles a day, and work hard for 5s. per week; and I expect this is the last week's work I shall have at Mr. Hunt's, and I shall have nothing but the parish roads to trust to, and then I shall have but 4s. 8d. per week.

[The foregoing statement was written by John Lockyer himself. I should add that he was not regularly brought up as an agricultural labourer, although he now works at it.—GEO. TOMS.]

William Kelly, labourer, of the parish of St. Giles, near the seat of the late Lord Rolle, states that he works regularly for Mr. William Liverton, of the parish of Beaford, for which he gets 7s. per week, and one quart of cider per day. The estate that I work on belongs to Sir Thomas Ackland, the member for the northern division of the county. My wife has had 10 children, and are all living. I have six home with me now; five of my children are under nine years of age, and never earned me a penny. My wife has been ill for near 12 months, and the parish have allowed me 1s. per week. I pay my master 4s. per bushel for my barley; for this last month I have used in my family one bushel per week; my potatoes are getting shorter. After my barley is paid for, I have left only 3s. to buy other things for my family. My rent is 3l. 10s. a year. I have a garden, which I till potatoes in, also other garden necessities. My master pays me once a month. After deducting for the corn and other things I have of him, I do not receive much at the end of the month. My clothes I beg, for I have no money to buy them with. I have not a morsel of bread in my house this day (Sunday) to give my children. I have boiled some potatoes for them. I shall take my bag with me to-morrow for corn.—Jan. 25, 1846.

Statement of the wife of Richard Sussex, labourer, of the parish of St. Giles (the late Lord Rolle parish).—My husband has worked for Mr. Tanton, with his apprenticeship included, for 22 years. His wages are 6s. per week. I have five children, and soon I shall have another. My children are all young, and neither of them get a penny. I have no potatoes more than I am obliged to buy. How I get through with my family I cannot tell you; we are very often in want of food. If I can use one pound of bacon per week, that is the outside for the seven to live upon. I pay 3s. per bushel to my husband's master for barley; we use one bushel per week; then I have 3s. left, out of that 1s. 2d. to pay for rent. The house I rent of Frank Squire, of St. Giles' Town. My husband's master, Mr. Tanton, rents his estate of the representatives of Lord Rolle.

Statement of the wife of Samuel Ackland, of the parish of St. Giles. My husband, when able to work, gets 10d. per day. He works the bone mill for Mr. Geo. Braginton. I have 2 children.

Statement of the wife of Abraham Bright, of High Land, of St. Giles, who says—I have had a hard family, 10 children in the whole. I have 4 at home with me now. One of the children goes out sometimes for a bit of meat, the other 3 get nothing. My husband works for Mr. Row, and gets 6s. per week. Mr. Row is a tenant farmer of Lord Rolle's representatives. I buy a bushel of barley weekly, having no potatoes. I pay 3s. 6d. per bushel for barley to Mr. Row. My house rent is 3l. 10s. a-year. In addition to the rent, I am obliged to pay poor-rate and tithe. I have been summoned many a time for non-payment. I have 50 or 60 yards of land to my cottage. If you would call and see my bedding you would be frightened; I have borrowed a blanket from the parson for three years past, and return the same again in May to the parson. I do not use half a pound of suet a week, for I cannot get it. I burn bread, and put it into the tea-pot for our tea.

Mulford Judd, of the parish of St. Giles, stated—I work for Mr. Liverton, of Beaford; the estate belongs to Sir T. Ackland. I have 5 children, four of them under 9 years of age. I work for 6s. 10d. per week, giving 4s. per bushel for barley; rent, 3l. 7s. per year. I am the son of a farmer.

William Parr, living in the parish of St. Giles, working for Mr. Liverton, tenant of Sir Thos. Ackland, works for 1s. per day; five children; 3s. per bushel for barley; rent, 3l. per year.

Richard Burd, labourer; wages, 7s. per week.—I have 4 children: I work three days a week for Mr. Symons. The estate belongs to John Furze, Esq. The other three days I work for Mr. Tanton, who rents his estate of Lord Rolle's representatives.

John Lethbridge has 6 children; three get nothing. Wages, 6s. per week. Works for Mr. Hadlow, of Roburrough. His wages are as high as any in the parish. Rent, 4l. per year; small field to my house.

Richard Belt, labourer, of the parish of Great Torrington, states that he gets 1s. 2d. per day. Sometimes he gets a few days' work from Farmer Stone, a tenant of Lord Rolle; at other times he gets a few days on the parish road, averaging about five days work per week. I have had 6 children, I buried one of them just before Christmas. One of them lives out, and the other four home. My rent is 1s. 2d. per week; after that is paid I have 4s. 8d. left. I buy one pound of bacon per week, and one peck of potatoes, and half a bushel of barley; and some weeks I buy half a bushel of wheat instead of the barley, as I have no meat to eat with it; and it is a change to have a little wheaten bread with our warm milk and water. I never have any tea; I get a bit of peppermint sometimes. I am sorry to say that all my goods, including bed, &c., &c., (if you can call it so) are gone; that I have nothing now to hold the straw in. I have one broken chair, and an old table; I am sure that it is not worth 5s. altogether. I am indebted to my master, Mr. Stone, 22s. for the corn. If Farmer Stone had not let me have it, we should have been starved. I had four children ill at one time in the small-pox, about three months since, and then I got in debt for food for the children. My age is 37 years, my wife about the same. My wife fries me a piece of the pound of bacon when I return from work. I never carry any thing to work with me, but dry bread, for the pound of bacon must last all six of us for seven days, which costs 8d. I brought home my pound of bacon from Farmer Stone's tonight for the week. I leave you to judge our state.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—I beg, through the medium of THE LEAGUE, to say that I have received the sum of 1l. from F. Monro, Cheltenham, for the use of the starving poor in Bicester. Many thanks to Mr. Monro. I have met, within the last fortnight, with sober and honest women and children, who have been compelled by hunger's gripes to weep frequently and aloud this winter for a piece of bread. It is a fact!

W. FERGUSON.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—The chemical lecturer of the above most excellent establishment, Dr. John Ryan, has, we are delighted to inform our readers, resumed the subject of general chemistry, which has for a considerable period been set aside for that all-engrossing subject the potato disease. The lecture was on the subject of heat, introductory to an extended series explanatory of the application of chemistry to the general purposes of life. We need scarcely say that the lecture was attended by a crowded and most respectable audience, who listened to the learned professor's discourse with breathless silence. We are more and more convinced of the high character and the moral influence of this splendid institution, especially when its professors take so much pains to bring the most abstruse subjects of science before their auditors in such a plain and simple form. This popular mode of treating subjects of scientific character is mainly owing to the committee of directors, who by so doing prove their good taste, and fully entitles them to the most extended patronage of the public. If we might offer to Dr. Ryan a fitting subject for a future course of lectures, we would suggest to him as a text-book the report of the Health of Towns' Commissioners. There he would find a wide and legitimate field for his powers as a chemical and medical teacher. The lectures on natural philosophy are highly creditable to the scientific knowledge of Dr. Bachoffner, who by the pleasing manner in which he delivers his discourse, procures him continually a large and delighted audience.

The Marquis of Sligo, the Hon. Mr. Dutton, and a party of English travellers, ascended the first cataract of the Nile, at Assouan, on the 20th of December.

AGRICULTURE.

THE RURAL REVOLUTION.

County members and protectionist lords have declared in every variety of tone, from the fierce to the dolorous, that a Free Trade in corn will be "a revolution;" a "danger greater than the Reform Bill itself." This language is intended to operate upon the mind of the timid and cautious mass of the well-to-do people against the impending change; but, like the thrice-repeated false cry of "wolf," it has ceased to have any potent effect.

Nevertheless, there is a sense in which that cry is perfectly true. Free Trade will effect a revolution, a great social revolution, but one which none, except monopolist landowners, will deem open to the slightest objection.

The revolution we allude to will be in the condition of tenant farmers, and in the state of British husbandry. Free Trade will, by its direct and indirect operation, render farmers independent, and husbandry a prosperous business. We fancy we hear our brother farmers exclaim, "that will, indeed, be a revolution!"

It is admitted that the condition of the "protected" agricultural labourers is so low, that if Free Trade does not raise them, it can depress them no lower. That was distinctly declared by Mr. Sidney Herbert, one of the members for South Wilts, an exclusively agricultural district, in which the farmers have implicitly relied upon "protection." We shall presently show, from sources not open to question, that the position of the tenant farmer is very similar. Protected, they have not prospered; and that chiefly by reason of the hand-to-mouth system protection has engendered. The dreaded "revolution" cannot do them more mischief than they endure from restriction, and may—indeed will—raise them from the dust.

And here let us call the attention of our readers to the kind of twaddle which passes current in the House of Commons for advocacy of the interests of tenant farmers. Mr. Stafford O'Brien—confessedly the only protectionist member of Parliament who has any pretension to debating power—at the close of his speech on Sir Robert Peel's plan, thus attempts to make out that "protection" is a tenant farmers' question. He said:

I am satisfied it is a tenant-farmer's question. And, far from thinking that a reason for underrating its importance, it is on that very account I resolve to make my stand against the measure. Apply the precepts of your new philosophy to the tenant-farmer. Suppose prices fall in consequence—partly, perhaps, of an inundation of foreign corn—the tenant-farmer says to his landlord, "I hope, sir, you will allow me a small abatement in my rent? I may not know so much about draining as Mr. Smith, of Deanston; I may not have all the patent implements, nor show the fattest pig; but my family has held under your's for many a generation: we have weathered hard years together; we have worn your colours—and we should be sorry to go elsewhere." The landlord may reply, "My good fellow, I am very sorry for you. You have invested your capital in these drainings and these soils; but so I have mine. You have invested the money—as I have—on the faith of the legislature. But we are told now by the Prime Minister that we are 'to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest.' There is a gentleman from the manufacturing districts with more capital than you, ready to invest in your farm. I really must look to my own family arrangements. You talk of feudal times and days, long gone by—you conjure up old exploded notions—and as for 'colours,' why, my good fellow, there is no 'true blue' now! Yes! unless the landlord, therefore, acts towards his tenant a better part, and with kindlier feeling than you are now prepared to act towards the whole agricultural body, the tenant-farmer must leave his farm. The manufacturer—whoever he may be—with large capital and more 'energy' (if you will), comes in, and the product is perhaps a quarter or two more per acre—" ("Hear," from the Opposition)—and that is called "improvement of agriculture;" but the only men who will suffer—mark!—are the men whose fault it was to have been poor comparatively, but whose fatal fault was that they trusted you! A short simple story, Sir, sometimes does better to illustrate an argument than more formal reasoning. Some months ago a farmer told me, "I have had a fortune left me." "Well, then," replied I, "you had better leave these 'cold clays'—take a better sort of land—settle down to it, and make your fortune double." "Sir," replied he, "there are the gravestones for four generations of my family in this parish. My father, grandfather, and great grandfather worked this farm—I will not go any where else. I will try what I can do at home. I will stick to the old farm till the plough breaks in the furrows." (Great cheering.) Sir, the heart of that man was worth volumes of political economy. (Renewed cheering.) And it is hundreds and thousands of men like him, without the same fortune indeed in their pockets, but with the same sort of heart in their bosoms, whom you are driving forth by your legislation, with broken hearts and ruined fortunes.

Now this is arrant nonsense. Pure unadulterated maudlin; as much like the reality as a sentimental novel is to actual life. And none would more eagerly repudiate such advocacy than the tenant farmer. It implies that the present servile and abject condition of too many tenants is a necessary condition, and one which it is desirable to perpetuate. Farmers take land to make a living, to earn a competency, to get money, and they naturally prefer to remain in the farm or the neighbourhood in which they were born and bred, because they have their relations and their associations around them; but the notion of having "worn the landlord's colours," or of entertaining any sentimental recollection of the generations who have lived on "his honour's estate," is all non sense. Farmers have no feelings of the sort. They have too much sense for that. They come for abatements of rent upon very different grounds. They say, "prices are not remunerating; the Corn Laws have not kept us where we expected, we have not the prices your law promised us, and we ought to have some abatement." That is in substance the appeal made to the landlord for abatement.

Now, let us strip Mr. O'Brien's speech of its tinsel and sentiment, and we shall find it contains three positions, on the part of the tenant farmers, as he alleges, why there should not be Free Trade: that they don't drain; that they have not the best implements and stock; that they have invested capital in farming on the faith of Act of Parliament prices; that there are other persons of more capital than the present tenants, ready to occupy the land; that old tenants must, therefore, be displaced; that "a quarter or two per acre" above the present produce may be grown, and that many farmers stick to an unprofitable farm, and unprofitable practices, from sheer vis inertiae. Now, farmers don't drain, or obtain the best implements and stock, for two reasons; first, because they have not that security of tenure which is necessary to justify expensive improvements; secondly, because they have been induced, through delusive reliance on protection, to take too much land in proportion to their capital they "invest their money on the faith of the legislature" in a way which prevents their obtaining full crops. These things are the direct results of landlord rules and landlord legislation, from which Free Trade will tend more than anything to relieve the tenant farmers. When prices are natural, when farmers have no fluctuations to guard against, except such as are caused by variations of seasons, they will necessarily apply themselves exclusively to grow the largest produce; and it is a mere monopolist artifice to pretend that the present race of farmers cannot, if their landlords would let them, so increase their produce as to defy foreign competition. It is impossible to take up a modern agriculturist work, without meeting with striking evidences of the fact that tenants require certainty, security, and the removal of landlord imposed burdens.

Dip, for instance, into the part of the journal of the Royal Agricultural Society, just published, and we can scarcely miss passages of this sort. Thus, in a prior essay on the farming of Kent, the writer says, speaking of hop culture, "Hop-growing is a speculation, in which a few occasionally realise immense profits, the hope of obtaining which induces the many to persevere. It is a lottery, in which the blanks are too commonly found disproportionate to the prizes." Hops, be it remembered, are highly protected; and what is stated with reference to hop growing, is strictly applicable to farming in general, which, under the restrictive system, is a speculation and a lottery, where the blanks exceed the prizes. Again, we are told, "In years of great abundance the price is so low as scarcely to meet the duty, and the expense of picking and drying. The chief hope of the planters obtaining a remunerating price is the chance that the crop in some other districts, save his own, may more or less fail. The cultivation of hops too frequently receives such exclusive attention as to act most injuriously on all the other crops. It is no uncommon thing to see the small portion devoted to the growth of hops, highly manured and cultivated, while the rest of the land is suffered, year after year, to remain in a foul and exhausted condition." What a picture of protected farming! Every word is applicable to grain growing. And the writer condemns the existing system when he says, "the sooner that hop-culture is allowed to occupy only a subordinate place in the extended husbandry of Kent, the better will it be for the advancement of agriculture and general prosperity."

The same writer says, before "draining" can be successfully carried out on that extensive district called the Weald, the small fields must be enlarged by grubbing the hedges and felling trees; and adds, "Not less than one-eighth of the arable land of this extensive district is occupied by hedges and trees, taking into calculation the ground that is injured by their roots and shade."

The consequence of this is, that "there are many thousands of acres in the Weald of Kent, which cannot, under existing circumstances, be cultivated without a positive loss, that might be made to yield of most kinds of corn a full average of the kingdom." And it is said these landlord-reserved trees do more injury to the crops in three or four years, "than the whole value of the trees will amount to after continuing the mischief for half a century." And the produce of the hedge-rows and the timber "would, after paying the expenses of grubbing, levelling, &c., go a great way in defraying the cost of thoroughly draining the whole Weald."

Here, then, the landlord, and the landlord alone, can enable the tenant to compete in the world's market. We suppose that it was in some such ungenial district as this that Mr. O'Brien's farmer, would "stick to the old farm till the plough breaks in the furrows"—against the roots of the hedgerow timber possibly!

Again: another writer in the same journal says, in an Essay on Fences,—“in the average of farms in this district (Sussex), one acre in ten would be added to the cultivated land by the entire extinction of fences. The second reason, and many tenant farmers would say the first, is, that any covert for game in the shape of hedgerows, would be totally destroyed.”

Here we have a hint of another landlord-imposed burden. And the last writer, in a very practical exposition of the evils of high hedges and timber trees, asks, "What object can a landowner have in the preservation of hedgerow timber? In a pecuniary point of view, he would be abundantly repaid by the interest upon invested capital, realised by the sale of the timber, and the increased value of the land to the occupying tenant."

So Mr. Karkeek, in his prize Essay on the farming of Cornwall, after stating his own high estimate of the value of "chemical science and mechanical ingenuity, in increasing the productive powers of the soil," adds, "but I should anticipate a hundred-fold greater improvements in Cornwall, within the next fourteen years, if the landlords—one and all—would adopt a better system in their leases."

And on the prevalent practice of holding too much land in proportion to capital, he says "There is no mistake more common or more injurious than the supposition that the more land a man occupies the greater must be his profits. The profit does not arise from the land itself, but from the mode of cultivation; and we could adduce many instances around us to prove, that farmers properly managing small holdings, are improving the soil, and realising fair profits; while others, on large farms and bad management, are ruining their farms and themselves at the same time."

Such are the views taken by practical farmers and men of business, and which stand out in strong contrast with the sentimental inanities we have quoted from Mr. O'Brien's speech. And we cite these passages to show that there is no necessity "that the tenant farmer should leave his farm" when farming ceases to be a lottery, and takes its place amongst businesses of steady profits. This can only happen after Free Trade. Therefore, we say, Free Trade will produce a rural revolution, by compelling the landlord to give secure tenure, to permit corn and roots to be grown in the place of rushes and hedge-row timber, and to abandon the silly and noxious hankering after the ghost of feudalism, on which Mr. O'Brien, the monopolist leader, is so piteously pathetic.

THE QUEEN.—There now appears to be very little doubt that the achievement of our beloved Sovereign will take place at Windsor. Preparations, supposed to be in anticipation of that auspicious event, have already commenced in her Majesty's private apartments.—Observer.

HADDINGTON.—DEFEAT OF THE PROTECTIONISTS.

(From the Kelso Chronicle.)
Thirty protectionist gentlemen, headed by Sir George Warrender, called "a meeting of the noblemen, landed proprietors, tenant farmers, merchants, tradesmen, and others of the county of Haddington, who are favourable to protection to British industry."

Two o'clock was the hour fixed on for the meeting, at which time the large Assembly Hall was completely filled. It was evident, however, that there would be much dissension, of which the protectionists seemed to be aware, for before proceeding to elect a chairman,

JAMES AITCHISON, Esq., of Alderston, requested all those who were not favourable to the views of the requisitionists to leave the room, as they had not been invited to attend (hisses). If they did not, they would be held to agree in the resolutions about to be submitted to the meeting.

LORD JOHN HAY contended that the meeting had been convened for the purpose of pronouncing an opinion on a great measure of commercial reform: and that all present equally desired to support British industry.

SIR GEORGE SUTTIE considered that those only who were in favour of the present protective system had been invited to attend (cries of "Oh, oh," and "no, no.")

SIR GEORGE WARRENDER, who said that he was very much indisposed, but had attended the meeting as an act of duty, trusted this preliminary question would be discussed with calmness. This was a private meeting of gentlemen, not presuming to express the opinion of the county; at least half of those present seemed to differ with the requisitionists, and he therefore hoped that they would follow their example—call another meeting, and express a distinct opinion on the subject.

MR. CADELL, Cockenzie, argued that the requisition was addressed to those who were favourable to British industry. Now, he belonged to that class, although he differed from the requisitionists.

A scene of some confusion here ensued. At length Sir George Suttie said it was time to take a decided course, and he therefore proposed that they (the minority) should retire to another room and not transform the meeting into a debating society (the worthy baronet, who spoke covered, was saluted with a cry of "Hats off!") He hoped they would be permitted to retire peaceably.

LORD JOHN HAY declared he would remain, from a sense of public duty. Whatever opinion went forth, it would be published as the opinion of the county. He did not dream that this was a class meeting, and he trusted they were prepared to pronounce an opinion on the great commercial question which had been submitted to the country by Sir R. Peel.

Another scene of confusion ensued; but at length Sir George Suttie took off his hat and invited his friends to retire, which was accordingly done.

Notwithstanding the retirement of the protectionists, the room (capable of containing about 400) was soon completely filled by a most respectable assemblage.

On the motion of MR. CADELL, the Provost, Mr. Dodds was unanimously called to the chair amidst much applause.

LORD JOHN HAY then said that he had received a letter from the Duke of Roxburgh, which stated that he had heard of the meeting—regretted his inability to attend, but declared his approval of Sir Robert Peel's measure. He (Lord John Hay) had no resolution to propose, but he would take the opportunity of stating his opinion of the Premier's measure. To separate the agricultural from the other great interests, was to take a very narrow minded view of this great question and the effects it was calculated to produce. Had the Government done so, they would have found it impossible to manage the affairs of this great commercial country. But the Government measure indicated nothing of the sort—it was not only a great experiment, but a great moral and philosophical experiment. It put an end to class-interested legislation, by placing corn on the same footing as other manufactured articles, and would tranquillise the hostile feeling which prevailed not only amongst different classes throughout this country, but which also endangered our foreign relations: for the shutting of the ports against foreign grain had been the means of paralyzing the efforts of the Foreign Secretary in concluding favourable treaties with other nations (applause). He (Lord John Hay) had had much intercourse with foreign countries, and he was confident that our liberal commercial policy would be followed by them. The President of the United States had already recommended that their tariff should be reduced to the revenue standard, and that no duties should be levied for protection. He (Lord John Hay) had spent eight months in America—he believed he was the first man who, after the war, had sailed into the port of New York with the British flag—and he was convinced that the anti-British feeling which prevailed there was the result of our anti-commercial policy; give us Free Trade and this would do more for our interest than all the war steamers it was possible for us to send to their coast (applause). Before the last meeting was dissolved, they had heard much of protection to agriculture. Now he (Lord John Hay) would read to them the opinion of a noble relative of his (the Marquis of Tweeddale) upon that subject, written so long ago as the 8th of December. [The letter stated, that from the unfavourable weather, the potato rot, and other circumstances, Sir R. Peel would experience much difficulty in meeting Parliament—that it was therefore probable there would be a considerable diminution in protection to agriculture—a depreciation in the value of land might be the result at first, but ultimately it would become as valuable as it was at present.] Lord John proceeded to advise that a moderate course should be adopted by the meeting. Many who were present differed as to the question; some were for immediate repeal, while others contended for a certain amount of protection, which they deemed essential under the present circumstances. The Government measure was as extensive a reform as could have been reasonably anticipated, and should therefore satisfy all parties. For himself, he had no hesitation in stating that he would have preferred immediate repeal, and many Protectionists with whom he had conversed were of the same opinion. From the agricultural improvements introduced, farmers were as able in 1845 to compete with the foreigner without protection, as they were in 1825 when they had a high protective duty. The produce of the land had been increased by one half, which he showed was of the same value as the protective duty of 1825; and the British agriculturist had also the benefit of a reduction in taxation since that period. There was no possibility of effecting a great change without injuring some individuals, and to afford compensation was impracticable; it might as well be claimed by the cotton manufacturer or the silk weaver. He was no party man—he had no tie to Government; but if the liberal measure they proposed was rejected, God knows what would be the result. He believed, however, and he trusted it would be successful. If it was rejected, who, he would like to know, was capable of conducting the Government (hear, hear)? It was not likely that the present Government would introduce a measure inimical to the general prosperity. They had weighed it well, and had proposed a large and comprehensive measure calculated to give general satisfaction to the whole kingdom. (The noble lord resumed his seat amid much applause.)

MR. AINSLIE, farmer, then proposed the following resolutions:—

"That it is of the utmost importance that an end should be put to the agitation regarding the Corn Laws, which has so long convulsed the country, and to the uncertainty which prevails in all markets for corn.

"That while this meeting considers it would be desirable to have an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws in preference to the proposed measure of Sir Robert Peel, yet they consider it inexpedient that the country should adopt any measure which can tend to frustrate or delay the settlement of the Corn Law question."

MR. AINSLIE said he well recollected the period when he had incurred much odium for having, in conjunction with Mr. Hope of Fenton Barns, asked Mr. Cobden to deliver an address in favour of Free Trade, which, however, was now getting into favour even among the members of the Protective Society.

MR. MILLER, Mr. Cadell, and Mr. Mitchell Innes spoke in favour of the resolutions, which were carried unanimously.

MR. SYMON SAWERS proposed that a petition, in accordance with the resolutions, should be sent to the Legislature.

MR. SYDSERFF seconded the motion, which was carried with acclamation.

Three cheers were then given for Free Trade—three cheers for the League—a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman, and the meeting separated.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 21, 1846.

Elections have divided public interest with the protracted debate, if indeed the latter can now be said to possess any interest whatever. First in importance and significance we must rank the election for Westminster, which ended in the return of General Evans by a majority of nearly a thousand above his opponent. The contest lay between two Free Traders; no protectionist was found to present himself before this great metropolitan constituency. While therefore we rejoice in the triumph of the successful candidate, we are far from exulting in the defeat of Captain Rous. Independent of personal considerations, the principle at issue in the contest was the choice between immediate and deferred repeal; and the decision of Westminster is that which the League has ever supported—the necessity that the repeal of the Corn Laws should be both total and immediate.

But in every election personal considerations must be taken into account as well as political differences. On these grounds, the preference of General Evans is not only justifiable, but laudable; he had been long the popular member for Westminster, and had been defeated at the late election rather by a series of unfortunate accidents, rendered worse by mismanagement than by the deliberate choice of the constituency. He had been a supporter of Free Trade through evil report and good report ever since the question was mooted; he had nothing to retract—no former professions to contradict—no doubtful assertions to explain away. He had all the claims of a veteran in the great cause of commercial freedom; while Captain Rous was a new convert, who had fought vigorously under a different flag, and was therefore exposed to the suspicion intimated by the patriarch when he exclaimed—"The hands verily are Esau's hands, but the voice is the voice of Jacob." We do not share in such a suspicion. We believe the conversion of the gallant Captain, and his present convictions sincere. But where a choice had to be made, we must prefer a tried and faithful ally to a volunteer who did not appear to offer his aid until the success of the campaign had been all but decided.

The East Suffolk election was one of those solemn farces which exhibit the miserable and degraded condition of the county constituencies. Mr. Gooch was chosen, not by the nominal electors, but by the combination of a few landlords anxious to maintain and perpetuate the serfdom of their tenantry. He was hooted from the hustings by the very men whom he is said to represent; the popular voice, so far as it could be heard, protested against his return, which will add little to the strength of the protectionists, but will give fresh vigour to the efforts of the Free Traders to redeem the counties from their present degrading thralldom.

Dorsetshire claims a passing notice; it is generally believed that Lord Ashley would have been returned had he gone to the poll, but a weighty subscription purse was shaken in his face, and he felt unprepared to meet the expenditure which a contest with such a money-power must necessarily have involved. His farewell address to his former constituency indicated greater firmness and independence of thought than the noble lord has been accustomed to manifest. He declared himself the advocate not merely for total, but immediate repeal, and he exposed the trite fallacies urged in defence of the Corn Laws with a freshness and vigour which can only be the result of strong conviction. We have often differed from Lord Ashley. There are some points in his recent address, of which we strongly disapprove; but we must say that his observations on Free Trade exhibits a breadth of view, and a soundness of well-considered principles, which lead us sincerely to regret his exclusion from Parliament.

Lord Lincoln, in South Nottinghamshire, has not adopted the tactics of Lord Ashley, but has boldly dared the protectionists to the fight. He is prepared to fight the battle of Free Trade on purely agricultural grounds; and we should angr better for his success, as well as feel a deeper interest in his cause, if he did not restrict himself rather too closely to the Ministerial measures. The men of Westminster have set a noble example, by neglecting the very shade of compromise; and Lord Lincoln would better have served his fame and his fortunes in the fight, if he had flung away the paltry condition of three years, with its mockery of a sliding scale, and taken his stand on total and immediate repeal. It is impossible to glance at this contest, without taking some notice of the strange interference of the Duke of Newcastle. Were this one of the ordinary differences between a father and a son, we should pass it over without comment; but it is an indecent and unconstitutional attempt to dictate to a constituency. He addressed the candidate as John Gilpin did his horse:

"'Twas for your pleasure you came here,
You shall go back for mine."

Lord Lincoln will not go back; and if the dual letter does not ensure his return, there is neither spirit nor manly dignity in the constituency of South Nottingham.

aforesaid -- Saturday, February 21, 1846.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE—FRIDAY.

The adjourned debate on the question that the house do resolve itself into a committee of supply to consider the Customs and Corn Importation Acts was commenced on Friday evening by Sir HOWARD DOUGLAS, who rose with inexpressible pain to oppose the proposition of her Majesty's Government, and to give his vote in favour of protection and against the extinction of restrictive duties. After explaining the grounds on which he thought that agriculture was entitled to protection, he proceeded to make several practical observations on the injurious bearings of the present scheme upon those great colonial interests which were not represented in that house, and which were not in general well understood by the country. The abolition of protecting duties extinguished the Canada Corn Bill, which was a solemn compact between the Imperial and Canadian Legislature, and destroyed all the flattering hopes which that bill was intended to foster. It also involved the abolition of discriminating duties; and from the moment when discriminating duties were abrogated, our colonies, so far as commercial purposes were concerned, became free and independent states. There would arise the question—"Of what use were our colonies?" and to that question it would be difficult to give a satisfactory answer. He concluded by quoting several extracts from the speeches of Mr. Huskisson, for the purpose of proving—first, that that great statesman was not an advocate of Free Trade properly so called; secondly, that he was the strenuous supporter of protection to agriculture; and, lastly, that he thought it absolutely necessary that we should give protection to our colonies if we wished to maintain our maritime ascendancy.

Viscount VILLIERS observed that the events of the last three years had caused him to change his opinion on the subject of protection, and expressed his conviction that this measure would tend to increase the prosperity and promote the welfare of all classes of the community.

Mr. F. SCOTT described the stunning effect produced on his mind by the sudden desertion of all his former principles and pledges by Sir R. Peel, and the pain and reluctance with which he now came forward to give the most decided opposition to his new commercial plans. He would not ransack Hansard to point out the inconsistency between the past and present speeches of Sir R. Peel and his colleagues; he would confine himself to contrasting the various and contradictory statements which they had made in their speeches during the last three weeks, in order to show the shifts to which men were driven when they brought forward measures for which there was no sound justification. The hon. gentleman then amused the house by reading a curious series of contradictions which he had detected in the speeches of Sir R. Peel, Sir J. Graham, and Mr. S. Herbert, delivered between the 26th of January and the 9th of February, 1846. Those contradictions were proofs of the difficulties in which great men were plunged when they abandoned principle, and entered upon a crooked and devious course of policy. He called upon the house to consider what the feelings of the party with which he was connected must be towards Sir R. Peel, by reflecting upon the terror and alarm which had seized a friend of his, who having tried an action in the provinces, and having then argued the merits of it in Westminster Hall, and having afterwards removed it to the court of last resort, the House of Lords, found that his leading counsel—the very man who had supported his claims in every previous stage of the cause—had not only thrown up his brief, but had actually taken one from his adversary. His friend had then applied to the King's counsel, and to the junior counsel, whom he had formerly employed, in the hope that they would have no scruple to undertake his cause. But no—they refused—for they said that it was their duty to follow their leader. Noticing the assertion that this project was wide and bold and comprehensive, he expressed a doubt whether it would be as wise as it was wide, as politic as it was bold, as successful as it was comprehensive. He considered that it would be "a heavy blow and severe discouragement" to agriculture—that it would diminish our command over the necessities of life—that it would drive bullion out of the country for the purchase of grain—that it would increase grievously the fluctuations of the price—and that it would diminish the supply of food for our labouring population. Whilst he was proceeding in his denunciations of the measure

Sir ROBERT PEEL asked Mr. Scott for whom he retained?

Mr. F. SCOTT (apparently bursting with indignation).—For whom am I retained? Who am I counsel for? I am counsel for no man, no party, and no sect. I was proud to follow the party of the constitution when the right honourable baronet hoisted the banner of it; but now that he fights under a different flag, I am left to myself, and must act according to the dictates of my own conscience and my own judgment. The hon. gentleman, after apologising for the warmth into which he was betrayed, delivered a long invective against Free Trade, which he described as sense in the abstract, and nonsense in the reality, and as a fantastic cobweb sparkling like a dew drop in the sun. With our taxation it was impossible. With our debt of 800,000,000, we had no more right to call on this country to enter into competition with countries comparatively untaxed, than we had to ask a man with a hundredweight on his back to enter into the lists with an opponent perfectly unencumbered. Besides, the appearance of the political atmosphere in the East, and still more in the West, was not such as to encourage us to make at present the rash and perilous experiment which was now recommended—an experiment which, he contended, would produce the loss of Canada and all our other colonies. He concluded with a long and declamatory philippic against her Majesty's Ministers, who, with Free Trade on their lips but not in their hearts, were now venturing upon a grinding, bone-crushing experiment, which would consign not only all the agricultural labourers, but all the other industrious artisans of the kingdom also, to one unsparing and indiscriminating ruin.

Mr. WARD said that the hon. member who had just addressed the house was a speaker whom it was very difficult to follow. He was difficult only in one sense,—and the difficulty arose chiefly from the variety of topics which his speech embraced. The hon. gentleman announced himself as counsel for the whole British empire, but the course of his speech seemed to carry him all over the world. As to his arguments, there was no difficulty in dealing with them,—or rather there was no necessity for replying to them, for one-half of the hon. member's speech completely disposed of the other. Every proposition of his was demolished by the next which he enunciated (hear, hear, and No, no). Did hon. members who cried "No, no," attend to the speech which had just been delivered? Did they observe how the hon. member attacked the Government, and did they not at the same time remember that that same hon. member had, until just the present session of Parliament, supported every one of the measures of the right hon. baronet? The hon. member who spoke last supported the Canada Corn Bill; he supported the measures of 1842, including the new tariff, and now he talked of their disastrous results as regarded our hardware and cutlery. The speech just delivered was filled with complaints of the measures of the last three years, and up to the last three months the hon. member himself had supported every one of those measures. Then he told the house that the matter of Free Trade was a question of degree, and almost in the same breath he informed them that it struck a blow at the heart of the constitution. Looking then, at the way in which one part of the hon. member's speech answered another, it might well be inquired what gave him a right to take office when asked for which party he was retained; and what right had he to apply the remark to Ministers that public men had great difficulties to encounter when they took a devious course? Surely for a long time past the present Ministers of the Crown had been taking a most direct course. No one who had sat opposite to the right hon. baronet and had seen the progress he had made in the adoption of principles of his opponents, could have doubted that he must in the end have come to the same conclusions with them; and those who supported him in the year 1842 had no right to turn round upon and to condemn him for results which they had rendered irresistible. What did they do in 1842? They were a great party, they had an unassailable majority in that house (cheers); they had the game in their own hands; there had been an appeal to the country on the question of protection to native industry (hear, hear); they had beaten their opponents. What was the first step taken? Concession was made; with all the responsibilities of power, the right hon. baronet yielded to what he now called the force of reason and of truth, as he only now yielded because it was reason and it was truth. After the admission of the principle, the only question was one of degree—where they should stop. In dealing with the tariff, how did the hon. gentleman deal with those interests with which they had been connected in 1841, with which they had so recently entered into a holy alliance? They sacrificed them. And if they were reduced to what they themselves admitted to be almost a hopeless condition—if defeat were staring them in the face—(cheers from Mr. Ferrand); the hon. member for Knaresborough cheered that expression; what did he do in the West Riding (loud cheers)? On the very first night after the opening statement of the right hon. baronet, it was a notorious fact, that the hon. gentleman in that house, with some foolishness, and much good nature, subscribed 2000*l.* to enable the hon. member to fight the West Riding election. ("That is not true," from Mr. Ferrand.) The hon. member published a very able letter ("hear, hear," from Mr. Ferrand, and much cheering), and he so completely succeeded in what he (Mr. Ward) believed to be his peculiar mission, of creating hostile feelings between the masters and the men, between the employers and the workmen, that his own friends absolutely repudiated his efforts; his own friends, the Tory manufacturers, were so frightened with the doctrines of the hon. gentleman, that they refused to take part and act with him. ("That is not true," from Mr. Ferrand.) If that were intended as a personal contradiction, it was not exactly the language which ought to be used in that house. ("No, no," from Mr. Ferrand.) Now, hon. gentlemen opposite found themselves placed in a position of denouncing as absolute treachery to their party the step taken by the Government, which was the inevitable result of honourable gentlemen's own former opinions; and the champions and advocates of protection now were forced to admit that they only differed from the right hon. baronet because he went further than they wished. The hon. gentleman who last spoke admitted that legislation must be progressive, that the laws of this country were not immutable, but that he would rather have changes introduced at the desire of the landlords than on the demand of the people. Now, the country had waited quite long enough for the landlords' desire; it was time to listen to the demands of the people (hear). The hon. gentleman complained that a tax upon grain was liable to be confounded with a bread tax; but he did not show how it was possible to separate them. The hon. gentleman told them also that protection was not required for the interests of agriculture in the part of Scotland with which he was connected; he talked of the disadvantages of hilly roads, and of the want of markets and manure, and though he talked of the demoralising effects of the ministerial measures, yet he had told them that cultivation could still be profitably carried on. As to the trash which the hon. member had quoted in relation to the colonies, it needed no answer, nor would it be necessary to reply to the circular of Mr. Buchanan; but he would ask how it was possible that we could incur the risk of nine-tenths of the Canada trade being taken from us and going to supply New York, seeing that we now supplied the market of New York ourselves against all competitors? What amount of the English export trade went to the English colonies? He did not believe that they took one-eighth of the whole exports of this country. Where were the rest consumed? In the neutral ports, where we had not any advantage, and not the slightest preference over our Continental neighbours. He must next go back to the speech of the hon. and gallant member for Liverpool (Sir H. Douglas), who, he regretted to find, had left the house; though he must have expected that some remarks would have been made upon what he had stated. The hon. and gallant gentleman was peculiarly happy in his position, for he said that he had nothing to regret and nothing to retract since he had come into Parliament. Few members in that house could make such an admission (hear, hear). The town of Liverpool, however, was not so peculiarly happy in her members at the present moment, for one, the noble lord (Lord Sandon), found it utterly impossible to make his vote and his speech agree upon this occasion (laughter), and the other hon. and gallant member had connected with the cause of the narrowest and blindest monopoly the greatest commercial town in the empire (cries of hear, hear). The honourable and gallant gentleman wished for protection to all; he would give protection to all; and he would give it to labour, because it was exposed to the competition of capital at home. He believed that was the doctrine of the hon. member for Knaresborough; but he seemed not to see the reply to his doctrine in the question, "What would labour do without capital (cries of hear)?" They heard of the competition of flesh and blood with machinery. They had been made the most of in the West Riding; but the working men now scouted such a doctrine,—they outstripped their leaders and went beyond them; and he confessed that he was surprised to hear an hon. member for Liverpool complain of the competition between English labour and English capital, and ask Parliament to protect labour against capital. Then the hon. member said that reciprocity was hopeless; that it was all very well to talk about Free Trade here, but that we could not communicate it to other countries. We had tried negotiations, and we had failed; was it not then advisable to try the effect of example (hear, hear)? Had not our trade with France quintupled, notwithstanding the most rigorous and severe restrictions imposed upon our imports? Then, it was asked, what would become of our colonies, and what would be the effect of British interests in India? The hon. and gallant member forgot that the people were supplied with cottons from this country better and cheaper than they could be procured elsewhere; and yet he said that this measure would be the ruin of England. He asked also how the people on the banks of the Ganges could enter into competition with those of other favoured countries. What did the people of the Brazils inherit by way of advantage over those who inhabit the same climate and had the assistance of British science and British capital (hear, hear)? He (Mr. Ward) had always thought it had been assumed, during the discussions of the Slavery Emancipation Bill, that free labour was better and cheaper than slave labour; how was it, then, that India could not enter into competition with any other country? The hon. and gallant gentleman then appealed to the opinions of Mr. Huskisson. No man entertained a greater respect for the name of Mr. Huskisson, no man had a warmer appreciation of the great services he had rendered to his country, than himself; but Mr. Huskisson was obliged during his long career often to make sacrifices to party requirements; and if an appeal were made to the opinions of Mr. Huskisson in 1825, it would be right that an appeal should also be made to his opinions towards the close of his career, when he was free from the trammels of party, and ventured to speak his real sentiments. What did he say towards the close? On the 25th of March, 1830, two years after his sliding scale had been in operation, and he had seen its defects, he said, "It was his unalterable conviction that we could not uphold the Corn Laws now in existence, together with the taxation, and increase the national prosperity, or preserve public contentment. That these laws could be repealed without affecting the landed interest, whilst the people would be relieved from their distress, he had never had any doubt whatever" (cheers). It was easy to complain of bad faith and of the betrayal of constituencies; but the first thing a public man had to do was, he must be right (hear), and if he found that he was not right, he ought at once to return to what reason and experience showed to be most conducive to the real interests of the country (hear). There was no question on which a public man had greater justification in exercising his right to change his opinion than the Corn Laws. It had never been a party question. Many had lived to learn and to benefit by experience. Every day new lights and new facts broke in upon them, and warranted any man in changing his opinion (hear, hear). Mr. Huskisson had changed his opinion. The noble lord the member for the city of London had manfully come forward and declared, "What I did 20 years ago, when I was a young and inexperienced man, was erroneous, and I have seen good reason to change my opinions." He (Mr. Ward) himself admitted that the first vote he had given was with the right honourable baronet, in favour of the Corn Laws, and he had only altered his views since he had brought his mind to bear, and since he had done what few, perhaps, did (loud cries of Oh, oh)—looked honestly and fairly into the question, divested from all class—he would not say interests, for they had not so much effect upon an honest mind—but class prejudices and parties, ties which were more difficult to shake off than considerations of personal interests. Men got hampered with party connections, or they had made some hasty and ill-considered speech at a county meeting, and they thought it only consistent with their honour to adhere to their opinions, till the country was united against the obstinate and blundering pursuit of a policy which was as ruinous to their own interests as it was to the interests of the country (loud cheers). In the course of this long debate he had certainly listened to some very able speeches. There was the speech of the hon. member for Northampton (Mr. Stafford O'Brien), which he had cheered, sitting on that (the Opposition) side of the house, quite as much as any one who had listened to it on the other side; he had never heard a speech which in point of delivery, feeling, and tone, and everything except the principle on which it was founded, he more admired. But strip it of its glitter, take away its appeals to the feeling, and it was but a petitio principii from the beginning to the end, a begging of the question. It proceeded on the assumption that the legislature could protect all, that all would be richer and better by their acting on that system of legislation, and that upon this foundation could be built up a fabric of kindly and social relations. And if it were granted that they could thus make the people richer and happier, and if they could thus benefit all without doing injury to any, they had hitherto been the most blundering of mortals, and they had disregarded a most sacred duty when, instead of attempting the grand object, they had preferred an irksome attendance in that house, and constant ameliorations. But how did the system work? They had partially tried it last year. It was admitted that if it were applied to any interest, it must be applied to all—that it must be universal. They had no right to apply it to wheat and to neglect barley (hear, hear); and so they were to go down to the smallest interests, which as being unable to protect themselves, had a greater claim to their special attention (hear, hear). They must go down to the smallest branches of the most unimportant manufactures. They had done an injustice in passing the tariff. If hon. members would recollect, they took off the duty from ture and clover seed, and yet when the hon. baronet the member for Essex (Sir J. Tyrell) met the farmers of Essex, they said, "What have we to do with this reduction? 99 farmers want tare-seed where there is only one who grows it." There was the question of protection confined to the agricultural interests, and that was the answer of the farmers. This great principle, then, was most defective—it was a great humbug (laughter); they could not carry it out. What said a noble lord, a friend of his—though he did not know whether he might still call him his friend, so great were the differences now between them, but one who had been his friend—Lord Dacre? He said that if they had a Free Trade in corn, they must have a Free Trade in cattle food. How could he have this without doing an injustice to some portion of the agricultural body, which grew food for cattle? If the measure which the hon. gentleman the member for Winchester (Mr. B. Escott) had originated had been carried, and if maize had been introduced into this country, there would as a consequence be a lessened demand for oats and barley, and the farmers of Scotland and of the fens of Lincolnshire would be the sufferers. All other interests might be benefited, but one would receive a great injury. The truth was, they could not work out the principle, and any attempt to do it would involve them in a labyrinth, from which they would not be able to extricate themselves, even if honourable members opposite had a Ministry of their own. Were they then to sacrifice to this principle the great interests connected with a large and cheap supply of food for this country? It was said, however, that we could not compete with foreigners, because we were so heavily taxed. This was a question which ought to be approached with peculiar delicacy by honourable gentlemen opposite (hear, hear, and cheers). For six years this had been constantly put forward as the reason for refusing a change; and he was now delighted to find, by the votes of another house, that a noble lord had taken up the subject, and had adopted almost the exact words of his own motion. A corresponding notice he had given in that house, and for three years successively he had endeavoured to procure an inquiry (hear). If the agricultural interests had any peculiar burdens they ought to be ashamed if they could not prove them; for three years he had given them the opportunity, which they had declined. He had begged them to nominate their own committee, he had told them that they might even have the hon. and gallant member for Lincoln (Colonel Sibthorp) as their chairman, if they so pleased (laughter); and that they might examine his witnesses, or he would examine theirs, so that they should arrive at a fair conclusion; but they had declined, and he believed that they had no case which they could prove before 12 intelligent men. They would have nothing to do with it ("hear, hear," from Sir J. Tyrell). The hon. baronet who cheered had not voted for it, and he well recollected the last time the subject was discussed the hon. baronet did him the honour of sleeping through the whole of his speech in the gallery (laughter). There was not the least blame in that,—it was the best use the hon. gentleman could make of his time (renewed laughter), for it was a very disagreeable subject; he did not know what to say, and so he thought it best to sleep through the whole of it (hear, hear). However, the party disagreed to the appointment of a committee, they shuffled about, and as a great party they did not do themselves justice, there was much talking and bragging out of the house, and very little in it; there never was a party that so shrunk from a fair inquiry ("hear, hear," from Sir J. Tyrell). He supposed by that cheer there was some mystery behind, and that by the hon. baronet the mystery would be cleared up. The hon. baronet had at Chelmsford cleared away many mysteries; he had cleared up the mystery of the breaking up of the Cabinet, and had told his friends how all the Ministers voted (laughter), and if he could clear up the mystery that night he trusted the opportunity would not be allowed to pass by. He had certainly assumed that as honourable gentlemen never had proved their case, or attempted it, so they never could (hear, hear). Were they, however, to shrink on grounds such as he had alluded to—grounds so contradictory and so inconsistent, from entertaining, and favourably entertaining, as he trusted the house would, and as the country had done, the very large propositions brought forward by her Majesty's Government? He would give to those propositions his most cordial support as the salvation of the agricultural interest, because he believed the worst thing that could be done would be to leave them to themselves; nothing could be more fatal than any attempt on their part to go on without leading strings. They never had known, they did not now know their own interests; they had made the strangest mistakes whenever they had been enabled by courtesy or circumstances to try their hand in the statute-book. He would not enter into details, but let them take the case of wool ("hear, hear," from Mr. W. Miles). Would the hon. member meet him on that ground? ("I will," from Mr. Miles.) Well, if the hon. member would meet him he would state the case of wool. He believed that the agricultural interest, by way of raising the price of English wool, were induced to lay a duty of 6d. per pound on foreign wool. Would the hon. member for Somerset deny that at the end of five years from that time the price of wool was lower in England than it had been for 200 years before? (Cheers.) Would he deny that when in 1825 the duty was lowered to 1d. the price instantly rose? Would the hon. member deny, that now the duty on foreign wool was taken off altogether, and during the last year an immense quantity of wool was imported, the price of wool here was as high as it had been for the last six or seven years? How would he meet that case? He would say that he was saved by Mr. Huskisson and the right hon. baronet from the consequences of his own legislation. The agricultural interest had committed an irreparable folly, but they found at last that they could not keep such a monopoly, and that their only remedy was to throw themselves into the arms of that monster whom they now denounced—Free Trade; and in proportion as the importation of wool increased so had the price of wool increased up to the present day. The hon. gentleman said they would destroy the trade of the country if the Corn Laws were altered. He assured the hon. member, that whatever might be the feelings of some hon. gentlemen in that house, tenants in many parts of the country entertained a very different opinion; they did not see those frightful contingencies from the relaxation of protection, provided the landlords met them in a fair spirit. They knew, on the contrary, that they could do nothing with safety until this question was settled, that settled it must be, and that that could be only in one way now; that the period of uncertainty and difficulty might be protracted for a few months, perhaps twelve-months longer, but that the system of the Corn Laws must come at last to a total abrogation of protective duty. They were anxious for it, always supposing that the tillage of land was put on a more rational basis than now—that the obsolete terms of the leases were expunged in future—that they were not forced to support the game of their landlords—that certainly was one of the peculiar burdens upon land (hear, hear)—and that they were to meet with more support for two or three years in the difficulties they expected and were prepared to encounter (hear, hear). He admitted it; but had the agricultural interest had no difficulties to encounter during the time they had had protection? Had they had no fluctuations of price? Had not the right hon. baronet spoken of the complaints of low prices, and of the ruinous consequences to the tenants, in the years 1832 and 1835? Was not the price of wheat in 1839 only 42s., and that under a law, the law of 1815, that promised a price of 80s. to the farmer? Were there not more fluctuations under that law than any man could conceive under a system of Free Trade? Then the hon. member said it was very hard that those whose families had been attached to the soil for two or three generations should be told they must quit it. He admitted that it was a hard thing for any man to separate himself from old habits and associations (hear, hear); but would they legislate for any other branch of the community upon that principle? Would they legislate for the shopkeeper on the principle that he wanted to keep his shop? There was but one way. They must legislate properly. And if, as he heard, there was too much land underfarmed, from want of capital, the best thing they could do for those unfortunate men who had taken leases of lands they had not the means of cultivating, and who could never hope for such a state of things as would enable them to extricate themselves from the difficulties of a business for which they had not sufficient capital, was to reduce their farms to smaller ones, and not to cheat them by the belief that anything that house could do could save them from the hopeless struggle. But, above all, let them look at the lowest classes, whose comforts in life, as an hon. member said on the previous evening, depended more than any other on the price of provisions, which absorbed three-fourths of their annual income. And could any one who heard the speech of the right hon. gentleman, the member for Wilts, the other night, when he said that on his own estates and in his own neighbourhood, whilst wheat was varying from 74s. to 40s. in the last ten years, the wages he paid during that time, and they all knew that the right hon. gentleman was a man of a kind and liberal heart (hear, hear), were but 8s. or 9s.,—could any one who heard that say that the labourer did not suffer the most from the system of protection? Talk of wages equalising themselves to the price of provisions! why, when they saw the labourer exposed to the keenest privations under the system of protection, could they turn round and invoke that house to continue those laws, not for the sake of the landlords, but for the sake of the tenants (hear, hear, hear)? He recollected a passage in the writings of a gentleman who wrote in language peculiarly expressive, in which he called all those fallacies in which public men were in the habit of indulging "political lies," and he said that never was there a lie yet which was not brought to nature's bank for payment (hear, hear). Why, that was the case here; they came at last to the lowest classes, and could press it no further. That was the point to which protection in this country had come. At the very moment of manufacturing prosperity there was also great distress—at the very moment of agricultural prosperity they found the same difficulties pressing on the agricultural districts. But there was one resource before them—let them take the path now opened to them—let them look to the great development of the interests of this country, and the consequent increase of employment, as the only thing that would permanently improve the situation of all classes of the population; and when they had ascertained what was the right course to pursue, without regard to small or selfish interests, he hoped that upon calm consideration that would have an influence on the great body of the English gentry now arrayed against these measures. It was a difficult task that they had undertaken; but never were the gentry of England in higher estimation than now, and he should be grieved to see them forfeit one particle of their position; but when a class, however numerous, however powerful, raised themselves against the interests of a whole community, depend upon it it could not long command either the respect or the kindly sympathy of the people (hear). It was a question involving their personal interests; he said that with reference to himself, for every interest he had was in land; but he gave his support to the policy of his friends behind him, because he saw it was the irresistible claim of justice (hear, hear). Already some of the brightest ornaments of that house had been driven from it by the honest admission of their convictions upon this subject. A noble lord opposite had told them that his conviction was one way, but his vote would be another (hear, hear). He felt sure, however, that the noble lord would free himself from the trammels that embarrassed him, and would be with them (hear, hear, and a laugh). Could they honestly maintain a law which, as he thought, had been based upon false principles, upon grounds which they could not work out in detail when they came to try it, and which was utterly at variance with the just demands of the country? He did not believe that they could. The hon. member for Huntingdon had spoken of a compromise; he appeared to have in his mind some ministry which was to modify protection and adjust this question by some possible mode of regulating the tax on food. Perhaps the hon. member was himself to be a member of the Government (a laugh), but he assured the hon. member that, so far as the seuse of the country went, they thought that the only fault of this great scheme was, that it did not work out its principles far enough. There was no conceivable reason why the duty upon butter and cheese should be reduced one-half, and the duty upon corn taken off altogether; and as to any idea of a compromise, he could assure the hon. gentleman that every attempt would only serve to protract the struggle and involve all the interests connected with agriculture in inextricable confusion; that any arrangement would not be satisfactory to all parties, to landlords as well as tenants; and that they would lose the opportunity, which perhaps they might never have again, of admitting foreign corn without any check to the industry of the country; and he sincerely trusted that the majority with which the measures of the Government would be sanctioned in that house might be large enough to insure some such reception of them elsewhere, as he was certain they would meet with from the country.

Mr. MILES observed, that he was glad that this question was presented to the house in such a shape that there could be no mistake respecting it. Protection must be defended as applicable to every class of the community, or must, if withdrawn from one class, be withdrawn from every other. Last night Mr. Baring had talked of the expediency of a compromise. He had never been, he never should be, for such an arrangement. On the contrary, he thought that we must either have the present duties under the sliding scale, or else submit to the new duties proposed by Sir R. Peel, and to their abolition at the expiration of three years. He could not understand the principles on which that proposition rested, nor could he see why the policy which had been pursued for more than two centuries, and which had raised this country to greatness, should be set aside on no other ground than the experience of the last three years. The apprehension of impending famine had been alleged as a reason for this innovation; but he was rejoiced to have it in his power to dissipate all fears of a coming scarcity on the authority of returns made to the Central Agricultural Association from its provincial branches in 26 counties, if not more, of England and Wales. There was a sufficient stock of wheat in England for the consumption of its inhabitants, and the price of potatoes was at present falling in the London and country markets—a certain proof that the supply of them was not deficient. He then proceeded to reply to the statements of Sir R. Peel in his speech on the address at the commencement of the session, and also in his speech in proposing his present commercial code, and to controvert the returns which he had quoted respecting the consumption and price of flax, wool, meat, lard, and various other articles for the three years before and after the passing of the tariff of 1842. Even supposing the returns of Sir Robert Peel, and the conclusions derived from them to be correct, were they sufficient to justify him in throwing overboard all the industrial energies of the country, and in leaving them to compete by themselves under our heavy taxation with the untaxed energies of Germany and the United States? After contending at great length for the negative of that proposition, and after reading a large quantity of statistical information in support of his arguments, he proceeded to show, that it was the interest of the country to foster its home trade in preference to its foreign; whereas Sir R. Peel was upholding the foreign trade at the expense of the immense mass of capital thrown into the home market by the great consumers and little savers of the country. Our recent prosperity had not been occasioned by the relaxation of duties made by the tariff of 1842 so much as by the impetus given to the home trade by the formation of railroads; and he therefore cautioned the house against acceding rashly to any proposition for interfering with the march of our native industry. Though he did not approve either of the plan proposed by Sir Robert Peel or of that proposed by Lord John Russell, he must say, that if he were compelled to accept one or the other, he should prefer that of Lord John Russell to that of Sir R. Peel, as the suffering which Lord John admitted must accompany the transition from the present Corn Laws to a Free Trade in corn, would, in his opinion, be less under the latter than the former plan. After giving his reasons for that opinion, he noticed with some indignation the advice which Mr. S. Herbert had offered a few nights ago to the landed interest, when he said that it was time for the country gentlemen to lay aside their claptags, and not to propagate alarms founded on delusion. In order to show that the alarm was not unfounded, that we should be inundated with foreign corn in case of the repeal of the Corn Laws, he read a description of the immense agricultural resources of the United States in the extensive valleys and boundless prairies of the Mississippi, and of Russia in her northern and southern provinces, amid the roars of the house, when he came to the exaggerated accounts of the fertility of Tamboff, once so unfortunately quoted by Lord Stanley. As soon as our markets should be thrown open to the world, those fertile lands would be tilled, and our barren lands would go out of cultivation. He could not see any prospect more disheartening; and yet the agriculturist was told "to cultivate, to cultivate." Why should he cultivate, when, after his crop was grown, he would find the home market paralysed and closed against him by the foreign corn thrown into it free from duty? He concluded a denunciation of great length and violence against the proposed measure by a declaration of his fears that the time would soon arrive when the people of these islands would curse the day when first their Government was entrusted to a cautious and temporising Free Trade Minister.

Lord MARCH then moved the adjournment of the debate. A number of members were leaving the house under the idea that the motion would be agreed to, when Lord NORTHLAND rose, and speaking to the question of adjournment, said, that though his principles were unchanged, he should vote for the measure of the Government. He foresaw that this question must be settled; and, as that was the case, he would rather have it settled by Sir R. Peel, in whom he had confidence, than by Lord J. Russell, in whom he had none.

Mr. FERRAND wished to know what confidence the noble lord had in Sir R. Peel when he was dragged out of the Coal-hole to vote for him on a late occasion.

Lord NORTHLAND rose amid a tumult of laughter, but sat down again without uttering a word.

Col. T. WOOD, jun., expressed his intention of supporting the bill, as he considered it necessary to the commercial and manufacturing prosperity of the country that this question should be settled. He regretted the opposition which, acting upon party motives, he had given on a former occasion to the Free Trade measures of Lord J. Russell.

The debate was then again adjourned, after a protest from Mr. S. O'Brien against the public inconvenience which would accrue if the practice, now twice adopted, of speaking after the question of adjournment was moved should become a common usage.

ADJOURNED DEBATE—MONDAY.

On Monday the adjourned debate was commenced by

The Earl of MARCH, who expressed his astonishment at the sudden conversion of Lord Northland to the cause of Free Trade. Other members had taken a considerable time to alter their opinions, but Lord Northland's conversion was miraculously sudden; for in the course of the last month he had delivered himself of two speeches in that house, one against Free Trade and the other in favour of it. He could not say to what private cell the noble Lord had retired to complete his conversion. This he was sure of, that he had not been in the house, for all the argument had been on one side, and that in favour of protection. He lectured Mr. B. COCHRANE for his attack on the Duke of Richmond. It was true that the Duke of Richmond had been a member of Earl Grey's Administration, but that was no reason that he should be a Free Trader; for Earl Grey, its head, was an advocate for protection. He then proceeded to contend that the abolition of protection would be the utter ruin of the country; and that Mr. Sidney Herbert's plan to settle the question of the Corn Laws by throwing them altogether overboard was not the way to come to a satisfactory settlement of it. Mr. S. Herbert had favoured the house with the cogent reasons which had produced the change in his opinions. He should like to hear what Mr. Goulburn and Lord G. Somerset had to say in favour of this measure, which they once opposed, but which they now supported. After dwelling at some length on the inconsistency of Lord Lincoln, Mr. Gladstone, and other members of the Administration, who at the last general election had denounced a more moderate measure than the present as "the fugitive humping of a dying political faction," and who were now supporting a proposition for the total abolition of all protective duties, he concluded by declaring that he could not give his assent to a measure so detrimental as the present to all classes of the community.

Mr. M. GIBSON, though unwilling to delay, for a moment, the appointment of the committee, said he could not forego the opportunity of making a few observations on a question in which he had taken much interest, and which importantly affected the prosperity and comfort of his constituents. To one part of the speech of the noble lord who had just resumed his seat he gave a most cordial concurrence: he referred to the passage where he stated that if protection was not good for corn, it was not good for manufactures. He admitted that the noble lord and his friends had a perfect and indisputable right to claim at the hands of Parliament that if there were no legislative encouragement to the growth of corn, there ought to be no legislative encouragement to the progress of manufactures. Those with whom he acted had invariably, in their petitions and resolutions, enunciated one principle, and that was, the abolition of all protective duties, not only as applied to corn, but as affecting the manufactures in which they were engaged (hear, hear). He denied that the great portion of those who had been engaged in this Free Trade movement had been animated by any peculiar animosity against any peculiar protected class. Their object was the abolition of all protection, and in that respect he should be happy to go with the noble lord and his friends around him (hear). But after all, these were extrinsic topics. The immediate question before them was that of the Corn Laws. Anything that ministers might have said upon former occasions was but of small moment as compared to the question of whether it be right to abolish the Corn Law (hear). He was told that this Parliament was elected to maintain protection, and that it could not therefore deal with the question of protection. Why? He maintained that it was because protection was the main question submitted to the electors in 1841, that this Parliament was of all others the best fitted to decide upon that proposition (hear). To say that because certain gentlemen found it inconvenient to give particular votes, that, therefore the Parliament was incapable of deciding on a great national question, was a proposition which could not be maintained for a moment (hear, hear). If the question of protection had not been put forward it might with more plausibility be contended that this Parliament was not fitted to deal with it. He doubted, indeed, whether—if they were to appeal to the country—the electors would return a more respectable set of gentlemen than those he saw around him (hear, hear, and a laugh)—or men upon whom they could safely place greater reliance. The country certainly would not have a better guarantee for the fidelity of those it might return than it already possessed for the good faith of those whom it had already sent to Parliament (cheers). Why, what was the language of a gentleman now a candidate for the representation of Suffolk? He said he left himself open to vote on the corn and on all other questions as he should deem best for the interest of the country (hear, hear, hear). This was one of the new protectionist candidates. How did they know but that he might be open to argument—determined to examine carefully and decide conscientiously (cheers). But how did the case, as to the Parliament being elected to support the right honourable baronet and protection, really stand? Appeals had been made to constituencies on behalf of the right honourable baronet on the ground of his being favourable to Free Trade. It had been urged in manufacturing districts, that the right hon. gentleman and his party would and could do more for Free Trade than the noble lord and his friends on this side of the house. Indeed it was brought as a reproach against him (Mr. M. Gibson) that he belonged to a party incapable of advancing the cause of Free Trade so much as lay in the power of the right hon. baronet (hear, and a laugh). The supporters of Sir George Murray in Manchester took that course, and the same thing took place in various other manufacturing towns. The fact was this, gentlemen in the agricultural districts made a great mistake in taking "protection" for a party cry at the last election (hear, hear). And if there be any charge of deceiving and misleading persons out of this house, it rested on the representatives of the agricultural interest (hear, hear). They it was who induced the tenant farmers to believe that statesmen of reputation could be found who would undertake to all time the defence of agricultural monopoly; they allowed and encouraged the tenant farmers to believe that Parliament would maintain those laws, although they had received repeated cautions that such a course was inconsistent with the statements made by the leaders of Parliament in this house (hear, hear, hear). But honourable gentlemen persevered in telling the farmers that there would be legislation to increase the value of corn. They made that mistake, and they were now suffering the consequences. In point of fact, the position under which Government took office was this:—"The right honourable baronet had said, 'Call me in, and I will prescribe.' They had called him in; he had prescribed, and they were now labouring under the effect of the dose which he had given them (hear, hear, and a laugh). It was a searching dose—a drastic purge, no doubt; but hon. gentlemen must be prepared for those strong and searching medicines when we had a great national evil to deal with (hear, hear, hear). But it was wasting time to dwell on those questions of ministerial and personal consistency. He would, therefore, refer, with the view of replying, to some of those statistical statements which had been adduced, the other night by the honourable gentleman the member for Somersetshire, and which were said to constitute the great protection case. That honourable gentleman had informed the house that the British farmer was unable to compete with the American and Polish agriculturist, because he had certain expenses in the cultivation of the soil to bear, which did not oppress those foreign agriculturists, and the hon. gentleman went on to give an instance of a farm in which the four-course system of husbandry was carried on, three parts being arable, and the fourth devoted to pasture. He stated that the labour employed on that farm cost from 30s. to 35s., and that the local taxes amounted to 4s. or 4s. 6d. per acre—both taken together amounting to 37s. per acre. Then they were told that the average quantity grown was about four quarters per acre, by which amount were they to divide the 37s., they would get a product of a very little more than 9s. as the expenses of labour and local taxation on each quarter of wheat. Very well. This item of 9s. per quarter was the item which they complained of as constituting their disability to compete with foreigners (cries of no, no)? It must be. All other items were borne both by foreign and English farmers. They said it was not rent, rent was out of the question; they repelled the idea of legislating to raise rent (cheers). The burdens borne, then, were simply the 8s. for labour and the 1s. for local taxation per quarter. Was it not so (cheers)? Well, the right hon. baronet, in his scheme, by leaving a permanent duty of 1s. per quarter had clearly left them a protecting duty equal to the whole amount of their local taxation (cheers). Now, with regard to wages, he would ask them how much less than 8s. per quarter did labour cost in America (hear, hear)? Why, it was notorious that labour was much more expensive there than here. In America the labourer had nearly double the amount of wages. How, then, came it that this item of 9s. could be pleaded as a burden which disabled them from competing with the foreign agriculturists? How much less was the item for labour and local taxes than 9s. per quarter in the case of the foreign agriculturist? The difference was so small as to be less than any thing which could be assigned. Consider that the average freight of 8s. or 9s. per quarter from the United States more than covered all their expenses, labour and local taxation put together. Thus they were protected by the natural course of things to the full extent of the disability which they pleaded (cries of hear, hear). But he contended that the foreign corn trade had as much right to be favoured as the pursuit of growing it at home. Then there was another strange argument of the hon. member for Somersetshire, that the price of bread was raised by the inordinate profits of millers and bakers; but that plea was clearly inconsistent with the one used by the same hon. gentleman, that even supposing the price of bread to fall, wages would fall with it; if so, then it followed that bakers and millers in enhancing the price of bread did really no harm to the labouring man. The fact seemed, however, to be that the honourable gentleman wished for one law to keep down the profits of the bakers, and another to increase the profits of the farmers (cheers). He (Mr. M. Gibson) contended that such was not a case upon which the protectionists could come down to the house and claim restriction upon the foreign corn trade. But why was it that this extraordinary timidity existed on the subject of Corn Law repeal? If the Corn Laws be such an important element in the value of land, how was it that that value remained undisturbed now that these laws were about to be repealed (cheers)? The conduct of capitalists in dealing with a commodity with respect to which a great change was expected was the best of all guides as to the effect on the value of that commodity which that change would produce (hear, hear); and he believed that capitalists were as ready as ever to embark their money in land (hear, hear). If any change were impending which would prevent the tax collector from getting sufficient money to pay the dividends on funded stock, would consols maintain their price? There was no fall in landed securities (hear). He had been informed that in the county of Suffolk, since the period of the rumours of Corn Law repeal, no fewer than sixty-three farmers (and they had all been communicated with by a friend of his, whose tenants they were) had made agreements to renew their leases for long periods without one having asked for a reduction of rent (hear, hear). Twenty of the number stated that in the opinion of a farmer a repeal of the Corn Laws would not involve the necessity of a reduction in rent (hear, hear). What, then, was the meaning of the alarm he heard on all sides expressed? Did the protectionists wish to cripple the advance of manufactures? Were they jealous of the progress of trade (loud cries of "no, no")? He did not believe that they were; but their conduct would lead many to believe that they wished to raise themselves by depressing others (hear hear). He believed that that unworthy feeling did enter into many minds. He believed that there was a jealousy of the advance of the mercantile and trading community (no, no). Why, let them look to their social system. Had they not attached to the possession of land social advantages and estimation which they did not attach to trading and commercial pursuits (hear, hear)? Had it not been their system to make the possession of land the test of fitness for the administration of the national affairs—the test of fitness for admission into the other house? for, though he admitted that gentlemen who had acquired great wealth and power by commercial pursuits had been raised to the peerage, still they were not admitted to the upper legislative assembly until the possession of landed estate had rendered them in the estimation of the privileged classes fit to be trusted (hear). Was it not laid down, even on the passing of the Reform Bill, that one of the objects of the measure, so far as the distribution of the representation was concerned, was to give a predominant influence to the possessors of land? (Lord John Russell was understood to say, "No.") He contended, at any rate, that the possession of land gave the greatest advantages; that the landed gentry had a monopoly of the Cabinet, and the principal offices and emoluments of the State; that it was the boast of their leaders that they could make and unmake Ministries, and the party that had such power could help itself freely to all the advantages of the State. The honourable member for Shrewsbury told us, and told us truly, that our aristocracy was a territorial aristocracy. There was no doubt it was so, and if the Corn Laws were repealed tomorrow there would be but an increased competition for that property which conferred such immense boons on its possessors (hear, hear). If this change was long resisted, the inference was irresistible that the landed gentry perverted their legislative functions to serve their private and pecuniary interests (hear, hear). There is a portion of the question, said the honourable gentleman, to which I wish particularly to allude. As the Corn Laws are to be totally abolished, I wish to ask why the change should not now take place (hear, hear)? Why defer to a future day what justice requires, and what the emergencies of the country at the present moment especially call for? If there be any force of argument in the failure of the potato crop, and the deficiency of corn in the north of Europe—and that therefore it would be difficult to procure supplies of food for our population—if there be any force in that argument, it calls on the legislature seriously to consider whether the emergencies of the country do not require an immediate measure of relief, and not one that is to have effect at a future time (hear, hear). I, for one, think the agricultural interest would be benefited by an immediate rather than by a deferred repeal of this law. I believe that if you are to enter into competition with foreign agriculture you had better take your competitors by surprise than give them warning (hear, hear, and cheers). Our present course is inconsistent with the arguments on which it is said to be based. The present emergency is not an argument for doing something three years hence (hear, hear, from the protectionists); for, if you admit the evil, you should at once apply the remedy (hear, hear). The right hon. the Secretary at War said he was of opinion that the ports should have been opened two months ago. Well, then, the necessities of the country, as well as the interests of agriculture, urge the Government to take the step now at all events (cheers). You can never bring about a complete and pacific arrangement of the present question short of total and immediate abolition. While any part of the law is left on the statute-book you will have some agriculturists rallying round it in its defence. That will render necessary an army of observation on the other side (a laugh from the protectionists); and in this way the conflict you deprecate will be perpetuated. I am as anxious as any man that the agitation should be got rid of to-morrow (hear). So strong is the conviction out of doors, among those who support a repeal of the Corn Laws, that the question should be at once set at rest, that those who represent their opinions in this house will be bound to take its sense on this part of the question. The Corn Law question has found its way into this house in the face of unprecedented obstacles. It has found its way in the teeth of an adverse majority. It is here now, and it never would have been had it not been backed by the public opinion of the country (cheers). I believe that no course that any individual member can take can endanger the passing of this bill (cheers). If it be capable of being endangered by a motion here, the other house would throw it out. The measure has not been brought to its present position by politicians in this house; it will be carried, if at all, by the voice of the country; and unless it rest on that substantial basis it will fail (cheers, and a laugh from the protectionists). I do not wish any measure to be carried on any other ground. And let me tell the honourable gentlemen opposite they cannot have a better barometer of public opinion than the right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government (a laugh from the protectionists). Yes, if you want to know what the great mass of the people are thinking about, see what the right honourable gentleman is doing (cheers). He is moving with public opinion; he has measured and justly appreciated public opinion; and when you talk of confidence in public men, you should remember that the only confidence in statesmen worth having is that they will not set public opinion at defiance, or resist changes which inquiry has shown to be safe, and which are founded on a sound and true economy (cheers). Public confidence is not to be acquired by mere party manoeuvring. The great bulk of the community were every day becoming more practical. The great meetings held at different parts of the country have not been engaged in discussing the merits of particular party leaders. They have not said that some men are not better to administer public affairs than others; but the public of late years have not so much looked to the distinctions of Whig and Tory as to the prospect of carrying great practical measures of reform (hear). I do caution, from the bottom of my heart, the hon. gentlemen opposite against prolonging this conflict with the manufacturing and labouring classes. They have taken a position which they cannot defend with credit, and which they would be compelled to abandon with disgrace if they proceed further (cheers). Aye, and it may be with more than disgrace. Have a dissolution if you will (cheers from the protectionists). The only effect will be the postponement of this measure. I do not object to a dissolution on any other ground than that I think it behoves members who are now entrusted with the care of the national interests to deal with the present emergencies before an appeal is made to the people. I think we are not discharging our duties if we suffer any time to elapse before we provide for that awful deficiency which is staring us in the face, and from which the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department apprehends the most serious consequences (hear, hear). I once more call on you to consider that you have no right to lay down the conditions on which manufacturers and merchants shall carry on their trade. The merchants who import foreign corn should be as free from let or hindrance as you to cultivate your estates. I implore you not to press your antiquated feudal pretension that you are entitled to say on what condition the trade of the country should be carried on. I call upon you to be satisfied with the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of your own estates, and let trade and commerce flourish in freedom. (The hon. gentleman sat down amid loud cheers.)

Mr. HALSEY wished that all the extempore proselytes to Free Trade would make such a candid declaration of the reasons of their conversion as had been made by Lord Northland on a former evening, as it would be useful to the house, and still more useful to its constituents. After a passing attack upon the Anti-Corn-Law League for its proceeding in collecting large sums of money for the purpose of meddling with the registration and of tampering in elections, he proceeded to denounce the Government plan as a measure which supported Free Trade, and yet did not carry it out—which repudiated protection, and yet left it in force. The farmer was not allowed to cultivate tobacco, because it was necessary to protect the revenue, and also some colonial interests. Were the landowners to allow the ports to be thrown open, and then to be told that they must cultivate their farms with their hands tied behind them? Sir R. Peel proposed to reduce one-half the duty on foreign hops; and there was no reduction to be made to the same amount on the excise duty on English hops. He (Mr. Halsey) was the advocate of equal justice and protection to all classes. He wished to know, if the price of English wheat should fall, on what principle Sir Robert would settle the Tithes Commutation Act? Sir Robert had also said that the revenue would not be affected by the changes which he now proposed; but if he were disappointed in that calculation, would he make up the deficiency of the revenue by doubling the Property Tax, and by making it avowedly permanent?

Mr. DICKINSON considered that the proposal now made by the Government was just and right, and therefore he should support it. However the members of the Central Agricultural Association might complain of the proceedings of the Anti-Corn Law League, it was undeniable that they themselves acted on the very same principles; else what was meant by their interference in elections, and their dictation of pledges to county members? He then proceeded to explain the reasons which had induced him to moderate the views which he had formerly entertained on the subject of protection, and to support the measure of the Government. He was convinced that it would inflict no great loss either on the owners of landed property, or on those who were subordinate to them. He should, however, consider it as an improvement on the Government plan, if its adoption were made immediate.

Lord ALFRED CHURCHILL, in a brief speech, which was very imperfectly heard in the House, declared his intention of opposing the measure which had recently proceeded from the new lights of Sir R. Peel and his colleagues in the Ministry.

Sir W. CLAY lamented that this debate had partaken so much of a personal character. It had been called a one-sided debate; but if it were so, it was owing to the fact that the staple of the arguments on the other side had been the abuse of Sir R. Peel, and not the defence of a system of protective duties. The country gentlemen had absolutely overdone their case: they had proved too much for their own side; for when they showed that Sir R. Peel had broken up a noble party they convinced the public that he had discarded all merely personal interests, and that under the pressure of an overwhelming necessity, he had sought nothing else than the advantage of the country. He then proceeded to refute several statements in the speech of Mr. Miles on Friday night. That gentleman had declared himself the open foe of all future relaxation of protection. Might he ask Mr. Miles if he was prepared to condemn the past relaxations of it, and to retrace the steps which had been already taken towards Free Trade? If he would not abrogate past relaxation, with what show of reason did he call on the house to proceed no further in its present liberal and enlightened course? The cry of protection to native industry found no echo out of doors. He (Sir W. Clay) gave his entire approbation to the measure, which would be productive of no injury to the agricultural interest. If there was one interest deeply concerned in the abrogation of these laws, it was the agricultural interest, for that interest depended more than any other on the success of the whole community. It had nothing to fear from the competition of the agriculturists of the Baltic or the United States.

Mr. BUCK participated in the alarm and dismay which this unjust and unequalled measure had produced among his constituents. The annunciation of it had shaken all confidence in public men, and its baneful influence would extend not only to the agricultural, but also to all the trading and manufacturing classes of the country. To the working part of the population it would be eminently injurious; for whenever the price of wheat had been high pauperism had been low, and whenever the price had been low pauperism had been high. Having delivered himself of a passionate invective against Sir R. Peel for having deceived and deserted the Conservative Associations, which he had himself called into existence, and of a bitter attack upon the Anti-

Corn Law League, he concluded by declaring his intention to give a most decisive negative to this most rash and injurious measure.

Lord H. VANE explained the reasons why he was now prepared to give a vote in opposition to the policy which he had formerly followed on this question. Though he had always urged the reduction of duties on agricultural as well as on all other productions, he had never yet gone the length of advocating the total repeal of the Corn Laws. He believed that a low fixed duty would have been equally advantageous for all commercial purposes, and therefore regretted that it had been abandoned. The time for compromise had now unfortunately gone by; and the question was not to be settled now, except by the adoption of some such measure as that proposed by Sir R. Peel. He appealed to the country gentlemen in the house, and asked them whether it would not be advisable for them to withdraw their opposition to this measure, seeing they could not hope to resist it effectually, after the numerous conversions which had taken place.

Sir J. TYRRELL, after denouncing the Government scheme as a clap-net proposition, observed, that in speaking of it, it was impossible to avoid making personal reflections on Sir R. Peel, inasmuch as he always represented the Government in his own person, and scarcely permitted any of his colleagues in the Administration to speak. The present measure would not settle the question of protection; for not many moons would elapse before Lord John Russell would come forward with a motion for abrogating the discriminating duties on sugar; and if the present motion were carried, he did not see how that could be resisted. He amused the house by stating, that as Sir Robert had appealed to posterity for its judgment on his policy, the sooner posterity had an opportunity of judging on his merits the better. If the house should pass this measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and if the House of Lords should register that verdict, all ties between the upper and lower classes of society would be dissolved, and misery, ruin, and anarchy would ensue.

Mr. JAMES took pride to himself that on every occasion since he had been in Parliament he had voted in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws. On the first occasion, when it was brought forward by Henry Hunt, he had been one of the tellers, and there was only a minority of five in favour of it. Now he trusted that the majority would be counted by as many hundreds as there were formerly units in the minority.

Sir R. PEELE rose and said:—Two matters of great importance have occupied the attention of the house during this protracted debate: one, the manner in which a party should be conducted; and the other, the measures by which to meet the contingencies of a great public calamity shall be vindicated, and the principles by which the commercial character of a great empire shall for the future be governed. On the first point—the manner in which a party shall be conducted—by far the greater part of this debate has been expended. I don't undervalue its importance, but surely it is subordinate, in the eyes of the people of this country, to those two other questions to which I have referred—(loud cheers from the Opposition)—the precautions to be taken against a great danger, the principles by which your commercial policy should hereafter be governed (cheers again). On the party question I admit I have little defence to make (cheers from the protectionists). Yes, our measures are, I admit, the very worst measures that could be adopted for party measures (vehement opposition cheering). I make this admission at once; and further that it is unfortunate that the conduct of those measures (so far at least as the Corn Laws are concerned) should be committed to me. I admit, at once that it would be far preferable—even assuming that the question must be settled—that those should have the credit (if credit there be) of its settlement who have been its uniform and consistent advocates (protectionist cheers). That which prevented myself, and those who concurred with me, from committing it into other hands, was the firm conviction under which I laboured that a part of this empire was threatened with a great famine. I did firmly believe—I do firmly believe—that there is impending over you, and will come at no remote period, a calamity which all must admit and deplore; and while there was that danger, with no means of averting it, I did not consider it consistent with my duty to my Sovereign, or with my honour as a public man, to take an opportunity of evading the difficulty which I saw impending (loud cheers from both sides). While I entertained the hope of a concurrent and agreeing administration, I thought there was a prospect of bringing this question to a settlement. When compelled to abandon that hope—my sense of the coming evil remaining the same—I took the earliest opportunity (and I took it with the utmost satisfaction) of adopting the course which my sense of duty and of public honour required—namely, to tender my resignation to the Queen, leaving her Majesty full opportunity of consulting other advisers. I offered no opinion as to the choice of a successor. That is almost the only personal act of the Sovereign (hear, hear). It is for the Sovereign to determine in whom confidence ought to be placed (cries of hear, hear, from both sides). It was my duty to ascertain, in consequence of the request of the Queen, whether those of my colleagues who had dissented from me were either prepared themselves to form a government, or whether they were prepared to advise her Majesty (if they themselves were not able to form a government) as to the hands to which should be entrusted the formation of a cabinet on the principle of maintaining the existing Corn Laws. Those from whom I differed—who had not concurred with me either as to the full extent of the danger, or as to the policy of altering the existing law—did signify it as their opinion that it would not be for the public interests that they should form a government; nor would they advise her Majesty to resort to others for the formation of a government—I mean a government formed on the principle of maintaining the existing law. Her Majesty determined to call on the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) to undertake the duty of forming an administration. I was relieved from the responsibilities of office. The noble lord was sent for. My firm belief was that the noble lord would have been enabled to undertake the duty of forming a government, and that if he had so undertaken the formation of a government, he would have succeeded. Throughout a long course of opposition to the noble lord, I can never charge myself with having said a word disrespectful to him. We have sat opposite each other for many years; but nothing has ever occurred to lend to acrimonious feelings or to engender a spirit of hostility (cries of hear, hear, from Lord J. Russell). But I must say the noble lord disappointed me when he did not at once undertake the government on the principle of an abolition of the present Corn Laws (some cries of hear, from the Opposition). My impression was, the noble lord would have undertaken the government—my impression was, that I was merely in the capacity of a private member—my strong opinion was, that we had cause for apprehending great danger—my opinion also was, that in taking precautions against that danger, we must compel the necessity of a final settlement of the Corn-law question. I knew all the difficulties which any man would have to contend with who undertook the conduct of government. I knew the great dislocation which the frame of government had received in the breaking up of the administration of which I was the head; and I thought it would be unfair and dishonourable, under the impression that that noble lord would be minister, not to take those steps which must diminish his embarrassments (cheers from both sides). Sir, I have not a word of complaint to make against the noble lord for the statement which he the other night submitted. The explanations I gave related chiefly to the part which I took while I remained in the government. The noble lord undertook to state what passed when that period expired. The noble lord read a letter, a copy of which he said was in his possession, and the general statement of its contents which the noble lord gave was perfectly fair and honest. But the noble lord said there were other letters not in his possession. As reference has been made to those other letters—to one at least of primary importance—I feel it my duty, in order to show I was sincere in saying that I deprecated a settlement of this question being committed to my hands—I think it right for my vindication in that respect to state to the house the course I pursued (loud cries of hear, hear, from both sides). I relinquished office on the 6th December, 1845. I knew then of course that those of my colleagues who differed from me declined to form an administration in accordance with those views, and could not advise the formation of such a government. I was aware too that the noble lord, though not at my suggestion, had been sent for by her Majesty. On the 8th of December, considering myself to be in a private capacity, anxious to facilitate the adjustment of this question—my opinion having been given in the Cabinet that it must be entertained—I made the communication to her Majesty, which her Majesty I believe made known to the noble lord. The noble lord had not a copy of this letter, or I have no doubt he would have read it. I wrote it from myself, and in a private capacity, on the 8th of December, two days after I quitted office, and when I heard the noble lord was accepted as minister:

“Whitehall, Dec. 8.

“Sir Robert Peel presents his humble duty to your Majesty, and, influenced by no other motive than the desire to contribute if possible to the relief of your Majesty from embarrassment, and to the protection of the public interests from injury, is induced to make to your Majesty this confidential communication explanatory of Sir R. Peel's position and intentions with regard to the great question which is now agitating the public mind.

“Your Majesty can, if you think fit, make this communication known to the Minister who, as successor to Sir R. Peel, may be honoured by your Majesty's confidence.

“On the 1st of November last Sir R. Peel advised his colleagues, on account of the alarming accounts from Ireland, and many districts in this country, as to the failure of the potato crop from disease, and for the purpose of guarding against contingencies, which in his opinion were not improbable, humbly to recommend to your Majesty that the duties on the import of foreign grain should be suspended for a limited period, either by order in council or by legislative enactment; Parliament in either case being summoned without delay.

“Sir Robert Peel foresaw that this suspension, fully justified by the tenor of the report to which he has referred, would compel, during the interval of suspension, the reconsideration of the Corn Laws.

“If the opinions of his colleagues had then been in concurrence with his own, he was fully prepared to take the responsibility of suspension, and of the necessary consequence of suspension, a comprehensive review of the laws imposing restrictions on the import of foreign grain and other articles of food, with a view to their gradual diminution and ultimate removal.

“He was disposed to recommend that any new laws to be enacted should contain within themselves the principle of gradual and ultimate removal.

“Sir Robert Peel is prepared to support, in a private capacity, measures which may be in general conformity with those which he advised as a Minister.

“It would be unbecoming in Sir Robert Peel to make any reference to the details of such measures.

“Your Majesty has been good enough to inform Sir Robert Peel that it is your intention to propose to Lord John Russell to undertake the formation of a Government.

“The principle on which Sir Robert was prepared to recommend the reconsideration of the laws affecting the import of the main articles of food, was in general accordance with that referred to in the concluding paragraph of Lord John Russell's letter to the electors of the city of London.

“Sir Robert Peel wished to accompany the removal of restriction on the admission of such articles with relief to the land from such charges as are unduly onerous, and with such other provisions as, in the terms of Lord John Russell's letter, 'caution and even scrupulous forbearance may suggest.'

“Sir Robert Peel will support measures founded on that general principle, and will exercise any influence he may possess to promote their success.”

That was the assurance I conveyed to her Majesty of my perfect readiness to support, if proposed by others, those measures which I myself have now introduced. I could not but foresee that in addition to all the other difficulties which the noble lord or any other Minister would have to contend with, he would have accepted office at an unfortunate moment. Up to the present time there has been a prosperous revenue, but a limited expenditure. There had been hitherto a large surplus; and I thought the Minister succeeding me might have been deterred from accepting office by the increased expenditure that was necessary, and because an unfavourable contrast might thus be drawn between his financial policy and that of his predecessors. I added, therefore, to those assurances of support I have alluded to, this further one. It is important for the house to attend to it:—“Sir Robert Peel feels it to be his duty to add that, should your Majesty's future advisers, and after consideration of the heavy demands made upon the army of the country for colonial service, of our relations with the United States, and of the bearing which steam navigation may have upon maritime warfare and the defence of the country, deem it advisable to propose an addition to the army and increased naval and military estimates, Sir Robert Peel will support the proposal—will do all that he can to prevent it from being considered as indicative of hostile or altered feelings towards

France, and will assume, for the increase in question, any degree of responsibility, present or retrospective, which can fairly attach to him" (loud cheers). Now, sir, when it is charged on me that I am robbing others of what is justly their due, I hope the explanation of the course I have taken when acting under the first persuasion that the adjustment of this question would have been committed to others—I hope the explanation I have now given will tend to prove that I am not desirous of robbing others of the credit which is their due, or of trying to embarrass them in the course which I thought they should have adopted (loud cheers from both sides). Sir, there were further communications made, and I was aware, in the course of them, that it was desired to put me in possession of the particular mode in which it was determined to settle this question. I thought it better to decline such a communication of the noble lord's measures, for I felt that any apparent concert between the noble lord and myself would have a tendency to endanger rather than promote the adjustment of this question, and I therefore declined to receive the communication of those details. But I think the noble lord must have been satisfied that, though I declined to concert measures with him, yet it was my intention to give the noble lord in the adjustment of this question according to his views of public policy, that same cordial support which it is his boast that he now intends to give me (prolonged cheering from the Opposition). Sir, I believe that must have been the impression of the noble lord, because, after the communication with me, the noble lord undertook the formation of a Government; and I am sure that the noble lord must feel that it was no act of mine that caused the failure. I was in no way whatever concerned with the reasons which induced the noble lord finally to abandon that attempt (hear, hear, from Lord John Russell). So much, therefore, as to the course I pursued with reference to those opposite. I never made an inquiry as to those who constituted the new Government. I had no personal objection of any kind. My belief was, that this question ought to be adjusted, and I was prepared to facilitate its adjustment by my vote, and by the exercise of whatever influence I possessed (hear, and Opposition cheers). Now, then, with respect to the course I have pursued with regard to those who have so long given me their support, I admit to them it was but natural they should withhold from me their confidence. I admit that the course I am pursuing is different from the established principles on which party should be conducted: but I do ask them whether it was probable I should sacrifice their favourable opinion and support, unless I was influenced by considerations of public duty; unless I did believe it was for the public interest that I should propose the measures which have caused the estrangement between us (cheers)? Notwithstanding what has passed in this debate—notwithstanding the asperity with which some may have spoken of me, I will do them the justice they deserve. No person could have held the position I have done so long without being intimately acquainted with the motives of his party. I must know what are the objects of those who gave me their support; and I will say, after the forfeiture of their confidence, that I don't believe (speaking generally of the great body) that there ever existed a party that was influenced by more honourable and disinterested feelings. I must know the fact; and I will give them the credit they deserve (cheers and hear). But this I must say, that be the consequences what they may, you cannot rob me of the conviction that the advice which I have given is advice consistent with all the obligations which party can impose. I know how easy it would be to conciliate their temporary support. The way would be to underrate the danger, to invite a continued combination for the maintenance of the existing law—to talk about hoisting the flag of "protection to native industry"—to have insisted that agricultural protection should be maintained in all its integrity. Such a course would have conciliated a temporary confidence. But the month of May will not have arrived without demonstrating that I should have abandoned my duty towards my country, towards my Sovereign, and towards my party, if I had so acted (loud and long continued cheers from the Opposition). I had, and I have, the firm persuasion that in the present temper of the public mind—in the state of the public feeling with respect to the Corn Laws—that state of public feeling and opinion, independent of all casual and adventitious circumstances, making a defence of this law difficult enough—I have the firm persuasion that if that calamity, which I foresee in Ireland, should arise, and the battle has to be fought on the question of maintaining the present Corn Law, unless the duty exceeds 17s. a quarter on foreign wheat, a degree of odium would then have attached to the landed interest which would have been overwhelming in its effects (loud cheers from the Opposition). And what would have been the situation of my right honourable friend the Secretary for the Home Department, charged as he is with the responsibility of maintaining the public peace, and whose duty it was to take measures for rescuing millions from the calamity of famine (hear, hear)? What were the facts brought daily under our notice? We know it as a fact that in one part of the empire four millions of the Queen's subjects depended on one article of food (hear, hear). It was difficult to say what was the extent of danger, what had been the progress of the disease, and what would be the amount of the deficiency in the supply of this article; but surely you should make allowances for those who were charged with the duty of providing for the public safety; and, in the case of this failure, we must be aware that within three or four months this disease would be followed with traces of famine; and under these circumstances was it not our duty to the country, as well as to the party, not to neglect the taking due precautions (hear, hear). I wish that my anticipations may not be fulfilled; but it is of the last moment, it is absolutely necessary, before coming to a final decision on this question, that you should understand the Irish question (hear, hear). I cannot consent to confess that I entertain any feelings of regret at the course which I then took; so far from it, that I declare to the house that that day in my political life on which I look with most satisfaction and pride, was that on which I was ready and prepared to take upon myself the responsibility of issuing an Order in Council for the opening the ports, and trusting to you for an act of indemnity (loud cheers). My primary and particular object was to increase the supply of food in the country, and thus make provision against famine, and there might also have been other collateral advantages which would follow; but I thought, I say, that the best course to have taken was to have opened the ports (hear, hear). Suppose that my anticipations proved incorrect, and that I had uttered a false estimate of the danger which threatened, I believed that even then the generosity of Parliament would have made allowance for the motives that had actuated me, and would have granted an indemnity (cheers), even if my anticipations were not fulfilled by the result. But what are the facts? There was during the latter part of December and the beginning of January said to be something like a lull—a suspension of the potato disease. I never shared in the prophetic feeling as to the ample supply of food, and that the potato disease had vanished, after the opinions on the subject which I had received from most able men of science, who had been directed by the Government to investigate the matter. But I ask, what were the facts of the case? I hold in my hand some papers which will throw a light upon this subject. I shall read them, not so much for a vindication of the Government, but, as I conceive, that it is not right that I should leave the house ignorant of the facts of the case. I know the measure before the house is not directly for opening the ports; but it is almost equivalent to that step, for its object is the immediate admission of maize and other descriptions of grain free of duty, and the reduction of the duty on wheat to 4s. the quarter. Some persons, I know, say that it would be better at once to reduce the duty to nothing (hear, hear, hear). But still this is a virtual removal of the duty on all descriptions of corn, with the exception of wheat. Before, then, you finally decide on rejecting this measure, I ask you to look well to the circumstances of the case. You affect to doubt the accuracy of these official reports, but this can only be on the assumption that official men would deceive in such documents. But I will not depend on statements from official men, but I will refer to letters which have been received from Ireland by the two last mails, and the accuracy of which, I think, will not be doubted when I state from whence they come. The name of Sir David Roche is known to many members of this house, for he was some time member for the city of Limerick, and I think, after I have read the letter from that gentleman which I hold in my hand, few honourable members will say that the apprehensions of famine are greatly exaggerated. This day this letter has been received by the Government from the city of Limerick, from Sir David Roche. He says:—"No person was more disposed than I was to look with hope to that part of the potato crop that appeared sound before Christmas. I thought it was quite safe and certain to keep in the usual way, and in my answer to the Lord Lieutenant's circular, I stated that hope with great confidence, adding that the crop was so large the sound portion would nearly feed the people." (This, then, is a disinterested authority.) "But grieve to say, that every day convinces me of the error I was under; the potatoes that were apparently sound then, had more or less the disease in an incipient state, and the greater part is now obliged to be given to pigs and cattle, to save the owners from total loss. The Catholic clergy of several parishes have made this painful communication to me: my own experience as a landed proprietor and practical farmer, holding in my possession large arable farms in three different parts of this county, and also in the county Clare, entirely corresponds with their statements. I don't think by the 1st of May next, that out of one hundred acres of potatoes on my land, sound seed will be left for next year (hear, hear). If the case is so bad with me, and it is nearly the same in the four districts I allude to, how much worse must it be with the poor, who have not the convenience and aid that large farming establishments, with substantial buildings, can command? In short, as one rides through the country rotten potatoes are to be seen everywhere in large quantities by the side of the roads—pits, lately turned, in most cases much smaller than the heaps of rotten potatoes alongside them, and those in the pits are certain, if not quickly consumed, to share in the general decay (hear, hear, hear). Such, sir, is the state I may say of the entire country. No doubt for six or seven weeks, while the remains of the potato last, destitution will not be general; but I pray you, sir, look to it in time" (hear, hear, hear). Is it not right that we should look to this state of things in time (hear, hear)? This is the account from Limerick. I now come to Queen's County, the letter from which was received yesterday. It is from the inspector of police in that county, who states that in his visit to the locality which he describes, he was accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Emerson, the clergyman of the parish, and the place was the property of Mr. Fotheringdon. The writer says:

"Queen's County, Stradbally, February 11, 1846.
"With reference to the potato disease I beg to state that I was requested by Sir Edward Walsh and Sir Antony Weldon, two magistrates of this district, to make a more searching inquiry into the state of the potatoes in the neighbourhood of the collieries than had hitherto been made. The instructions were to make the examination by properties, and ruled forms were supplied by Sir A. Weldon, with such headings as he considered applicable to the case.

On Monday morning, the 9th, I proceeded to Wolf hill, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Emerson, the clergyman of the parish, and commenced with the property of Mr. Hovenden. Mr. Hovenden himself being with us, we examined every house on the property, took down the number of each family, the quantity of potatoes planted, and the quality (from actual inspection) now remaining on hand, with the quantity of oats and other grain now in the possession of the family. On Tuesday we went over the property of Sir Charles Coote, adjoining Mr. Hovenden's, and also over Mr. Carter's, and, so far as time would admit, examined a few families on the property of Mrs. Kavanagh, of Gracefield. Our inquiries extended to about 190 families altogether, and enabled me with the most perfect accuracy to state the frightful extent to which the destruction of the potato crop has proceeded in that part of the country. Many families whom we visited, and who had planted sufficient for their ordinary wants, including the seed necessary for the ensuing season, have not had a potato of any kind for the last month." (Observe, this is in the month of February, five months at least before there can be any supply from the natural bounty of Providence (hear, hear). "Others have lost nearly all; and the few that still remain are totally unfit for human food. In every instance where we saw potatoes in pits in the fields we had them examined, and, with scarcely an exception, we found them to be a mass of putrefaction, perfectly disgusting, even to look at. We examined a few houses on the property of Sir Thomas Esmonde, where the land is of much better quality, but the result was in every case the same. There are literally no potatoes remaining in that part of the country.

"I understand the magistrates intend to meet on an early day, and make some representation through the lieutenant of the county on the above subject.

"W. W. HEMSWORTH, Sub-Inspector, 1st Rate."
Now, these were the letters received within the last two days. I now shall refer to a report on this subject from the lord-lieutenant of Waterford, Lord Stuart de Decies, dated the 10th of February; a person whose statements I am sure will carry with them full authority in this house

(hear, hear). The report is directed to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and in it I find it stated:—"His Excellency will find in these statements an announcement of the alarming fact that in two districts alone of the union in question there are, even at this early period of the year, no less than 300 persons whose stores of provisions are upon the point of becoming exhausted. In the meanwhile the rot is represented as making daily progress amongst the potatoes, which until lately it was hoped might have been preserved in a state of partial soundness for some time longer, and there is every reason, therefore, to anticipate that the distress now prevailing in certain localities will very speedily cause its pressure to be felt by the labouring classes throughout the union. With this prospect in view, the probability is that a rise in the price of all kinds of grain may be expected to take place in the ensuing spring and summer months, although foreign supplies were to be admitted immediately, duty free, and that the facilities for providing food for the people in exchange for their labour be removed beyond the means which landed proprietors have at the present moment within their reach for this purpose. It is these circumstances that I would venture respectfully to submit, as far as the interests of the county of Waterford are involved, that much good might be effected in keeping down prices by the establishment of Government corn stores, from which grain might be purchased at first cost price in such towns as Youghal, Dungannon, Waterford, Carrick, Clonmel, and, perhaps, Lismore. In all but the last-mentioned of these towns there is an adequate military force for the protection of such granaries, if established, and no part of the country would then be beyond twelve or fourteen miles distance from a depot, whence food on moderate terms might be drawn to those localities which stood in need of a supply" (hear). The next statement I shall read is from Kerry, and is dated the 9th inst. It is from a gentleman whose statement is entitled to the highest credit. I allude to Mr. Thomas Dillon. He says:—"I regret to have to report, for the information of Government, that serious ravages have been made latterly on the potatoes by the disease which, for the last two months, was supposed at least not to be progressive. Having gone round my district within the last ten days, I have had opportunities not only of hearing, but of witnessing, the destruction which has been committed, and which is gaining ground so rapidly, contrary to the hopes which have been for some time cherished, as to excite the utmost alarm among all classes, and for my own part I feel almost confounded at the difficulty that must exist in procuring a sufficiency of good seed for the ensuing crop" (hear). The house is aware that there was for some time past sitting in Dublin a commission, one of the objects of which was to inquire as to the extent to which the potato crop had failed. The commissioners' report refers to a period when the disease had re-appeared, and it embraces returns from every part of Ireland. Indeed, returns have been furnished from every electoral district in Ireland, with the exception of 99, and from these returns have not been sent. The commissioners in their report state that in four electoral districts the disease has affected nine-tenths of the whole crop; in 93 districts it has affected between seven-tenths and eight-tenths of the whole crop; in 125 districts it has affected seven-tenths of the crop; in 160 it has affected six-tenths of the crop; in 566 electoral districts nearly half of the whole crop has been destroyed; and in 582 districts nearly four-tenths of the whole crop has been entirely destroyed (loud cries of hear, hear). I have just stated the request made to us, and we had already acted upon the principle in time, by taking steps to establish stores of corn, where it could be sold at low prices, or giving it in return for labour; to get an adequate supply of seed for potatoes from foreign countries for the ensuing year, is now next to impossible (cries of hear, hear). One-eighth of the whole crop is required for seed, each acre requiring from three-quarters of a ton to a ton of potatoes for seed (cries of hear). Suppose that we endeavoured to buy 10,000 tons of potatoes from ports in those parts of Europe where there are potatoes? I am satisfied that the attempt would be almost impossible. We can only make provision for seed for future years by saving from the portion of potatoes which have been preserved. When the immediate pressure of famine has been got rid of by a supply of food, I fear that due caution will not be taken for a provision for future years; the Government, therefore, must take upon itself to do this, and see what best steps can be taken for such provision of seed. Then the question arises, what should be done? Might not much be done by inducing parties to exchange the potatoes that are yet preserved for some other article of food? I ask, if, instead of taking the course which we have thought it our duty to take, we had let the matter stand over, and come down to the house in May, and asked for larger grants of the public money for the relief of the destitute, and told the clergy, and the Catholic clergy, that they might supply themselves with food for the relief of the people at the Government expense, suppose that at the time we asked for a vote of 200,000l. or 300,000l. for the purpose of charity, we determined to adhere to the present Corn Laws—(hear, hear)—would it, I ask, be tolerated, that at the same time we came down to the house for such a purpose that we were retaining the duty of 17s. on corn (loud cheers). Do honourable gentlemen recollect the returns which I just read as to the state of the potato crop, namely, that in several hundred electoral districts seven-tenths of the crop had been destroyed, and that in nearly 600 of those districts more than half of the potatoes had completely gone, and that in some eight-tenths of the produce had been destroyed (hear, hear). Supposing in such a state of things a famine should ensue, do you believe that it is, for the credit or honour of the landed aristocracy, that they should throw on the Government the responsibility of providing a remedy to meet this threatening state of things, and at the same time declaring that not a letter of the Corn Laws should be altered (cheers)? Would it be an act of fidelity to the landed interest to assent to the adoption of such a course (hear, hear)? No; I believe that if such a proceeding had been adopted you would have a perfect right to charge me with that treachery which you now impute to me, because I have thought it necessary to make provision for such a moment of pressure (hear, hear). The pressure in Holland and Belgium is not half so severe as it is in parts of this empire, but the Governments in these two countries took immediate steps to meet the threatening danger (hear, hear). In Belgium the executive Government took upon itself the responsibility of opening the ports to the free admission of all descriptions of grain and other agricultural produce. In Holland the same course was followed, and the ports were opened for the free admission of all descriptions of food (hear, hear). Belgium is an agricultural country, and on the meeting of the Parliament there the Government asked for an indemnity from the Chambers, and this was granted to the Government, not only without a discontented voice, but with acclamation (cheering). But in the same circumstances, what course would be taken by the Parliament of England, by a Parliament deeply interested in the welfare of agriculture (hear, hear)? There have been times before the present when there have been apprehensions of famine. What remedy did the legislature apply in such cases? Why that which any man of common sagacity would suggest—it was the remedy resorted to in every instance—the removal, for a time, of the duty on corn (loud cheering from both sides of the house). I rejoice at the cheer with which this proposition has been assented to (hear, hear, and laughter). I apprehend it was an unanimous assent (no, no, from some agricultural members). But at any rate it was a very general assent (hear, hear). My proposition is, that at a period of impending famine the proper course to take is to encourage the free importation of food (cheers). The proposition is that the existing duty on corn should cease, so that it might be admitted free (hear, hear). Then, if so, and you agree to this, I ask you at once to agree to expedite this bill (cheers and laughter), or move as an amendment that the duties on all articles of provision shall forthwith be suspended (loud cheers). I am not arguing now as to what we should do after the suspension, I am only trying to convince you that it would be unfair and treacherous on my part to the landed interest if, convinced as I am of the serious nature of the Irish case, I proceeded to talk of hoisting the flag of protection (laughter)—of rousing the British lion (renewed laughter, and hear, hear)—or of sticking to the true blue colour (hear, hear), and of adhering to the Corn Laws in all their integrity (loud cheers and laughter). I am trying to convince you that the adoption of such a course would not be consistent with the public interest, or with the credit of the landed proprietors of this country (renewed cheers). But it may be said, suspend these laws until next session. I rejoice to have the support of three-fourths of those opposed to me on this measure, as to the admission of maize, or rice, or oats; but, with this admission, are you prepared to maintain that the duty on wheat should be kept up to 17s. (hear, hear)? At all periods of our history, when scarcity was apprehended, the natural precaution has been the admission of foreign corn without restriction. In 1765 there was an apprehension of famine. The Parliament was assembled, and their first act was—unwisely as I think—to prohibit all exportation of corn; their second, to permit its admission duty free (hear, hear). In 1767, likewise under similar circumstances, the first act of Parliament on its sitting, was to remove all duty on corn. In the year 1791 the Parliament altered the Corn Law, and established a new system. In 1793, when there was an apprehension of scarcity, notwithstanding the establishment of the new system of Corn Laws, the first proceeding of Parliament was to remove all acts imposing any duty on the importation of foreign corn (hear, hear). In 1795, when there were apprehensions, mark—not of famine, as now—but of scarcity—the same course was adopted; in 1796 the same remedy was taken; and in 1798 Parliament adopted a similar course (hear, hear). When, I say, then, what all those Parliaments had done, under circumstances where the danger they apprehended was greatly less than at present, would it have been wise or prudent in me to have refused to follow their example, and to have adopted a different course (cheers)? I believe, sir, had I done so, and had I refused to follow that course, that I should have brought not only this Government but this Parliament into the greatest discredit (loud cheers), and have acted in such a manner as, instead of maintaining the existing Corn Laws, would have made a defence of them a political impossibility (loud cheers). Seeing, then, what had been done in neighbouring countries on such occasions, and looking back on the course which had been adopted in your own Parliament at a time, not when corn was at 80s. or 100s. (hear, hear), but under 60s. a quarter, I believed that the best remedy which could be devised for the apprehended evil was to open the ports (loud cheers). Don't answer me by saying that the Corn Laws in those days were not as they are now, or by saying that there was no sliding scale then. I say the fact is exactly the reverse (hear, hear). Foreign corn was admitted at a duty of 6d. as long as it was under 60s.; but Parliament interfered and gave a guarantee that the high duty should not attach, in case of importation, below that price up to 54s. To prevent the consequences of unequal rise and fall, Parliament gave a guarantee to the importer that his corn should be admitted free for six months. With all those cases of which I have spoken before us, would it have been creditable to Parliament to have refused to have acted as their predecessors had done? I think not. It was a subject of consideration with my colleagues; and looking at all the circumstances of the case, we advised the total and immediate suspension of the Corn Laws by an Order in Council (loud cheers). That was the course we would then have pursued: but now what shall be done (hear, hear, hear)? The law is not suspended—the Parliament is sitting. It would not be respectful nor would it be constitutional, that the executive should act whilst Parliament was sitting, without consulting it, and it is now impossible by an order in council to do that which might have been done before (hear, hear). It is not in the province of the Crown to do that which I now invite you to do. It may be quite true that the most fitting time for following the course I advised has passed away, and that the 1st of November would have been a better period for opening the ports than the 16th of Feb.; but admitting that to be true, I tell you at the same time that the necessity which existed for the adoption of this measure on the 1st of November, is, on February 16, only increased (loud cheers). It is true that the supply might have been more ample, and the area of our supply more extended, but you have six months yet to come. Let some one make some other proposal, but, I say, you must choose between the alternatives—either maintain the existing Corn Laws, or make some proposal for increasing the facilities of procuring food by the importation of foreign corn. If it be admitted that, on account of temporary and unforeseen necessity, the present system should be relaxed, all reason is in favour of the suspension of the existing law (hear, hear). Let us assume that the law had been suspended, and I have to consider the second question, from which I assure the house I should not shrink. After the suspension of the existing law eight months would elapse—what would you propose to do with the present Corn Laws? This is a question which I advise the house to consider. My conviction is as strong as it possibly can be, that it would be as utterly impossible, after establishing freedom of trade in this country for eight months, and permitting the free importation of grain for that period, at the end of it to permit the existing Corn Laws to come into operation, as it would be impolitic and impracticable (cheers). I know it will be said that we might have had a temporary suspension, at the end of which the law might be renewed by its own vitality, and that honourable members would say, "Give us a temporary suspension of the law, and give us a guarantee at the end of the eight months that it shall be renewed." Why, sir, it was impossible to advise the adoption of such a course, I think it would be an utter misapprehension of the state of public opinion to suppose it possible that after this country had tasted the fruits of freedom of importation, without any restriction whatever, any power could have renewed the principle of protection in the present laws (loud cheers). It might be asked—"What, must you refuse the admission of maize?" The consideration of that question had dwelt on the minds of my colleagues and of myself, and we were of opinion that we might have admitted maize, and kept up the protection on all other kinds of grain; but then I said, "Well, don't disregard public feelings in matters of this kind (cheers). Don't let us overbear the deliberate convictions of the country, for depend upon it that in questions affecting food public feeling is not safely disregarded" (loud cheers). By the present Corn Laws the duty on maize varies with the duty on corn. It was most desirable to admit maize free of duty, for it appears that as the price of barley was falling the duty was increasing, and that without the slightest natural connection between maize and barley, the duty on maize was in consequence increasing also (hear, hear). Remember that in the course of last session notice was given of a motion that maize should be imported duty free, because it was desirable that it should be brought into this country for the feeding of cattle (loud cries of hear, hear). Do you think it possible to devise a new Corn Law, the leading principle of which shall be this—maize shall come into our ports duty free, because it will be for the benefit of the farmer that it shall do so, as it is of use to feed his pigs and to fatten his cattle, but there are certain other articles of food for the consumption of human beings which must be excluded (the right hon. baronet was interrupted by loud cheers) and in respect of which the same law cannot be maintained (cheers)? Do you advise us to fight the battle on such a principle as that (hear, hear). Assuming, too, that a suspension of the Corn Law had taken place on account of the present great emergency, would you advise the Government, for the sake of the public interests, and of the country, to give a guarantee that the existing Corn Laws should be renewed as soon as the term of their suspension had arrived (hear, hear)? Do you not feel that the very fact of that suspension would constitute a new element in the application of the question, and give a tenfold stimulus to your opponents? You invite us to fight this battle for you, but you must look to the state of feeling on the subject. You invite us not to abolish, but to suspend the Corn Laws, but you cannot be insensible to the change of opinion on this subject—not alone among politicians, which people are apt to attribute to some interested or corrupt motive—but among the most independent members of the house (cries of hear, hear). Did Lord Ashley vacate the representation of his country from any interested or corrupt motive (loud cries of hear, hear)? Did Mr. Sturt follow his example on such grounds? Did Mr. Tatton Egerton resign the representation of Cheshire from any improper motive (hear, hear)? Did Lord Henniker vacate his seat from any reason but change of opinion? Were any of those gentlemen actuated by any feeling but a real conviction that the time was come for the settlement of this question (hear, hear)? If that honourable member of this house (Mr. Charteris), who has shown as high a spirit as ever emanated from the heart of an English gentleman (cheers), and who held out great promise of excellence—if Mr. Charteris vacated Gloucester, was it through any corrupt or interested motive (hear, hear)? Can you attribute such a motive to Mr. Dawney (hear, hear)? Does not all this change of opinion prove that the giving of a guarantee would have been attended with enormous difficulties? Let us take the admissions and the opinion of those who have been longest and loudest in condemnation of Government, and examine their argument (hear, hear). First comes the hon. member for Huntingdon (laughter). Well, I confess, I was surprised by some of the opinions maintained by the honourable gentleman (hear, hear, hear)—but whilst condemning the present measure, will he follow me in the defence of the existing Corn Laws (hear, hear)? No such thing. So far from it, he thinks this is just the time for effecting a compromise for a new Corn Law. Why, he would have abandoned me, if, after a suspension of the Corn Law, I had undertaken to have given a guarantee of revival (laughter). He says, the time has just arrived for a compromise. Why, if there was an unfortunate moment for such a measure, it is this (laughter). What is the meaning of a compromise? Why, it means a new Corn Law (hear, hear, hear). What security is there for the maintenance of that (hear, hear)? Or what could it be (hear, hear)? What would the state of parties be here, as might be inferred from the sentiments of those members? I only take now the loudest and most vigorous of them. I only take now the loudest and most vigorous advocates of this system of protection, and I am trying to convince you that a guarantee of the revival of the Corn Laws was impossible. Well, the hon. member of Roxburghshire comes first, and he was loudest of them (loud laughter). The honourable member has some very curious notions as to the relations which exist between the country and its ministers, and still more as to those between the sovereign and her ministers. The honourable gentleman likens me to a hired advocate who was engaged in a particular cause, and says that I have thrown up my brief. Perhaps he is not aware of the circumstances which may make some material difference in that comparison; perhaps he does not know that the minister on entering into office takes an oath that in all matters debated and discussed in council "he will fearlessly and unmovably deliver his opinions according to his heart and conscience" (cheers). That obligation, according to my comprehension at least, constitutes a material difference between the position of a minister and that of an advocate (cheers). The hon. member said that I had been sent here to defend the old system of the Corn Laws, that I had made a breach in that system by the alterations of 1842, but that, having made these alterations, I was bound by every consideration of consistency and honour to maintain them. He, however, made some admissions before he got to the close of his speech. He said he admitted in his own country, since these changes, there had been great improvements in the roads, in the introduction of science into agriculture, and the facilities for improving and transferring the produce, and that his own opinion was that the time had come when the Corn Laws must be altered. I said, whom are you now to for, menning, if any obligation was imposed on me to maintain the alterations made in 1842, he was bound also to adhere to his opinion that the time had come for a change in the Corn Laws. The hon. gentleman was perfectly indignant at the imputation, and, claiming for himself the function maintained by Anacharsis Clootz as attorney-general of the human race (great laughter), assumed a universal character in his reply.—I asked him whom he was counsel for, when he was so ready to abandon his old professions. The hon. gentleman said—"whom am I counsel for? I am no kind of counsel, that is an imputation on my honour—I am counsel for my country—I am counsel for my own opinions—I am counsel for the interests of the empire" (great laughter). I certainly claim to be counsel, with perhaps not quite so comprehensive a function—I claim to be counsel for this great country, and for those who have required me, in a time of great public necessity, to give that advice which, in my heart and conscience, I believe to be the best (cheers). As to the hon. member for Newcastle-under-Lyne, he tells me hereafter and for ever, from this time he withdraws his confidence from me (laughter), on the ground that I establish no great principle as to the Corn Laws. If ever there was a man to whom a minister ought to be recommended because he does not establish a great principle, it is the hon. gentleman in question (laughter). He has fought by the side of the honourable member for Wolverhampton and has voted against him—he is an advocate for a fixed duty, but he has done all he could to defeat it. I do not know whether he has so far shared so much of my misfortunes as to have read the pamphlets of a Mr. J. Colquhoun (great laughter), but I doubt not but that he will agree with me, in so far as I can understand them, that the author is an advocate for a repeal of the Corn Laws. If the honourable gentleman has voted with the honourable member for Wolverhampton and against him—if he is the determined advocate of a fixed duty, and has done all that he could since 1842 to maintain a sliding scale—I wonder how I should have fared with the honourable gentleman—I wonder what he would have said, after having carried a motion for the suspension of the Corn Laws, if at the end of that time the Government were to stake their existence on the repeal. I venture to say, there would not have been a more strenuous combatant of such a proposal (hear, hear). There never was a person clamouring for a principle who was more ready to fall in with any measure that might turn up (laughter). As for the noble lord the member for Newark, who has not yet spoken, would it be possible for the Government to rely upon his support, as this is his opinion? He says: "The conclusion to which I have come is, that sanctioned by the authority of the late Lord Spencer and other practical agriculturists, upon the best of an unbiased judgment, we humbly express a firm belief that both the advantages and evils of the expected changes have been abundantly magnified; and that of all the panic dreams that ever sat like a nightmare on the energies of human enterprise, or cramped the sinews of a noble pursuit, the idea—in a densely-inhabited country, where population is rapidly increasing, commerce and skill unequalled, and true science dawning—that human food is likely to become too cheap, and its production too profitable, is the most unaccountable and will eventually be found the most illusory and groundless." I do not know what course he meant to take as to the present measure, but I infer from this passage that he is decidedly in favour of the present Corn Laws (cries of hear, hear). Well, but there may be a personal objection to the proposer of the measure, and the honourable gentleman the member for Maidstone may say—I will not ask whether the measure is right or wrong, but I will look to your conduct; I will give extracts from your speeches, and say you ought not to propose it. But with all due submission, I say the question for the country is, whether it is right or whether it is wrong (cheers)—whether it is right or whether it is wrong, that is the question (hear, hear). Is it right that the Corn Law should be suspended, and after suspension it should be attempted to revive it (hear, hear)? If it be right, vote for it—if it be wrong, withdraw your confidence by all means; but surely you cannot justify, on the ground of personal objection to the proposer, your voting against a measure which you believe to be right, and that a measure that concerns such mighty interests (loud cheers). Now, sir, I cannot make the same remarks with respect to the speech of the honourable member for Somerset. He made no such admissions as the honourable member for Roxburghshire and the honourable member for Huntingdonshire. I heard from him (the honourable member for Somerset) that he is for maintaining the law in all its force. The hon. gentleman also said, we must not expect the continuance of his confidence. Now, I do not implore of the hon. gentleman to visit those penal consequences upon us (cheers and laughter); but I say to him, do not let this measure be lost on account of your distrust. If you believe the measure to be right, pass the measure in the present crisis, and take the opportunity, if you think fit, of punishing those in whom you have not sufficient confidence. But then the hon. gentleman, in closing his connection with us, must excuse me if I say, he speaks too modestly of himself (laughter), for I was not always the hon. gentleman's leader. I proposed in the course of the last year that certain duties on grease should be remitted, as grease was much used in manufactures; but the hon. gentleman resisted me. Hence, avault! this is holy ground! grease you shall not touch (cheers and laughter); for, said he, though grease may be introduced for the benefit of manufactures, yet I doubt the vigilance of the Custom-house officers; and some persons may introduce and use the grease intended for manufactures as butter. I do assure the honourable gentleman that it is rather hard to devolve upon me the duty of defending protection, after such measures as that; and I do not believe that the hon. gentleman, by taking this stand upon grease (loud laughter), did so much injury to the cause of Free Trade as to the cause of protection (cheers).

Mr. MILES was understood to remind the right honourable baronet that he was absent from the debate to which he referred.

Sir ROBERT PEEL.—I think the hon. gentleman has shown his qualification for the post of leader by the discretion he used in being absent from the discussion (laughter). Now, if the honourable gentleman will permit me, I will, with perfect good humour, examine two or three of his arguments. I had said that the price of cattle and meat had not been diminished; that the contracts of the present year were entered into, and that they were higher than those of preceding years. The honourable gentleman's reply was, that he voted for the Corn Law of 1842, but strenuously resisted the part of the tariff that admitted foreign cattle. The hon. gentleman says, that the cause of the high price of meat is this, that in the year 1843 we suffered from the defective supply of green crops; that in the course of the last six months the quantity of sheep brought to Smithfield market had been 250,000 less than in the half year preceding; that the average weekly supply of sheep in the London market was 16,000 less than it had been. He spoke of the cattle being 10 stone less, and of being lean and ill-favoured. Now, how can the hon. gentleman think it possible to maintain a law which, in periods of disease and defective food, would prevent the introduction of 250,000 sheep into this country, and raise the price of meat extravagantly (loud cheers). Does he think it would not be of benefit to the landed interest to repair that deficiency, and bring in a few healthy oxen and a few sound sheep from the Continent (cheers)? Now the honourable gentleman must excuse me if I refer to his observations with respect to the question of flax. What was his argument with respect to flax? When there was a duty of 10l. per ton on foreign flax, in certain parishes in the county of Somerset the inhabitants were in the habit of growing flax. I shall take one of those parishes, the parish of Chizzleborough. There were 100 acres in that parish appropriated to the culture of flax; now I would like to know what were the circumstances under which that culture was abandoned? Was it in consequence of the withdrawal of protection? What period of the year?

Mr. MILES.—At the last removal of the last duty.

Sir ROBERT PEEL.—Now observe, the last removal of the last duty was only the removal of 2s. a hundred. The duty on foreign flax was remitted in 1824. In that year it was 10l., and it was reduced to a nominal duty of 2s. a hundred.

An Hon. Member remarked that it was reduced to five-pence.

Sir ROBERT PEEL.—That is, five-pence a hundred weight. In the year 1842 it was remitted, and the removal of this five-pence a hundred weight on flax has involved this parish of Chizzleborough in ruin (laughter and cheers). See, said the honourable gentleman, what has happened—here is 100l. lost to the parish of Chizzleborough, and that by your withdrawal of protection on native industry (laughter). Now let us see what has taken place in other parts of this great empire from the withdrawal of what is called this protection for native industry (hear). You will find that no culture is more profitable at this moment than the culture of flax is in Ireland; and you will find that it has thus become flourishing since the withdrawal of this remnant of protection (cheers). That is the way we are to argue it, and not to view some particular locality, and say, see what is the consequence of the removal of protection, when it may be clearly owing to some other cause (cheers). Now, what is taking place in Ireland, in a country without any other manufactures than linen—what is taking place there in consequence of the withdrawal of protection? We see by the evidence of Lord Devon's committee that flax is more profitable than wheat; that is, that flax without protection gives a better return than wheat with it (cheers from the Opposition benches). But what becomes of the manufacture? Before the withdrawal of protection the exportation of cambrics was in the following proportion:—1000 dozen of French; Irish, 100. In the next four years after the withdrawal of protection, the increase of Irish importation of this article was 300, in the next four years 900; in four years, from 1838 to 1842, it was as 4000 to 1000; and in four years, from 1842 to 1846, it was at 16,000; that is to say, that by the withdrawal of this protection from flax, a great manufacture sprung up in the north of Ireland, and the linen dealers in the city of London, who waited on us the other day, said that ten years ago three-fourths of the cambric and the cambric handkerchiefs of our supply were brought from France, and one-fourth from Ireland, but in the last year the proportions were just reversed; one fourth comes from France, and three-fourths from Ireland. Well, then, it may so have happened that the parish of Chizzleborough may have suffered (laughter). But then recollect that, coincident with this removal of protection, the cultivation of flax in Ireland has prospered, and the linen manufacture in that country has arrived at a degree of prosperity as great as the most sanguine friend of Ireland could wish. Well, then, are we to restore the duty on flax again (hear, hear)? Sir, this debate has chiefly turned on the Corn Laws, but it is not necessarily a Corn Law debate; it is proposed that we should go into a committee of the whole house for the purpose of considering the principles of our commercial policy. No doubt the consideration of the Corn Law will come before that committee, and it will be perfectly open to you to reject the measure of the Corn Laws, and yet to consent to the others (hear, hear). So much has been said on the subject of the Corn Laws that I cannot pass it by. Her Majesty's Ministers have proposed a measure which they propose from the belief that it was most likely to ensure success; namely, that after the lapse of three years, the duties on corn should be repealed, or at least reduced to a nominal duty. I proposed that measure on the part of the Government, and I sincerely believed that it would be more acceptable than any other to the agricultural interest. I proposed it from the belief that it would not be more acceptable to them, but that it would be preferred to an immediate repeal. We combined with the measure of the Corn Laws a proposal for encouraging the improvement of land, by advancing money for the purpose of drainage. I certainly thought it more probable, with respect to land, that in many parts of this country the people would be in a much better position to compete with the foreigner if the absolute repeal of the Corn Laws was postponed for a period of three years; I thought there would be more opportunity to make arrangements, if arrangements were necessary, between landlord and tenant. But, above all, I thought there would be more time for seriously considering what improvements in drainage could be made, what advantage could be taken of that proposal of the Government. I certainly thought, taking into consideration that Canada has at present an advantage in respect to the admission of her corn, compared with the corn of foreigners, that it was more likely to be acceptable to Canada that some time should elapse before Canada corn was brought into competition with the corn of the United States (hear). Bona fide believing the arrangement to be a better one, believing also that it was more for the advantage of agriculture, I, on the part of her Majesty's Government—I made that proposal (cheers); and it is my intention to use all legitimate means I can for the purpose of giving effect to it (cheers). It was said the other night by the honourable gentleman the member for Somerset that he greatly preferred, speaking on the part of the agricultural population—that he greatly preferred immediate repeal to the measure proposed, and he turned round to his friends, and that sentiment at that time received, apparently, a concurrence from them. Now, sir, as I have before said, it is the intention of the Government to adhere to their own proposal. They state the reasons why they propose it, and why they are inclined to adhere to it, considering the opportunity there will be for the improvement of the country in the interval. But I stated this distinctly, that if the agricultural body are not of opinion that it is for their advantage, and that they think that immediate repeal is preferable to deferred repeal (laughter and loud cheering from the Opposition benches), by taking part with the honourable gentleman opposite, they may place me in a minority (laughter and cheers again). Then the only consideration I shall bear in mind will be this, what course should I best take to give effect to the law as amended at your hands. We will do all we can to carry the proposition—I prefer it. I proposed it believing it to be favourable to agriculture. I don't say what course—speaking for myself—I may possibly take. I don't say what effect success here may have in other places (hear, hear). This I will say, that my opinion with respect to the policy of the final adjustment of the Corn Laws will remain unaltered, and I shall decidedly prefer immediate repeal, so carried against me, to throwing this country into confusion by any attempt on my part to prevent it (loud cheers and laughter from the Opposition). It is right to consider what course would be most advisable to adopt, and I do believe that the final adjustment of this question is now become paramount to all (loud cheers). I was asked in the course of this discussion, what price I calculated corn would hereafter bring? I thought it was but natural to say, that it was very difficult for me to give a positive answer to that question; that I thought the price of corn was affected by the seasons and other causes; and, therefore, I could not undertake—and I am sure past experience would show that I could not undertake—to guarantee any price, or express any opinion whatever. But this I will say, that I think nothing could be more erroneous than to suppose that the interests of agriculture are necessarily and intimately interwoven with the price of wheat. When the hon. gentleman talks of the great quantities of corn that could be brought in, let him consider that in Jersey for a long period there has been a Free Trade, that there is Free Trade in Malta in corn, and that Egyptian corn is brought in there. When the hon. gentleman says that all this corn will be pouring in here, he should recollect that to determine what is to be the price of corn, you must always take into consideration the quality. It appears that the corn brought from Odessa and Egypt to Malta bears a price of 31s., and that some corn would bear a price of 10s. less, in the English market on account of its inferiority. Therefore it is impossible to draw an inference as to the price of corn without knowing the quality, and I certainly entertain the hope that there will not be any such reduction in the price of wheat in consequence of the more extended importation as would seriously injure the agriculturists (hear, hear). What I want to show is this, that agricultural prosperity has no necessary connection with the price of wheat (hear, hear). It is admitted that never was there a period when science has been so much applied to agriculture—when so many improvements have been made—and when the cost of production was so much reduced as it has been within the last three or four years. Let us see what is the price of wheat—and, I would observe, that there is a natural tendency in the price of wheat to decline quite apart from legislation—let us take the price of wheat for the ten years ending 1805; the price then was 81s., for the ten years ending 1815, it was 97s. 6d.; for the ten years ending 1825, it was 78s. 8d.; for the ten years ending 1835, it was 56s. 7d.; for the ten years ending 1845, 57s. 11d. Now, what was the average for the last four years, during which it is admitted great improvements were made in agricultural science. The average of the last four years was only 51s. 10d. Thus, it has fallen from 97s. 6d., 78s. 8d., 81s. 2d., and yet it is admitted that agricultural prosperity never was more marked, or that greater improvements were made than within that period. And therefore, if there should be a continued fall in the price of wheat, do not attribute it to the operation of the law—it may be the result of scientific improvements, and even the reduced price of wheat shows the increased extent of agricultural resources. I would now compare the rental of land in this country, as taken from the property-tax returns, with the price of wheat. The rental of 1815 was 32,532,000l.; the average price of wheat for five years, ending 1815, was 102s. 5d.; for five years, ending 1842, the price of wheat was 64s. 7d.; and yet the gross rental of the country had then risen from 32,000,000l. to 37,000,000l. So that along with a great fall in the price of wheat, there had been a great increase in the rental of land. I quite admit there was a difference in the currency; if you take off ten per cent. from the price of 100 shillings on account of the difference in currency, you must take off ten per cent. on the rental of 32,000,000l. Take off a proportion on both sides, and still it will leave them unquestioned, that with a great reduction of the price of wheat, there had been a great increase of agricultural prosperity. I must refer to an argument which has been advanced by the hon. member for Northamptonshire. The hon. gentleman says, after this Corn Law shall have passed, the tenant farmer will come to his landlord, and will thus address him. He will say to the landlord—"I cannot afford to pay the rent which I have hitherto paid. The bones of my forefathers have been deposited in the churchyard of their native parish. Most painful it is to quit the residence of my ancestors, the rude forefathers of this hamlet, and to seek my fortune in another country." Then the hon. gentleman—and it made a great impression on the house, from the pathetic tone in which the speech was delivered—stated that the landlord would make a speech to his tenants to this effect—"My good fellow (great laughter)—it is quite true that your forefathers have lived in this country, and on this estate; that there has been an intimate relation between your ancestors and mine, but the principles of Free Trade are prevailing. I can purchase the articles required for my consumption at a cheaper rate, and I must deal with you upon the same principles. True, the land which you occupy produces only three quarters, but by the application of a little capital and skill it may be made to produce five. And there is a gentleman connected with the Anti-Corn-Law League—

Mr. S. O'BRIEN.—No, no, no (loud laughter).

Sir R. Peel: I wish the hon. gentleman would make his own speech in answer—"A gentleman then, not connected with the Anti-Corn-Law League, but connected with the manufacturing districts" (hear, hear). Well, now, I will suggest another speech, and a better speech to be made by the landlord: "My good fellow (laughter), let us both start with this advantage. Your forefathers have been buried in the churchyard of this hamlet. Your forefathers have had their fortunes intimately connected with those of mine. It is possible that a stranger may outbid you in this farm. Under these protecting laws, your land, which ought to produce five quarters, only produces three, and public opinion will hardly tolerate this (hear, hear). That there shall be no foreign corn imported, but that the natural fertility of our own soil shall be promoted. We must really, therefore, take some measures for increasing the produce of this farm from three quarters to five. But I have the advantage of the new tariff (hear, hear). I am enabled to purchase my commodities at a lower rate (hear, hear), and I intend to apply the saving in your assistance and in the improvements which I wish to effect (loud cheers). I will not therefore turn you out of your farm; I will not let the manufacturers come here; but it is for your interest and mine that the land which can bear five quarters shall not bear three (hear, hear). You have not capital, perhaps; you have not science; I can afford you both—I will lend you capital, I will get you the aid of science to assist your improvements, to assist you in the education of your son, and enabling him to succeed you (hear, hear). I will cut down the trees that encumber your land, and let you and me together keep out this foreign invader—the manufacturer (hear, hear, and a laugh). But let us now, by the application of capital and industry, improve this farm, and let it be handed down to my son and yours in an improved state (cheers). Let five quarters be produced where three have been before. That will be for the benefit of both landlord and tenant, and your son's son shall be buried in this churchyard" (hear, hear, and a laugh). Suppose the tenant should say, "But this is a labourer's question;" I should answer then, "My good friend, but if we can make this land, which now produces three quarters, produce five, we shall employ more labour—we shall have a greater demand for labour, and all parties will be benefited, and the State will be improved. The guarantee for the rent will be enhanced, your comfort increased, and all this by the application of a little of that saving which the honourable gentleman says the rich are to derive from the tariff." But as I said before, this is no mere Corn Law question. The question is this—her Majesty has surely made no unreasonable request—she has thus addressed you: "I recommend you to take into your early consideration whether the principles on which you have acted may not, with advantage, be yet more extended, and whether it may not be in your power, after a careful review of the existing duties on many articles to make such further reductions and revisions as may tend to ensure the continuance of the great benefits to which I have reverted." And you promised that you would (hear, hear, hear, and laughter). The answer which the house made in return gave no pledge as to the measures themselves. It was purposely so worded as to give none. But you gave this assurance, that in compliance with her Majesty's recommendation, you would take the subject into your early consideration (hear, hear). How do you fulfil that promise? Why will you refuse to go into the committee where these measures are to be considered? What is the amendment before us? Does it embody any great principle, as I expected it would from the early notice which was given by the honourable member for Newcastle-under-Lyne (Mr. Colquhoun)? I thought that he would move that the Government were either not entitled to the confidence of Parliament, or that native industry was entitled to protection (hear, hear). But what is the motion that has been made now? That not one of those questions shall be considered for six months to come! After the positive assurance given to the Sovereign that you would take into consideration and determine whether it was possible, after a careful revision of the existing duties on many articles, to make such reduction as might tend to ensure the continuance of the great benefits adverted to, you refuse even to resolve yourselves into a committee, where proposals with a view to this object may be entertained. You would pronounce at once against the admission of foreign grain and timber. This motion absolutely precludes the consideration of any one of these proposals (hear, hear). In point of fact, it is not a question of Corn Laws merely. There is this great principle at issue in reference to commercial policy—will you advance or recede? The hon. member's proposal says—"No, we will stand still; for six months to come we will do nothing." I say, in this great country to stand still is to retrograde. The carrying of this amendment would be a reflection on the House of Commons. You have already taken some steps to relax protection. You now say we will relax it no more. You will not listen to any proposals. This committee is moved. I hope that this house, who have been parties to all the proposals made to amend the commercial law; who passed the amended law of 1842; who simplified the customs' code; who consented to the tariff; who passed the Canada Corn Bill, and the altered tariff of last year; I do hope that this house will not accept such a reflection on itself as to vote for this amendment; that, for six months to come, nothing of this kind shall be attempted (hear, hear). That is the question at issue, whether you will advance in the relaxation of duties and the removal of prohibitions, or will restore prohibitory duties and will enforce protection (hear, hear)? That is the question which will be decided by the vote to which you will come. Well, now, I offer this challenge. I never said, "I looked only to the experience of the tariff for three years. I have come to a change of opinion." I said this, that during three years I have seen coincident with abundance and low prices great prosperity; I have seen great contentment. I have seen the diminution of crime; I have seen the abatement of all commotions; I have seen improved health, increased commerce; and that the experience of three years has convinced me that cheapness and plenty are at the foundation of our prosperity. I did not take any credit for the tariff. I said, all I claim for it is this, that concurrently with these great blessings, there have been constant relaxations; that it is impossible, therefore, to raise an objection to extend relaxations. I judged of the future from the past, but this is the challenge which I offer, not with respect to the tariff you have passed, but with respect to the whole series of remissions of prohibitory duties. Show me one relaxation, one removal of prohibition, which contributed to the welfare of the producer. I say I will show you that these removals of prohibition have contributed, not merely to the general weal and advantage of the consumers (which is sufficiently apparent), but that they are perfectly consistent with the permanent benefit and increased wealth of the producer (cries of hear, hear). Why, I am ashamed when I read some of the petitions. Here is one presented from the shipowners (hear, hear, and laughter). It says, your petitioners are deeply interested in the prosperity of British navigation and the British colonies, and this is the prayer with which it concludes—they implore the wisdom of Parliament to check all further rash experiments on British navigation. And, as an earnest of its sympathy with the interests of commerce, so indissolubly connected with national defence, they implore your honourable house at once to reject the proposition for the reduction of the duty on foreign timber from 25s. to 15s., as proposed by the measure before you (hear, hear). This is from the shipowners—the builders of ships (hear, hear, and laughter). Praying you to check all further rash experiments. Why what is the issue of the "rash experiment" you made in 1842. You found a discriminating duty of 45s. in favour of Canadian timber, and you reduced it to 24s. Have you destroyed the Canadian trade? Has that rash experiment been injurious to the shipowner (I don't speak of the Baltic shipowner)? Let us see. In

Liverpool the average tonnage employed in the British American timber trade (for I won't take the Baltic timber trade) during the eleven years preceding the reduction of duty was 153,000 tons. This was with the discriminating duty. Now that you have removed it in the last three years, the tonnage of ships engaged in the trade from Liverpool is 147,000 (loud cheers). This was the shipping employed in the Canada trade. The quantity of pine timber imported into Liverpool on an average of seven years, before the reduction of duty, was 5,749,000 loads. In 1844 the quantity of pine timber brought into Liverpool from British North America, increased after the reduction of duty from 5,749,000 to 6,211,000 (cheers). In 1845 the quantity was 6,827,000 (loud cheers). The shipowners ask you to reject the proposition for reducing the discriminative duty still further to 15s. What is the state of things at Liverpool under the existing law? One branch of the timber trade has this year been very scantily supplied with those woods adapted for the construction of ships of the first class. So trifling has been the supply, that at the present moment this, one of the greatest maritime ports in the world, is in the anomalous condition of not having in stock a single log of foreign wood suitable for building ships that will last for twelve years time. We propose to give increased facilities for the importation of Baltic timber in order that with it good ships should be built. We have done this to some extent already, and concurrently with it there has been an enormous increase in the consumption of Canadian timber. Just for the same reason then, the import of foreign wood led to an increase in the price of the domestic article. The access given to the good timber of the Baltic much increased manufacturing prosperity, and with it the demand of that Canadian timber which does not come into competition with the Baltic. You are deficient in that particular article so useful in building ships that will endure for 12 years. You have not one single log. I make this modest proposal, to have a discriminating duty of 15s., and these ship-owners come forward and ask us to check all further "rash experiments (hear, hear, and laughter). The honourable and gallant member for Liverpool (Sir H. Douglas) made a long speech about colonial policy, in which he deprecated the consequences of our measures as regards the colonies. What has been the course we have pursued? Am I proposing an immediate application of the principles of Free Trade? Am I disregarding all considerations of revenue? Am I proposing that you should levy nothing on timber, and that you should sweep away all customs revenue by extravagant reductions? No; I am preserving the distinction between duties laid on with a view to prohibition, and those for revenue purposes; and I am laying a foundation for increased revenue through increased consumption (hear, hear). I know that great interests are involved in our relations with the colonies. I wish for no rash or precipitate alteration in those relations. I do not ask that the discriminating duty on coffee should be at once removed. The whole scope of our policy has been to diminish protection on all articles of colonial produce, but you have also done that which was just—you have diminished protection as to commodities introduced into your colonies. If the hon. and gallant member is adverse to this course, he ought to have begun his opposition long since. What did you in 1842? You permitted the colonies to get their provisions introduced freely—to get their staves introduced freely. You said the time was come for relaxing that rigid principle which denied or restricted commercial relations between our colonies and other countries. There were great difficulties to contend with; but you said you would not be prevented from getting supplies of colonial articles from other countries if you permitted your colonies to get their supplies of necessary articles in other markets than your own. You said, we will reduce the protection on coffee and make some new arrangement as to sugar. Is that unwise? Has injury been done to the colonies? It is quite wrong to say with respect to colonies, that their affection for the mother country depends on their having the exclusive supply of her markets. Look to the great benefit you derive from your commercial relations with Australia. I do not propose to make rash alterations. I propose to proceed in the path which has led to so much benefit, and gradually to alter some of those protective duties. The honourable gentleman of whom I spoke before, the member for Northamptonshire, was particularly severe on the proposed removal of some of these duties. But I really do not know what there is in the state of our trade to prevent it. One of my proposals is, that there being an excise duty of one farthing per yard on British paper, there shall for the future be a customs duty on foreign paper of 400 per cent. more; that foreign paper-hanging shall pay 2d. a yard. Why is it that we cannot compete with France in papers? I know it is said our patterns are inferior. That is perfectly true. They are inferior in paper-hangings as in silks, but admit a qualified and limited competition, and depend upon it they would improve. There is nothing in the constitution of Englishmen to prevent them drawing as good patterns. What is the admission you begin with? That believing a duty of 1s. per square yard on foreign papers, when the export duty on your own is only 4d. you can protect your patterns. But I say reduce the duty. The hon. gentleman says, that looking out at the window he will see a great number of paper-hangers and carriage-makers, who will say that their interests are sacrificed. But there is not an instance of alteration of duties in which the same argument has not been employed. Remember the tariff of 1842. I proposed to let in foreign potatoes at 2s. per cwt. The potato growers came up in a body, and said that they would all be ruined; that France would get possession of the supply, and that you would be reduced to depend on her. I proposed to reduce the duty on foreign hops from 8s. to 4s. All Kent and Sussex were alarmed, and the most extravagant predictions were made of the quantity that would be introduced from abroad. How many have come in? 2 cwt. only. Yet the hop growers said they would be perfectly ruined. Now I propose further to reduce the duty on foreign hops from 4s. to 2s. 5s., and I am asked what are we to do with all the persons that will be thrown out of employment? I said that exactly the same prophecies were made before, and you may depend upon it that these will not now be fulfilled. I now come to consider the question of foreign silks. With respect to this question I stand in pretty much the same predicament as Mr. Huskisson, against whom all the advocates of the protective system cried out in indignant remonstrance, when in the year 1826 he proposed to relax the restrictions on the importation of silk. Mr. Baring (now Lord Ashburton), a great authority in those days, spoke on occasion of that debate, and resisted inexorably the contemplated reductions of duty. He said—"Here were hundreds of thousands of poor honest men, who knew nothing of the world of political economy, but who found on a sudden, that because some very wise men had of late sprung up, they were to be ousted of the earnings of their industrious and patient labours of many years. These people were at present, and had long been remarkable for being loyal, orderly, and well-conducted, and yet they found themselves on the very brink of the most painful distress, owing to the discoveries of the political economists." Another gentleman, in answering Mr. Huskisson, was pleased to speak of him in terms which put me in mind of some hard sayings which I have known to be applied to another minister—a minister of our own age (hear, hear, and laughter). He called him "an insensible and hard-hearted metaphysician, exceeding the devil in point of malignity" (loud laughter). Mr. Huskisson rejoins thus: "I hope that I am not wanting in the duties and feeling of a man—I have also a duty to perform as a Minister. If immediate relief be in a great degree out of our power, it the more becomes us, as the guardians of all that is most valuable in civilised society, to trace the causes of the present calamities, and to prevent, if possible, their recurrence." Such were the difficulties with which Mr. Huskisson had to contend—such was the obloquy to which he exposed himself, in pursuing a course which he knew to be authorised by wisdom and sound policy. But neither misrepresentation, nor obloquy, nor reproach, could divert him from that course. Conscious of the wisdom of his policy, and, above all, conscious of the rectitude of his motives, he persevered (loud cries of Hear, hear). And what was the result? Were the dreary prophecies of those who advocated the protective system realised? Did their dark forebodings come to pass? Were hundreds of thousands of tradespeople turned from their homesteads to the precarious mercy of the world? Were the poor-rates burdened with their support? Far from it. On the contrary, prosperity and affluence were the results, and the interests of trade were promoted in exact proportions with the relaxations of the prohibitory system. I can prove it by figures. During the 10 years which immediately preceded the year 1823 the total amount of raw silk imported into this country, under the old system, was 19 millions of pounds. During the next 10 years, it was 39 millions, and during the next decennial period, that terminating in the year 1843, it was 52 millions (hear, and loud cheers). Could any eloquence of any human tongue, however gifted, speak more potently than do these figures (cheers)? Under the prohibitory system the quantity of foreign silk imported was nineteen millions—when that system was relaxed it increased from nineteen millions to fifty-two millions! On that fact alone I might base my vindication. And now I will give you a statement of the aggregate consumption of raw silk after the duties were relaxed. During the first decennial period after the relaxation, the average consumption was 1,540,000lbs.; during the second, 3,968,000lbs. (hear, hear); during the third, 5,200,000lbs. (loud cheers). There was a further reduction of protection in 1842, and the results were equally satisfactory. The gross result of the experiment shows that whereas under a strict and inexorable system of prohibition the quantity of silk consumed in our manufactures averaged no more than 1,940,000lbs. in each year; in the year 1844, when a wiser and more liberal policy was adopted, our consumption was no less than 26,400,000lbs. (loud cries of hear, hear). And now, sir, I ask you which is the true philanthropist—the man who forbade foreign silk to enter, who totally kept it out, or he who was not deterred by threats or obloquy from pursuing a course more liberal, more generous, more consistent with common sense? The minister who had the manliness to adhere to his purpose, amidst such difficulties, was surely the man who deserved best of his country. He was charged with being unkind, and insensible even to humanity, but he repudiated the charge, and that it was unfounded history now attests (hear). "Call me not insensible," said Mr. Huskisson, "say not that I regard with indifference the distress and difficulties of my humbler fellow-creatures. I attribute your zeal in their behalf to the most honourable motives, but I know that I have seen Spitalfields under the fostering influence of the protective system devastated by famine and disease. Let me open the ports, and see whether, by freely admitting the fresh air of competition, I may not purify the atmosphere, and establish health, happiness, and comfort, where now squalid misery and desolation are alone to be found" (hear, hear). Is it not strange how gentlemen can forget historical facts, and ally themselves to their own infatuations? Look at the state of your silk trade at this moment. The French have been long accustomed to plume themselves upon their silk manufactures. But it may, perhaps, surprise not a few of those who are now listening to me, to learn that last year, with our relaxed tariff, we actually exported to France more silk than we exported to the whole universe in any year under the protective system (hear, hear). And there is no branch of manufactures in which the same improvement is not observable. I am prepared to prove this, and could enter into matters of the most minute calculations in support of the assertion. In the year 1842 we reduced the duty upon foreign feathers. When it was understood that this reduction was in contemplation, an extensive dealer in the article, who resides in Cork, came to me in an agony of anxiety, and gravely assured me that the proceeding in which I was about to engage was the most revoltingly cruel and hard-hearted measure that it had ever entered into the mind of man to conceive (laughter). In fact, he represented to me that the absolute ruin of every one engaged in the feather trade would be the inevitable consequence of the reduction, and he calculated that the injurious results would be felt in an especial degree in Ireland. He said that he was in the habit of purchasing large quantities from the Irish farmers, who were more provident with respect to their feathers, and set greater value upon them than the English, and he represented that this source of revenue would be entirely removed from them if the duty were relaxed. His representatives were pathetic and moving in the extreme. But I was not to be diverted from my purpose. We reduced the duty on feathers, and I have the happiness to inform the house that many weeks have not elapsed since I received a letter from the same gentleman, in which he admits that he was totally in error, that he was but a sorry prophet, and he returns me thanks for the firmness with which I adhered to my purpose, in despite of his representations, and those of many others similarly circumstanced. He had given me to understand that, before the alteration was effected in the tariff, he was in the habit of purchasing about 100 tons of feathers annually in Ireland, for which he paid at the rate of 20s. per stone, and herein consisted almost the entire of his traffic. But observe how his fortunes are improved. He now informs me that, during the last year, he imported 250 tons of feathers from Russia, and that in Ireland he purchased 150 tons, instead of 100 tons, as heretofore, and that he paid for them to the Irish farmer at the rate of 17. 2s. 10d. per stone, being an advance of 2s. 10d. per stone upon the price which the article fetched under a higher duty. So much for my friend's prediction that his own trade was about to be lost, and the Irish farmers ruined. But there is another circumstance connected with this communication which is highly gratifying, as evidencing the increase in the comforts of the poor, which results from a liberal policy in commerce. He tells me that his principal customers are the miners of Cornwall, whose condition of late years has become so much improved that a feather bed is no longer a rare luxury amongst them; and their orders to my correspondent are daily becoming more numerous. This is a trivial matter, and yet I have not thought it wholly irrelevant to allude to it. And now, in the face of all these facts, are you going to adopt a narrow, bigoted, intolerant policy? Am I to be told that you will array yourself in opposition against me, and to oppose any reductions whatever? You cannot be so infatuated. I offer you this challenge. Take up the history of your own times. Look back to the commercial history of this country for the last thirty years, whether as regards our colonies, or our home transactions, and I challenge you to point out one single instance where either consumer or producer was injured by relaxing the prohibitory system. Oh, let me implore of you to approach the consideration of this question with feelings suitable to its magnitude and importance. View it, I implore you, by the clear, calm lights of reason. Be not mistaken—be not led away. This is not a question of confidence in her Majesty's Government. Reserve that, if you please, for a separate vote. The question which you have now to decide is, will you advance on your path or retrograde (hear)? I do not want to sweep away all duties from these things: I want to impose a duty of 10s. upon French brandy, whereas the English article is only subject to a duty of 9s.; and I want to impose upon French silks a duty of 15 per cent. instead of the present duty of double that amount. I put it to you whether it is not worth your while to endeavour to prevent the evil of smuggling. For my part I confess I think that it is a most desirable object. I would cut up that trade root and branch, and would substitute a legal for an illegal traffic. This, to be sure, is but one of a thousand considerations which should weigh with you in determining on the course which you will pursue. Again, I would remind you that this is no party question. The question you have to decide is simply this—Will you in this enlightened age advance or recede? Remember, the eyes of the world are upon you. Oh, act a part worthy of yourselves and of your country. Will you advance or recede? Which is the policy best suited to a great commercial empire? Remember your position; remember your great national reputation (hear, hear). Look to the advantages which God and nature have bestowed upon you. Look to your geographical position, on the confines of Western Europe, the connecting link between the North of Europe and the Continent of America. Remember that the improvements of navigation and the applications of science have brought you within ten days of Petersburg, and within ten days of New York. Look to your physical advantages—the nerves and sinews of manufacture—iron and coal—which abound throughout your country. Look to your acquired advantages, possessed as you are of a capital tenfold greater than that of any country in the universe. Look to the inexhaustible mine of wealth that is to be found in the unwearied perseverance, the indomitable skill of your people; look to their talent—their ingenuity—their great mental power. Look, too, to your free institutions, your unshackled press, your glorious constitution, which, though it permits licentiousness, affords rational liberty to all;—look, I say, to all these things—think of the glory England has acquired from the equator to the pole, and tell me—is yours a country to dread competition with any country on the face of the earth (loud cheers)? What have you to fear? Why is it that paper-hangers and silk-weavers are to be turned out of employment when protecting duties are proposed to be modified? What is to be your motto? Is it to advance or retrograde? Other countries are now watching your example—other countries are wishing to know what is to be the result at the close of this debate. It is not a fact that every country is determined to meet you with hostile tariffs (hear, hear). No, there are countries which you, perhaps, least expect, and to which I did injustice, perhaps, by not naming before—as Sardinia, which has already set the example of a free importation of your goods and manufactures (hear, hear). Naples will shortly follow the example of Sardinia (hear). And Prussia, I can tell you, is already shaken (cheers). France is desirous of following these examples. These countries have been controlled by the aristocracies of their manufactures and commerce, which exercise a preponderating weight in their chambers; but the opinion of sensible men not interested in protection is bearing upon willing governments, and they are desirous of following your course, and of reciprocating the benefits you may offer to them (loud cheers). Then the United States (hear). I believe you will give by this measure an encouragement to that party in America which is in favour of commercial intercourse with this country. But even if you do not—if you fail in this—still I repeat again, don't punish yourselves because others choose to impose restrictions upon their own commerce. This night, or whenever this debate shall close, you will have to decide what are the principles upon which your commercial policy is to be regulated (hear). Most earnestly, from a deep conviction founded not upon the experience of three years, but upon the experience of every relaxation of restriction and prohibition, I advise you yourselves to set the example to other countries, by persevering in the course you have begun (cheers). It is no inconsistency on your part—it is in perfect consistency with the course you have hitherto taken. Add to those measures and you will take a government security for the preservation of peace—you will take an additional guarantee for the contentment and happiness and prosperity of the great body of the people (loud cheers). You may fail. All human precautions are necessarily precarious. After you have adopted the measures, there may be no assurance that mercantile and manufacturing prosperity will continue uninterrupted. It seems incidental to great prosperity that there shall be a reverse—that depression shall follow a season of excitement and success. That time of depression may return—it may return, and be coincident with a scarcity caused by unfavourable seasons. Your times of '41 and '42, in spite of all your legislative precautions, may again come back. Let me recall the recollection of those sad years. The memory of the winters of 1811 and 1812 never can be effaced from my recollection. Recollect the course we pursued. Then, on every occasion on which the Sovereign met her Parliament, there was the expression of the deepest sympathy with privation and suffering, but an expression also of the warmest admiration of the patience and fortitude with which they were borne (hear). This time may recur. The years of plen-teousness may intermit, and years of dearth may succeed. And if they do come, and if it be our duty again to express sympathy with sufferings, and again to exhort fortitude in their endurance, I do ask every man who hears me to commune with his own heart and to ask himself this question, If these calamitous times do come, if we must express sympathy with distress, if we must again proffer exhortations to fortitude, will it not be a consolation to reflect that we have relieved ourselves from the heavy responsibility of regulating the supply of human food (great cheering)? Will not our expressions of sympathy seem more sincere, if we not our exhortations to fortitude be more impressive, if we can at the same time say, and with pride, that in a time of comparative plenty, urged by no necessity, yielding to no clamour, we anticipated all those difficulties, and removed every impediment to the free circulation of the bounty of the Creator (loud cheers)? Will it not be a great and lasting consolation to us to be enabled to say to a suffering people, these calamities are the chastenings of an all-wise and beneficent Providence, inflicted for some great and humane purpose—perhaps to abate our pride, possibly to convince us of our nothingness, and awaken us to a sense of our dependence; they are to be borne without repining as the dispensations of Providence, for they have not been aggravated by human institutions restricting the supply of food (the right honourable baronet sat down amidst loud and prolonged cheering).

On the motion of Lord JOHN MANNERS, the debate was then adjourned.

TUESDAY.

THE STATE OF FAMINE AND DISEASE IN IRELAND.

Mr. O'CONNELL rose and said,—I rise, sir, to give notice, that on Monday, the 23rd of February, I shall move for a committee of the whole house to consider the state of Ireland with a view to devise means to relieve the distress of the Irish people. That is the motion which I have to submit to the house, and I respectfully demand the acquiescence of the house in that motion. I certainly do not introduce this subject from any party motives, or for any party objects (hear, hear). I would not give utterance to one partisan feeling or expression, nor do I expect any party opposition (hear, hear). I am thoroughly convinced that many gentlemen present, who differ from me on political subjects in reference to Ireland, are as sincerely anxious as I am to relieve the distress of that country; so that this house will come fairly to the consideration of this subject, free from any of those feelings which are calculated to diminish or disfigure its advocacy (hear, hear). That there is the prospect of a calamitous season before Ireland is a fact which is altogether indisputable. The extent of that calamity has been disputed. For a time it was supposed that there was a prospect of our avoiding the misery we were threatened with, but I believe that all hope has now vanished; and before I sit down I shall be able to show the house that the calamity is more imminent and pressing, and likely to be more awful than the house is aware. In order, however, to understand the fearful extent of the threatened calamity, it is right that the house should be reminded of the situation of Ireland previous to this visitation. The calamity with which Ireland is now threatened is not owing to any default of the people, it is not owing to any sterility of the soil, it is not even owing to any want of the abundance of the harvest. It is owing to a dispensation of Providence, which man cannot control. Our duty is to submit to the will of an All-disposing Power, and to perform the part of charitable Christians by endeavouring to mitigate the evils as they arise. But in order to appreciate the extent of the distress, and enable us to devise means for its relief, it is, as I have said, obviously necessary that the house should distinctly understand the previous state of Ireland. I am sorry, in the performance of my duty, to be obliged to state as a fact, that the population of Ireland, instead of augmenting, as some have supposed, has actually been falling and wasting away—that the people have been suffering misery and distress unequalled by any other people in Europe—that the rural population, and especially the agricultural labourers, are, as has been stated in a report to this house, almost always on the verge of famine. I propose, not to call upon the house to give credit to any assertions of mine which are not corroborated by indisputable documents—I mean to show, from documents of the most unquestionable character, the truth of the facts which I have stated respecting the increasing misery of the Irish people. The first document to which I shall refer is the abstract of the population returns of 1821, 1831, and 1841, the accuracy of the facts of which are beyond doubt. From these returns it appears that the population of Ireland between 1821 and 1831 increased about a million, whereas between 1831 and 1841 they increased only about half a million (hear, hear). It has been attempted to account for this by emigration; but this is most unsatisfactory, for those who attempt to account for the decrease in that way give us no account of the emigration between 1821 and 1831, but confine themselves to statements of the emigration between 1831 and 1841, thus leaving out an essential ingredient in the calculation, for there is no reason to suppose that there was less emigration between 1821 and 1831 than between 1831 and 1841. With this fact staring you in the face, then, that in the course of ten years the population of Ireland has gone back half a million, it will not be disputed that there is something wrong in the condition of that country. I remember that the late Sir Fowell Buxton used to make a great impression on the house by showing how the black population diminished during slavery. This is not exactly the case here, but the facts which I have mentioned certainly come within the same principle (hear, hear, hear). I consider that nothing but distress can account for the falling off in the population to which I have referred. The next public document to which I shall refer is the report of the Poor Law Commission in 1835. That commission was named by this house to inquire into the destitute state of Ireland, preliminary to the introduction of a Poor Law, and they reported that there were 2,300,000 of the agricultural population who were constantly in a state approaching to destitution, and that for several weeks in the year they were entirely compelled to live on the charity of their neighbours. The last population returns furnish me with another argument. These returns shew that 46 per cent. of the rural population live in habitations of a single room, and that there are frequently several entire families living in the same room. They also show that 36 per cent. of the civic population live in single rooms, and that frequently two or three families reside in the same room. Does this not present a fearful picture of destitution? But the most important of all the reports to which I have to refer is the report of Lord Devon's Commission. This commission consisted of Lord Devon and four other persons of rank and fortune, and perhaps a better commission was never formed by any Government. It is impossible to imagine that they could be deceived, and I believe they performed their task most laboriously. They state that from the evidence they collected on oath, and from their own observations, they found that the agricultural population of Ireland suffered great privations and hardships; that they were badly housed, badly fed, badly clothed, and badly paid for their labour; that in many districts the only food of the people was potatoes, and their only drink water; that their cabins scarcely protected them against the weather; that a blanket was a rare luxury to them; that their pigs and their manure constituted their only property; and that altogether they endured more suffering than the people of any other country in Europe. This is the report of Lord Devon's commission. This is not the assertion of any agitator or demagogue, but the distinct and emphatic assertion of men who were beyond the possibility of suspicion, and beyond the possibility of being deceived. The agricultural population of Ireland is calculated at 7,000,000, and 5,000,000 of these at least are labourers, in the situation described by Lord Devon's Commission. Now, I beg the house to observe that here is a report made 45 years after the union with England—this is a description of the agricultural population of Ireland by the persons to whom I have referred; I appeal to gentlemen who are listening to me, whether it is not a most frightful picture,—I do not say which is in consequence of, but coming after, the union with England? Remember, that we did not govern ourselves; that we had no Irish Parliament to legislate for us; remember that you have had the government of Ireland for 45 years in your own hands. If you cannot govern us, abdicate; but if you will govern us, try and extricate the population from their abject misery (cries of hear, hear). The report to which I have just referred was made in 1844-45. It was made at a period when our harvest was abundant, when there was a little distress as was ever known in Ireland—when there was no public complaint—when the people were suffering in silence—when they were, in fact, in a state of comparative comfort and freedom from calamity; and yet, such is the report which they gave respecting the state of the rural population of Ireland. That commission also reported two things, to which I wish to call the attention of the house. The first is their report upon the conduct of the unhappy people themselves:—"We repeat, that the patient endurance which the labourers exhibit entitle them to the best attention of Government and of Parliament." The commissioners, it will be observed, do not blame the people for their misery; but they commend them for their patient endurance, and they call on Government and Parliament to give them their best attention. I have some confidence that that call will be responded to (hear, hear). The commissioners make another statement to the effect, that any improvement which had taken place in the condition of the people was attributable to the habits of temperance, and not to any increased demand for their labour. It is also singular enough, as I have said, that this calamity is not attributable to the faults of the people, to any refusal on their part to cultivate the soil, or any want of fertility in the soil itself (hear). I have Parliamentary returns which show the amount of food exported from Ireland from 1842 to 1845. The first is—

An Account of the Quantities of Wheat, Barley, Oats, Wheat-flour, and Oatmeal imported into Great Britain from Ireland, in the years 1842, 1843, 1844, and 1845, distinguishing the Quantities in each year:—

Years.	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Wheat-meal or Flour.	Oatmeal.
	Quarters.	Quarters.	Quarters.	Cwts.	Cwts.
1842	112,195	50,287	1,274,326	314,311	1,551,172
1843	192,177	110,419	1,561,997	773,463	1,706,628
1845	372,719	93,096	1,679,958	1,422,379	1,959,185

So that, during the very period in which the people of Ireland have been living in the manner I have described, they have produced for your consumption no less than 2,000,000 of quarters of bread stuffs and 2,000,000 cwt. of flour and different sorts of meal. The second document is "an account of all cattle, sheep, and swine imported into Great Britain from Ireland, from the 10th day of October, 1843, to the 5th day of January, 1846. Oxen, bulls, and cows, 32,883; calves, 583; sheep and lambs, 32,576; swine, 104,141." Thus these returns establish that this dreadful anomaly exists in Ireland, that while she produces in abundance, her people are starving; that a country so blessed by Providence is thus cursed by man. Let others account for it as they can. We have now to face the evil of coming famine. Remember, when you come to face that evil, that what may be called the substratum of the population in Ireland is in such a condition that their best state is little better than what would be called famine in other countries. And, sir, having shown what this condition of the Irish people is at even the best of times, I now come to that in which they are now placed, and also to the frightful evidence which has poured in on us from all sides of the dreadful nature of the threatened calamity. The documents I shall use are chiefly those which have come out of the hands of the Government; with some of them many hon. gentlemen will already be familiar, and my reading them will therefore be doubly tedious. But it is my duty to lay the case of Ireland in the fullest manner before the house, and therefore I trust I shall be excused if I am more prolix than I would wish to be. This passage is contained in the report of Messrs. Lindley and Playfair, dated November 15, 1845:—"During our stay in Ireland we carefully examined such official papers as were transmitted to us from the Castle; we consulted persons acquainted with the facts of the disease; we visited the district lying between Dublin and Drogheda, and inspected various potato fields and stores in the counties of Dublin, Louth, Meath, Westmeath, and part of Kildare. Judging from the evidence thus collected, and from what we have seen of the progress of the disease in England, we can come to no other conclusion than that one-half of the potato crop of Ireland is either destroyed or remains in a state unfit for the food of man. We, moreover, feel it our duty to apprise you that we fear this to be a low estimate. The next extract is from the report of the commissions of inquiry at Dublin Castle, and the house will observe that it is a remarkable paragraph:—"It appears from undoubted authority that, of 32 counties in Ireland, not one has escaped failure in the potato crop; of 130 Poor Law Unions, not one is exempt; of 2,058 electoral divisions, above 1,400 are certainly reported as having suffered; and we have no certainty until the receipt of the more minute returns now in progress of completion, that the remaining 600 have altogether escaped." That commission had corresponded with nearly all the local authorities in Ireland, and the following was the conclusion at which it had arrived, after having written 362 letters to obtain correct information:—

PROPORTION OF POTATO CROP LOST.

	ALL.	1-10ths.	1-5ths.	3-4ths.	2-3ds.	Halves.	1-3ds.	1-4ths.	1-5ths.	1-6ths.	1-8ths.	1-10ths.	Total.

The next evidence I shall quote is that of Sir L. O'Brien, a gentleman of large property in the county of Clare, whom it was for some time difficult to persuade that there was anything wrong in the crops. He, however, discovered his mistake, and waited on the Lord Lieutenant, stating the result of his observations. He had just returned from an examination of the state of his county, which he had been induced to visit on account of the discouraging accounts he had received. His statement was that the disease was again progressing in many districts, that many families had lost their whole supply, and that whole districts had lost their crops. This gentleman concluded by strenuously recommending the interference of the Government. Sir, there was a committee appointed at a public meeting at the Mansion-house in Dublin, and from that called the Mansion-house Committee. Their reports are in the highest degree persuasive, from the minuteness and care they have shown in taking their information. Between the 10th of December and the 26th of January, they issued 923 letters, and had received 523 answers, viz., from Leinster, 141 letters; from Ulster, 163 letters; from Munster, 152 letters; from Connaught, 67 letters. Of these there were—From ministers of the established church, 216 letters; from Roman Catholic clergy, 195 letters; from Presbyterian ministers, 40 letters; from lieutenants and deputy ditto, 47 letters; from Poor Law boards, 25 letters. The following was the degree in which they represented the potato crop had suffered, and was unfit for human food:—Under one-third, 110; one-third, 111; one-half, 148; over half, 84. A report having been circulated that there was a mitigation in the progress of the disease, an opinion which arose from the people not having examined their potatoes in consequence of their having stored them, a second inquiry was made to ascertain whether or not there had been any such lull in the ravages of the disease. It is now certain that it is still making rapid progress. Thus the returns received by the Mansion-house Committee and by the Government corroborated each other. Sir, I have now to trespass on the house with documents collected from different parts of Ireland, describing the progress of the disease in different localities. I should not, perhaps, have thought it necessary to trespass on your attention with these further statements, were it not that two of the leading journals have stated that the disease has ceased in Ireland, and that there is no reason to fear any want of provision for the winter. I do not accuse the writers of those statements with being actuated by party zeal or party motives, but I do accuse them of being too easily deluded, and of too easily deluding others. It is, however, on this account necessary to place beyond all shadow of doubt the fact of the continued existence of the disease, to show that the evil is not confined to particular localities, but has spread all over the land, and that the cry echoes through the country of coming famine and its attendant, disease. The hon. and learned gentleman then proceeded to read statements from different parts of the country, describing the condition of the potatoes, and the effects which the failure of the crop was producing in the increase of disease. A letter published by Lord Cloncurry (which the hon. and learned gentleman read) distinctly proves the fact that one-third of the potatoes which his lordship had planted under the most favourable circumstances were destroyed. The continued dulness of the statement I have had to make arises from the reading of so many documents; but, reluctant as I am to occupy the time of this house, I feel it my duty to give the fullest information in my power on the subject. I wish the house distinctly to understand that a scarcity has never been experienced in Ireland which has not been accompanied by typhus. It has not been found that fever is diffused by the atmosphere, for the disease has uniformly ceased when provisions became abundant. You have the cause, the effect, and the cure. The cause is scarcity; the effect, fever; the cure, a more plentiful supply of food. It is singular to observe how constantly this has occurred. I have several instances of great famine in Ireland, showing how invariably scarcity has brought fever in its train, and that fever has disappeared when harvests became abundant. In 1734 and 1735 there were wet summers, with bad harvests; fever appeared in the winter of 1734, and did not disappear till the autumn of 1736, which brought a most abundant harvest; between 1740 and 1743, 1798 and 1802, 1817 and the autumn of 1818, 1825 and the autumn of 1827, the same sequence of bad crops and disease, of good crops and the disappearance of disease, was to be observed. A most eminent physician in Dublin (Dr. Corrigan) traces a connection between those pestilential fevers and small-pox. The honourable and learned gentleman having stated from documents a variety of details as to the seasons referred to, proceeded—I have now laid before the house the details which have come under my notice. With regard to the Irish agricultural labourer, the report of Lord Devon's commission shows that there is no peasantry so badly off as the Irish peasantry. It is stated expressly that in no part of Europe is there so great misery as in Ireland, that there are masses of people always on the verge of starvation. From the reports of the Government Commissioners, from the reports of the Mansion-house Committee in Dublin, from the enormous mass of documents to which I have referred, documents obtained not from one locality or vicinage, but indiscriminately throughout Ireland, it appears that the crop has totally failed, and that the country is on the verge of famine. If I am asked what I propose, I can only express my anxiety that the members of this house should join with me in the most energetic measures. You cannot be too speedy in the application of your remedy; you cannot make that application too extensive. It may be said, will you ask money from Englishmen for the relief of Ireland? No such thing. I scorn the thought. Ireland has resources of her own. The Woods and Forests yield a revenue of 74,000*l.* a-year; take that and let it represent a capital of a million, or a million-and-a-half. You may borrow money upon it to meet the exigency, and have a sinking fund for the extinction of the debt out of the revenue. If that plan should not be adopted, then I would say, borrow the rents of the Irish landlords; charge absentee landlords 20 per cent. of a property-tax, and resident landlords 10 per cent. The object is to protect the labouring population from an impending calamity. They are even now surrounded by disease and death in their most horrid forms. And it is fitting that we should make the landlords contribute in such a way as shall be effectual. You may tell me of the Poor Laws. My opinion is that Poor Laws may mitigate distress in ordinary seasons, but will not meet a famine. The workhouses would make very good hospitals for the sick. That fever prevails in Cork, Tralee, and Killarney, I have proved to you; it has raged to a frightful extent in Limerick; the number of patients in the infirmaries has increased; the lanes of Dublin are full of fever. You are not to be guided in such a case as this by ordinary rules. It is a case beyond every rule. The people are not to blame. It has pleased Providence to inflict this calamity upon them; it is your business to mitigate that calamity as much as possible. There are the railroads, for example. Why do you not take strong measures with railroads? I should be happy to see the Government authorised to act in reference to these. I should wish to see this House and the other support the Government in that course. I would dispense with the rules and regulations that fence railway schemes brought before Parliament. Famine is coming on,—fever is coming on,—this house ought to place in the Queen's Government powers adequate to such an exigency, so that it may have the means of giving the most extensive employment. As to contending lines, I do not know that the Government would decide better; for I don't know a worse tribunal than this house. I found myself yesterday voting on a railway question without exactly knowing what I was doing; I cannot, therefore, blame others. But wherever 100,000*l.* has been subscribed for a railway, the Government ought to have power to give another 100,000*l.* by way of a loan, so as to afford every facility for proceeding with the works, and to leave private individuals at liberty to apply the funds thus left for a time in their hands in such a manner as to give employment. Lend the money to the railways at 1 per cent. or 2 per cent. I know how many objections may be started to such a plan; but I speak of a case which is superior to every objection. Great evils require great remedies; the remedy ought to be commensurate with the evil; and I am not speaking from the depth of my conviction when I declare, that in my conscience I believe the result of neglect on the part of this house in the present instance will be deaths to an enormous amount. On the grounds which I have stated, I request the appointment of a committee of the whole house, if with no other effect, at least for the purpose of convincing the Irish people that their calamities are not disregarded. I don't blame the Government for what they have done and for what they purpose to do. They have had my humble support. I have not been peddling for objections to their measures. I am prepared to give an honest support to any plans which the Government may bring forward for the purpose of mitigating the effects of the scarcity. Yet, those which have been propounded are miserable trifles; they would do for ordinary times, and for an ordinary scarcity; but they will not answer when death is abroad. The details into which I felt it my duty to enter, have made my statement necessarily a dry one; and, for the extreme patience with which I have been heard, I beg to express to the House my own thanks and the thanks of the Irish people (cheers). The hon. and learned gentleman (who was but imperfectly heard throughout) concluded by giving notice that on Monday, the 23d of February, he should move for a committee of the whole House on the state of Ireland, with a view to devise means to relieve the miseries of the people.

The question having been put,

Sir JAMES GRAHAM said—I am sure I express the general sense of the house when I declare that the hon. and learned gentleman in bringing forward this subject is entitled to the respectful attention of every member of it. The state of Ireland at the present moment deserves the anxious and serious attention of Parliament, and I admit to the hon. and learned gentleman that the importance of this subject can hardly be over-estimated. I also agree with the hon. and learned gentleman, that whatever differences of opinion may exist between various parties in this house, yet that the difficulty to which he has called our attention will receive from all sides a patient and anxious consideration. Sir, it is my painful duty to state, that having taken the utmost pains to inform myself accurately of the facts of the case, I cannot say that in any important particular the hon. and learned gentleman has exaggerated the difficulty of it (hear, hear). What are the striking facts? The hon. and learned gentleman states that a very large proportion of the potato crop of the present year has failed in Ireland: before we consider the effect of that statement it is necessary to remember how very large a proportion of the whole population of Ireland is dependent almost exclusively on the potato for its daily food. The hon. and learned gentleman had estimated that proportion of the population at 5,000,000. I should estimate it somewhat lower; but it is clearly admitted on all hands that one-half of the entire population of Ireland is dependent on the potato for food. Now, consider the effect of one-half of the entire population being dependent upon the plant, which by the visitation of Providence has this year signally failed; it is very difficult to ascertain, by any calculation that can be made, the exact proportion and extent of that failure (hear, hear, hear). Dr. Playfair and Dr. Lindley, at one period of this visitation, estimated the loss at one-half of the entire crop. Admitting, for a moment, that there may be some exaggeration in this estimate, I will now state to the house the result of the most accurate inquiry which the Government, with all its resources, has been able to make. Early in November last, the Government constituted a commission, composed of officers, all responsible to the Government, as the best mode of ascertaining the facts of the case. At the head of this commission was placed Mr. Lucas, Under-Secretary for Ireland, a gentleman known in the house as the representative of an Irish county, conversant with all the affairs of that country, and certainly well entitled to be intrusted with the conduct of such an inquiry. Under him were placed Colonel Jones, the head of the Board of Works, Colonel Macgregor, the head of the constabulary, who had the means of obtaining information from the most remote parts of the country, Mr. Twisleton, the Poor Law Commissioner in Ireland, who was in communication with the boards of guardians of all the unions, Dr. Playfair, Dr. Lindley, and Professor Kane. The result of their inquiries was stated last night by the hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel), in some of its most striking features, and I fear that in the larger number of electoral divisions throughout Ireland the estimate of Dr. Playfair and Dr. Lindley, so far from being falsified, is unfortunately but too strictly verified. Now in ordinary years, with an average crop of potatoes, it is always the case that for a period of six weeks after the old crop is consumed, and before the new one comes into use, the population is compelled to subsist on a food of a higher and more expensive kind. Suppose the exaggeration of the failure is one-half, assuming, for the sake of argument, that the failure is only one-fourth of an average crop, you then have this state of affairs,—in addition to the six weeks, during which in ordinary years this population, dependent on potatoes, is obliged to subsist on a dearer kind of food, there will be four months of the present year during which 4,000,000 of the population must be fed on food of a higher quality than in ordinary years. A more alarming case has hardly ever been submitted to the consideration of Parliament. It is not ordinarily the duty of Parliament to provide food for the people; but it is the imperative duty of the Government, and I am sure it will be the natural impulse of a representative assembly, under such circumstances, sympathising with a population in such distress, to admit that general rules must bend to such a necessity; nor could the circumstances of a country so unhappily circumstanced be disregarded by the Government. But is this the whole of the case? The information we have received, with all its accuracy, does not extend to a later period than the end of January; but what we have received within the last fortnight is quite confirmatory of the statement of the hon. and learned gentleman—that the disease, so far from being arrested, has progressed; that the potatoes in the pits have not kept well, but have decayed, and that there is great danger of want, unless further precautions are used in time. If, too, is not preserved for the ensuing year, the difficulty, great as it is at the present moment, is but the commencement of a series of evils of such an extent that I hardly dare to contemplate them. I must also state that I entirely concur with the hon. and learned gentleman, that the conduct of the Irish peasantry generally in such alarming prospects, and in the midst of such great distress, has been most excellent. There have been no tumultuary proceedings—no riots; all has been borne with the utmost patience. I have one account of 190 labourers who came to meet the guardians of a union to state that food was failing them; that all they wanted was work; that none was offered them; that they had no labour within their reach. They did not tumultuously demand admission into the workhouse; they indulged in no violence; all they asked for was work for wages. A more touching case than this cannot be conceived (hear, hear, hear). The hon. and learned gentleman has stated with great accuracy the general state of want and deprivation among that suffering and gallant people. From some of the facts the hon. and learned gentleman has mentioned, I should be inclined to draw different conclusions from those he has done. If it is the fact that the population of Ireland has not been increasing so much of late years, I should doubt if that was any proof of the increase of poverty; I believe that a superabundant population is one of the great sources of poverty. The fact is, that the manufacturing prosperity of England and Scotland attracts large numbers of people from Ireland to partake of it. In Manchester, Glasgow, and Liverpool there are immense numbers of Irish congregated, exercising an exemplary industry in pursuits incidental to that manufacturing prosperity. The hon. and learned gentleman has also observed that the imports of corn and cattle from Ireland to England have increased. I cannot regard that circumstance with anything approaching to regret. My confident opinion is, that as those imports have increased, the wealth of Ireland must naturally have accumulated. The cultivation of wheat has also been improving in Ireland, and within the last few years I believe it has been carried more into the consumption of that country. But these are passing observations in reference to the general condition of the people. I now wish to point out to the house what the Government has done to meet this great emergency; the difficulty of which I am not in the least disposed to underrate. Early in November last the Government appointed the commission I have already alluded to. Up to the present time the principal occupation of that commission has been to ascertain the facts of the case (hear). Unhappily, those facts are well ascertained, and the extent of the danger it must be admitted is very great, and the time has arrived when it is necessary that executive measures should be speedily taken. With this view her Majesty's Government have thought it expedient to reduce the number of the commission, as some of the gentlemen forming it were unable to attend to its duties; its functions will henceforth devolve on three officers—Mr. Twisleton, Professor Kane, and Mr. Randolph Brown. Short as the present session of Parliament has been, considerable progress has been made in measures involving public grants and advances for public works, to aid in meeting the emergency of the case. This house has already given its consent to a Public Works Bill, by which an absolute grant of 50,000*l.* is made from the public funds; there is also a Port and Harbours Bill, containing a further grant of 50,000*l.* The Drainage Bill contains clauses which provide for the improvement of the inland navigation of Ireland, connected with draining of lands, comprehending four great works, for joining the northern loughs with the navigation of the Shannon and the waters of the west. The Government has given a separate consideration to the estimates for these four great works, and it will be prepared to bring them under the notice of the house in a committee of supply. The estimate of these works is not less than 120,000*l.*; altogether not less than 220,000*l.* in the shape of grants will be applied to the increase of public works in Ireland. With respect to advances of money as loans, under the Drainage Bill, which now stands for the third reading, an advance of 50,000*l.* will be made for preliminary expenses; on the Ports and Harbours Bill 2,000*l.* will be advanced for the same purpose; on the County Works Bill there will be an advance of 100,000*l.* Altogether the advance in the shape of loans will be 228,000*l.*; as grants, 220,000*l.*; thus as loans, and as grants, no less a sum than 448,000*l.* would be laid out in public works in Ireland. The hon. and learned gentleman has referred more particularly to the railroads now under the contemplation of Parliament. Allow me to call to the recollection of the house that in the last session of Parliament, and the session preceding it, railroad acts passed, by which it is generally assumed that an outlay of 9,000,000*l.* will be made in Ireland in the next three years. But I should be sorry if the house deceived itself into thinking that this capital thus brought to bear on the labour market will prove a sufficient provision. From a report laid on the table of the house, it appears, from a competent authority, that money spent in such works only operates beneficially within a circle of from five to ten miles round the locality. What is the effect of that? Unfortunately it is only the able-bodied men who are attracted by that employment from a distance; they leave their wives and families in the places they come from, sometimes entirely dependent. Such is the particular nature of the difficulty, that a railroad, or long line of railroads, at great intervals, will not meet the case (hear, hear). The difficulty is this,—in all former cases the potato crop has only failed in districts and counties; but at the present time it is widely different, as the honourable and learned gentleman stated, in evidence that cannot be doubted; there is not a county in Ireland in which this unfortunate calamity does not to some degree exist. Out of 130 Poor Law Unions not one had escaped it; in 2000 sub-divisions of these unions, in 1500 at least, the disease has appeared. The calamity is widely spread in different degrees, and thus the difficulty of the operation of a remedy is quite equal to the extent of the danger. The hon. and learned gentleman says the Poor Law is quite insufficient to meet the evil. I quite agree with him, considering the nature of the Poor Law in Ireland—under which no claim to relief is given by destitution, from the size of the unions and the small number of workhouses yet built—that the Poor Law is insufficient to meet the case. I have stated to the house already some of the steps the Government has taken, and I hope the house will give it credit for not having neglected any precaution which prudence and sympathy for the sufferings of the people render necessary. I am pressed to give the details of the instructions the Government has issued with respect to these measures; but as I consider any statement of them now would not be consistent with the public interest, I hope the house will not expect any such detail (hear, hear). It will be sufficient for me to say that in no one particular has the extreme difficulty of the case been overlooked. Early in November instructions had been given specifically upon all the leading points, and I can assure the hon. and learned gentleman and the house that, be the calamity as extensive as it may, her Majesty's Government will not be taken by surprise (hear, hear). The hon. gentleman has stated that in Ireland destitution from a failure of the potato crop is always followed by fever of a most malignant kind (hear). In this respect I think the Poor Law does afford most important assistance. Under the existing Poor Law, cases of fever can be relieved in four different ways; the person may be received into the workhouse, or removed from the workhouse to the fever hospital. I see an objection to the admission of fever cases into the workhouse, as it may tend to spread infection, and by the law as it now stands, except from the workhouse, there is no power to remove the patient to the hospital. I have not much reliance on these two provisions, but there are two others which I think of immense importance if brought into full operation. The first gives the power of erecting temporary fever hospitals in the vicinity of each workhouse; out of 110 unions which have workhouses built, 42 have already temporary fever hospitals provided. Measures have been taken in the remaining unions for compelling this accommodation to be provided where it does not now exist, and a power is also given to the guardians to hire houses for that purpose. In Galway, in 1844, there was a malignant typhus fever, and I am told, that nearly 1100 patients were received in the temporary fever hospital connected with the workhouse of that union. I admit it is possible that even these provisions may be insufficient to meet the exigency of the case, and I am prepared on the part of the Government to ask leave to bring in a bill on this subject, founded on the precedent of the cholera hospitals of 1832. If the disease should spread, this bill will be proposed as a temporary enactment, providing that a temporary rate shall be levied in each union, to meet the cost of maintaining the fever patients. I am not aware that I need go at greater length into these circumstances on the present occasion. And I must say I am most unwilling that this discussion should be prolonged, or should have the effect of interrupting for two hours the progress of the important debate in which the house is engaged (hear, hear). My humble opinion—an opinion sincerely and confidently entertained—is, that in the present circumstances, it is the first and primary duty of the legislature to remove all restrictions on the free importation (cheers) into this country of all articles of the first necessity constituting the food of the people (hear). I am satisfied this is the first duty of Parliament; and I think the hon. and learned gentleman will see, notwithstanding the measures he has mentioned, if this calamity should spread to the extent we apprehend, that it is necessary to call on Parliament for a generous exercise of that great virtue inherent in a representative assembly—that of allowing the sufferings of no part of the people to be neglected, when public aid can be afforded for that necessity. I hope, then, that the house, without further delay, will proceed to take that primary step, and consider the all-important and special necessity of relaxing the restrictions on the importation of food into this country (cheers).

Mr. SHAW, while admitting the habitual poverty of the Irish people, was of opinion that the failure of the potato crop had been greatly exaggerated; even the commissioners, high as was their professional reputation, had fallen into the current delusion, promoted as it was for specific objects.

Mr. JOHN O'CONNELL considered the official information adduced by the Government a sufficient guarantee for the accuracy of the allegations as to the nature and extent of the distress. Since he had come over to his Parliamentary duties, he had found a strong sympathy existing on the part of members respecting it, and a great anxiety to adopt measures for its alleviation. Hitherto Ireland had been sacrificed to the selfish interests of England; the country had been treated on the now useless hand-and-mouth system, temporary remedies being provided for pressing exigencies, but for years forgetting and neglecting it. The Union had depressed the material and moral interests of Ireland; the life-blood of its body politic was exhausted by the drain of the absentee system, under which four millions and a half were annually abstracted from its resources; and the public money which the Government now proposed to bestow was not equal to the public revenue raised in Ireland and expended elsewhere. They did not beg for justice, though they had often demanded it; and he urged upon them the importance of subjecting the grievances of Ireland to a searching investigation, so as to discover their root and remove it.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL advised Mr. John O'Connell to seize every opportunity of urging, within that house, the wrongs of Ireland, and the remedies which he considered applicable. The House of Commons represented the United Kingdom, and it was its duty to listen to any statement of any grievance which might afflict any portion of it. He hoped that after the statement of Sir James Graham as to what the Government intended to do, Mr. O'Connell would not at present press his motion. It would be in his power to renew it if he found that the proposed measures were ineffective for the crisis.

Mr. LAWSON was afraid that Sir Robert Peel's measures would reduce England to the condition of Ireland, and he could not see the wisdom of permanently ruining one country in order to provide for a temporary calamity in another.

Mr. O'CONNELL withdrew his motion.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The adjourned debate on the Corn Laws and the commercial propositions of the Government was resumed by Lord JOHN MANNERS, who quoted the opinion of Count Camille, in which he considered the English Corn Laws as the result of the care of a Government which saw the wisdom of stimulating the production of its own soil, in order to render its population independent of foreign supply. Though favourable to moderate protection to agriculture, he confessed that, when he heard, last winter, that it was abandoned by all the leading statesmen of the country, he thought that the time was come when they should reconsider their position. But he would not adopt the proposed change on the contradictory arguments with which it had been urged; a terrified ministry was pressing their measure through a mystified Parliament, in order that it might be hurried into a premature law. Open the ports if the danger were imminent—now, late as it was; but let them leave it to the people of England to say whether of not they should be closed. It had been said that this country could not stand a revolution once a year, but Sir R. Peel seemed to think that it could stand a half-yearly revolution. Prussia was said to be "shaken," but he saw no public sign of it. Why should she, when we give her, without equivalent, all that she can ask? As to France, public opinion was led by such men as Arago, Thiers, and Berryer, who were opposed to any relaxation of their protection system. He neither dreaded Free Trade, nor hoped much from it, but he deprecated a rash and hasty intermeddling with great interests, and was of opinion that the settlement of the question should be referred to a new Parliament.

Capt. LAYARD observed that, whatever might be the opinion formed by some honourable gentlemen on the other side of the house, concerning the great measure proposed to their consideration by the right honourable baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government, looking upon it as he did as a question of vital importance, as a question by which the great principles of Free Trade were at once to be established; or, should the measure be rejected, or for some time delayed (for he was one of those who never had the smallest doubt that Free Trade must ultimately succeed), it was his intention to give his warmest support to this great and beneficial measure, and he earnestly trusted that honourable gentlemen would well and deeply consider the fearful responsibility that would attach to them if they any longer banded themselves together, and, under the cry of protection to native industry, tried to maintain a monopoly which was nothing more nor less than a restriction on the food of the people. No cause that had ever been brought before a Parliament had ever progressed so rapidly as that of Free Trade within the last few months. Those who had been the most skillful and strenuous defenders of monopoly had thrown down their arms, and said they could no longer defend so weak and hollow a cause; and what arguments had the protectionists brought forward that had not been refuted over and over again (hear, hear)? They had stated that a quantity of land would get out of cultivation, but let them remember the meeting at Goatsacre, among the Wiltshire labourers, where the protectionists petitioned against protection, and where it was stated that when the labourer requested to be allowed to occupy and rent patches of ground, he was told by the farmer that he must pay 8*l.* for that for which the farmer paid but 2*l.* (hear, hear, hear). For his part he believed that with such an increasing population, that with such an impetus that would be given to trade were this measure carried, that so far from any land being uncultivated, we should find in places where now there was only a wilderness and a game preserve, we should shortly see extensive and flourishing gardens (hear, hear). In every experiment made by the right honourable baronet approaching Free Trade he had been eminently successful, and the last alteration in the tariff had more than realised his most sanguine hopes. What was the use of experience? Were they to shut their eyes to it? Were they to be forever blind (hear, hear)? However that might be the case with some honourable gentlemen, he believed a far different feeling began to pervade the country; and he believed a better truth could not be adduced to support the truth of the assertion than the wise, the judicious choice made the other day by the West Riding of Yorkshire, a choice in his mind equally honourable to the electors and the elected (hear, hear, and cheers). What would be a more ample proof of the alteration which had come over the feelings of the people than that a few years ago the noble lord was beaten because he was not a sufficient protectionist, and now he stood in the proud position of their representative as a Free Trader. When he heard the right honourable gentleman, the Secretary-at-War state in his Free Trade speech—which he congratulated him upon—when he said in that speech that the Corn Law of 1815 was, in his mind, a great mistake, he agreed with him in that opinion; nay, for his part, he went further, and not only thought it a great mistake, but a great crime. By that mistake or crime, whichever they chose to call it, commerce had been crippled, agriculture had been injured, crime and misery had increased. It had given rise to difference of feeling greatly to be deplored. But, like other crimes, it had brought its own punishment (hear). It had for years kept the agriculturists in hot water and uncertainty; and at last received its just retribution and condemnation by the very hand that millions had been spent to raise in its defence (hear). They were told by the protectionists that it was by this law that great and glorious England had taken her stand as one of the greatest nations of the earth. But what a fallacy! He would give them an illustration. He supposed no one, either in the house or out of it, would doubt for a moment that the right hon. baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government was a Free Trader (hear, hear). Now did any one suppose for a moment, that because the right honourable gentleman had lived with the protectionist party, had spoken with them, and had acted with them, that that was the reason he was a Free Trader (loud cries of hear, hear)? Certainly not. These had been his hindrances; in spite of all these he was a Free Trader, from honest and sincere conviction. And who could doubt that he would have been a Free Trader long ago, if it had not been for these unhappy connections? So it was with England. It was not on account of these Corn Laws she had become great and glorious, but in spite of them; and she would no doubt have arrived at a higher pitch of grandeur if she had not suffered from the ill effects of these baneful laws. He (Capt. Layard) could not help expressing his surprise (though certainly there were times when a wise man ought to be surprised at nothing) at the course about to be taken by the noble lords on the other side of the house. He alluded to the noble lord (Viscount Sandon), the member for Liverpool, and the noble lord the member for Newark. The first noble lord made a speech in favour of protection, which was claimed, and justly so, by the honourable baronet the member for Oxford (loud cries of hear, hear). The right hon. gentleman the Secretary at War had also put in his claim, but in his opinion, fit was about as just a one as the American claim to Oregon, and seemed to show that right hon. gentleman to be of a very avaricious disposition, as the noble lord had, in the division he had made of himself, given his old friends (the government) what they no doubt considered upon this occasion the better half, namely his vote. Now the line thus pursued by the noble lord put him in mind of a circumstance that happened a few years ago. A person at Huntingdon having given a vote to a successful candidate, the member, from those pure motives of gratitude which actuated so many politicians, procured for the man the place of chorister at Canterbury. But when he was required to perform the duties, he was found to have no voice at all. Some one patronised by the genius of poetry, though in a very inferior degree to the hon. member for Pomfret, put the story into rhyme, and it ran thus—

"A singing man and cannot sing!

No need to thank your patron's bounty.

Excuse me, sir, if I can't sing,

My voice is in another county."

(loud laughter). So it was with the noble lord the member for Liverpool, who had made a right good speech for protection as far as was possible in such a cause, but his voice, like the chorister, was in a different direction (hear, and laughter). Then the noble lord the member for Newark wrote a letter to his constituents, and said if ever he was returned again, he would not vote in favour of protection. What the noble lord would now do it was impossible to say. He defied any member who had listened to the noble lord's speech to say what the noble lord's actual views on the question now were. He could not help thinking it would have been just as well if the two noble lords had paired off, and said nothing at all on the matter (hear, hear). Upon the last occasion that he (Captain Layard) had the honour of addressing the house upon this subject, he had foretold that the honourable baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government, and the present Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Gladstone) would become ere long Free Traders. He was delighted to find that his prediction had been correct, though at that time he was not sanguine enough to hope that the change would have been made so quickly and completely. But he congratulated them on having acted in a manner worthy of the high station in which their talents had placed them. They had been undismayed by the thunders of the Caucasus, unscared by the virulent attack of the honourable member for Shrewsbury—though, indeed, they were manifestly guilty of the charge brought against them by that gentleman—the charge of sacrificing that which was supposed to be the benefit of their party, to the welfare and happiness of their country. They had been told by the honourable members for Shrewsbury and Newcastle-under-Lyne, that rotten potatoes had given rise to rotten argument, that the fear of scarcity had been exaggerated, but the deplorable accounts received from Ireland unhappily too surely proved that the prudent measures taken by the Government were only those which were absolutely necessary; and he, for one, believed most men would agree with him in thinking that those who prepared for a scarcity acted more wisely, aye, and more conscientiously than those who, with the fact staring them in the face, of the fearful loss which had happened to the potato crop, endeavoured to argue that no scarcity need be feared at all. In that able pamphlet entitled "An Attempt to Estimate the Effect of Protecting Duties on the Profits of Agriculture, by Mr. Morton and Mr. Trimmer," it was proved to demonstration that the tenant-farmer and the agricultural labourer were considerable losers by this so-called protection. By that pamphlet was proved the truth of the declaration of the hon. member for Stockport, Mr. Cobden, that the system of protecting duties was a system of mutual plunder between the growers of the different descriptions of agricultural produce. He would have been delighted had the hon. baronet proposed to do away at once with all duty upon the importation of corn, because he believed the only danger to the agriculturists was the uncertainty with which they had to contend at present, and which must continue for the next three years—an uncertainty which prevented that self-reliance, that outlay of capital and industry, which could alone raise them to that independence which they ought to aspire to, but which was unattainable as long as they relied on artificial prices and a bolstering system (hear, hear, hear). He, for one, had the greatest reliance on the ability and judgment of the noble lord the member for London; that reliance was, if possible, increased when the noble lord made the assertion, which to him seemed so wise, but to many so startling, that protection was the bane of agriculture (hear, hear). For his part, he looked on this measure as a great and beneficial one; one not only advantageous to this country, but which set a bright example to the world at large (hear, hear), and an example worthy of all imitation. He would vote for this measure, believing that it would prove one great link to assist in binding together the nations of the earth in unity and peace (cheers).

Mr. R. PALMER (Berks) took an opposite course, expressing his willingness to assent to a temporary opening of the ports, but objecting that so great, sudden, and permanent a change should be based on a temporary difficulty. He contended that the Government measure would prove injurious to the whole agricultural interest, and declined to follow Sir Robert Peel in a path which he could not pursue.

Sir C. NAPIER said, he had hoped that after the able, brilliant, heart-stirring, and unanswerable speech of the right hon. baronet, the First Lord of the Treasury, the hon. members opposite would have allowed the debate to come to a conclusion this evening (ironical cries of "hear, hear," from the agricultural members). He feared, however, from what had fallen from the noble lord the member for Newark, that if it was still the intention of hon. members to proceed with this debate (loud cheers from the same quarter), they would, no doubt, follow out the same course of invective in which they had hitherto indulged against the right hon. baronet in the vain hope of inducing the right hon. baronet to alter his mind, and adopt another course. He was glad that the hon. gentleman who had last addressed the house, had not spoken in the same bitter tone of feeling as the other hon. members who had spoken on the same side. The great complaint that hon. gentleman had made against the right hon. baronet was, that he had proposed a new Corn Law in consequence of the potato crop in Ireland, and the depression and distress which was soon to follow it. But he (Sir C. Napier) did not see why the right hon. baronet was to be blamed alone. The right hon. baronet at the head of the Home Department had changed his mind as well as the right hon. baronet the First Lord of the Treasury (a laugh). The right hon. gentleman the Secretary at War had followed in their wake, and he believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was of the same opinion as the right hon. baronet. The rest of the Cabinet had also followed the right honourable baronet in adopting the just and popular view which he had taken (loud laughter). Why, then, was the censure of hon. gentlemen reserved for the right hon. baronet? He wondered that they had not blamed hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the house, who, having formerly been advocates for a fixed duty, now agreed in opinion with the noble lord, the member for London, and thought that the time was come for a total repeal of the Corn Laws. He was surprised that this charge had called forth no expressions of astonishment or indignation from those hon. gentlemen who ploughed with the same horses which they had yoked together twenty or thirty years ago (cheers and laughter). Had not the right hon. baronet told the house over and over again, that on the 1st of November he proposed to his colleagues to open the ports, and that he was only supported by three of his colleagues? The right hon. baronet, seeing that his colleagues would not agree with him, gave his resignation into her Majesty's hands. The noble lord the member for London then attempted to form an administration, but failed in the attempt, and he (Sir C. Napier), for one, rejoiced that he did fail, because when he saw the numbers who had deserted the standard of the right hon. baronet, he could not but think that the hostile array presented on the other side of the house, would have been much more formidable than it was likely to prove. The noble lord the member for Newark had asked why the right hon. baronet did not now open the ports? The noble lord blamed the right hon. baronet for not opening the ports, because in November he had expressed his opinion of the necessity for opening them; but he (Sir C. Napier) believed that if the right hon. baronet had proposed to open them now, hon. members opposite would have opposed the project just as much as they did the present measure (hear). He thought that the right honourable baronet was perfectly correct when he wished to open them. Honourable members opposite now told the right honourable baronet that they would much rather have an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws than a repeal at the end of three years; but he (Sir C. Napier) was not going to fall into that trap. He believed that the right honourable baronet had gone just as far as he could go (loud and ironical cheers from the agricultural members). Hon. gentlemen opposite hoped, by inducing the right honourable baronet to agree to this alteration, that the measure would be defeated in the House of Lords, but he trusted that it was a settled thing on that (the Opposition) side of the house, that they would not take the bait which honourable gentlemen were so ready to offer them. The noble lord the member for Newark had said that there ought to be an appeal to the country on this question. But this was the time, when Ireland was in a state of starvation—and honourable gentlemen must know that Ireland was in a state of starvation when they did not contradict what the right honourable baronet said on the subject—to make matters still worse than they were by an appeal to the country? The noble lord was the most extraordinary man (a laugh) whom he had ever heard speak on this subject. He changed his arguments constantly. The noble lord, who had always, he believed, been a sitting-scale nobleman (much laughter), was now ready, it seemed, to accept a fixed duty. The noble lord had changed his mind, just as the right honourable baronet had changed his, with this difference however, that the right hon. baronet changed his because he was convinced that he had been wrong; while the noble lord changed his in order to keep up his rents (oh, oh). Honourable gentlemen opposite did not like to hear the truth, but he would tell them very plainly what his opinion was on the subject, namely, that if they did not think their rents would fall in consequence of the measure there would be no opposition to it (hear, hear, from the Opposition side of the house, and "oh, oh," from the agricultural branches). He knew that plain speaking was not in fashion in that house, but he must remind hon. members that when interest swayed the human heart the mental vision was not always perfectly clear. The right hon. baronet had adverted to what had fallen from the honourable member for Northamptonshire (Mr. S. O'Brien), in relating a conversation which had taken place between the honourable member and his good friend the tenant farmer (hear). Now, he (Sir C. Napier) would take the liberty of giving a little advice to the hon. members opposite, and he would recommend them, instead of making long speeches, to grant long leases to their tenants (hear, hear), and then they would gain much more than they would get by protracting this debate. Let them go to Scotland, and see how the land was farmed there. That country had an adverse climate, three weeks behind that of England, yet let members look at the manner in which turnips were cultivated—let them look at the mode in which wheat was drilled, and the crops were threshed out by machinery, instead of employing men and horses. If they would imitate the example of Scotland, England would become an exporting instead of an importing country. "It may seem, sir," said the hon. and gallant officer, "very ridiculous in a sailor like me to give advice to hon. gentlemen opposite, on the subject of agriculture (hear, hear, and laughter), but I am myself a farmer, like they are (hear, hear). True, I am not a farmer of very long standing, having only been a farmer four years. I took at that time, four years ago, a farm of forty acres (renewed laughter). Honourable gentlemen may laugh, but what is good for 40 acres, is good for 400. I took, I say, a farm of 40 acres, and I wish I could have afforded to have taken more land. The land was very bad; what is called in Hampshire forest land, which had been under the plough 11 or 15 years. The land was very foul, and those who had it before me used to plough it with four horses and two or three men conducting them. As might be expected, they lost money by farming it. One man gave it up; another took it; no one could do anything with it, and they all went away ruined (hear). I hope I am not fatiguing the house (hear, hear, and a laugh). I began farming much in the same way as my predecessors had done, and the consequence was that in the first year I lost 200*l*. Sir, I began to think this was very bad farming (great laughter). I looked about me, and I saw a poor man, a neighbour of mine, who had a piece of land of 10 acres, who had always good crops, and who contrived to keep his land dry. I went to him and said, "Well, old boy (roars of laughter), how is it that you, who have no capital at all—you, who have only a little pony, your wife, and yourself (long-continued laughter), manage to have such good crops as you do?" In reply to my question he said, "If you will follow my advice you will have good crops too. Cleanse your ditches, level your banks, and drain your land well." I acted under his directions in managing my land, and the next year, in place of four or five quarters of oats, which was the utmost which the land had ever borne before, I had eleven quarters of oats to the acre (loud cheers). I went on under his advice, and now, instead of the land belonging to me lying fallow during the winter, as is the case with nearly all my neighbours, all my land with the exception of three acres, has crops upon it. If hon. gentlemen will do the same as I have done, they will, I doubt not, succeed equally well. "Mr. Speaker," continued the hon. and gallant member, "I have taken up arguments different from those used by others, because the question before the house was so completely worn out (hear, hear), that I thought it necessary to get up something fresh (a laugh), and to enlighten the agricultural mind" (cheers, and renewed laughter, in the midst of which the hon. and gallant member resumed his seat).

Mr. SHAW admitted Lord Morpeth's taunt, that the agricultural party were without a leader and without a head. It could not be otherwise, for they had just been abandoned by their "leaders." But though disorganised, without a plan, unofficered, and undisciplined, they were still undismayed. They were not so ignorant of the writings of Adam Smith, Ricardo, Macculloch, and all that class of men, as was imputed to them. But they knew something more; and, though admitting that there was much "abstract" truth in Free Trade views, there was a wisdom taught by experience, in relation to social happiness, which it was neither safe nor honest to discard. He criticised the conduct of the Government as exhibiting instability of mind, infirmity of purpose, political tergiversation, and Cabinet juggle; and contrasted Sir Robert Peel disavantageously with M. Guizot, whose decision of character ruled the destinies of France. If Sir Robert Peel, two years hence, proposed a repeal of the union with Ireland, in obedience to popular clamour, it would not surprise him more than two years ago would have been the anticipation of the repeal of the Corn Laws. At all events, the repeal of the Corn Laws would take away from the maintainers of the union in Ireland the argument that this country was the best market for their produce. Sir Robert Peel now committed suicide on his own power with the very weapon with which he had slain the political existence of Lord John Russell: he who, at the head of a powerful and united party, drove the noble lord from office, was now supplicating him to spare his Government. He advised the First Lord of the Treasury, quoting his word on a former occasion, not to throw the present Corn Law into the lottery of legislation, in the vain hope of drawing a better.

Mr. BRIGHT said that he had hoped when the hon. member for Bristol moved his amendment that they were to have the question of protection discussed, that when the right honourable baronet moved that proposition which had been so often and so ably brought forward by his honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton, they were to have the whole question fairly gone into, as being that about which the country really cared; for he could assure honourable gentlemen opposite that they never committed a greater mistake than in imagining that the great body of the people cared one farthing about the quarrel in the great Conservative party (Opposition cheers). He had been an attentive listener during the debate, and had endeavoured to find out any reasons which might be alleged in favour of agricultural protection. The honourable member for the University of Dublin would forgive him if he did not attempt any answer to his speech (protection cheering), as, if he was not mistaken, this was a discussion on the merits of protection, and on these merits the hon. gentleman had said not one syllable (Opposition cheering). He passed, then, to the speeches of those members who had attempted to grapple with the question. The hon. member for Bristol said that the farmers of England would not consent to sell cheap corn and buy dear sugar (hear, hear), and the honourable member for Lincolnshire had stated at a meeting lately held in Willis's Rooms that the colonies of England had been protected at a heavy expense to the English farmer (hear, hear). From this he gathered it to be the opinion of honourable gentlemen opposite that it was not fair to give protection to the colonial sugar grower if protection be withdrawn from the British grower of corn (hear, hear, and cheers). He admitted it most freely. If this great inroad were to be made in protection, the principle must be extended to all—manufacturers, agriculturists, and colonists. If, then, it were unfair to protect sugar and not corn, it must be clear that if there be any industry to which the Government did not now afford protection, that the protection which it extended to agriculture must be unjust to the class pursuing the unprotected branch of industry. He supposed they would not deny that (cheers). Well, he was then in some sense the representative of one of the largest trades carried on in this country, a trade to which no gentlemen on the opposite side had ever proposed to extend the protection of legislative enactments. Since he had entered the house a proposition had been made to remove restrictions on the export of machinery—much of it used in the trade referred to. Every honourable member connected with that trade had voted for it (cheers). Last year it was proposed to sweep away the protective duty of ten per cent. upon cotton yarn. Every honourable member connected with the trade voted for the proposition (cheers). And there was now not a person in any way interested in the business who did not regret that the right hon. baronet had not swept away every vestige of protection (cheers). But he would not talk of the cotton and woollen trades; he would come to that great branch of industry of which hon. members opposite talked so much and appeared to know so little (laughter, and oh, oh). He had passed by the door of the Central Office of the Protection Society the other day, and certainly the place did look what was generally called "seedy" (laughter), and very forlorn. There was not the least appearance of business, but he observed a handsome brass plate on the door, marked, "Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture and Native Industry" (laughter). Now, what was this native industry they were so anxious to protect? Did they recollect that in 1842 his honourable friend, the member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden), proposed that before they proceeded to make a law to raise the price of bread, it was becoming to ascertain whether it was possible to make a law to raise the rate of wages? What, on that occasion, was your answer? That spinners and weavers did not understand political economy—that it had long ago been settled that wages could not be raised by Act of Parliament. They had said so, and within an hour of the declaration they proceeded to make a law for the express purpose of raising the price of wheat which they had to sell—the produce of their own estates (cheers, and cries of Oh, oh). They would propose prohibition, if they dared and thought it safe (cheers, and cries of No, no). They did not mind the starving of an operative in Lancashire or a labourer in Wiltshire. To a certain point they seemed determined to carry prohibition (oh, oh). The population was increasing—the competition for food increasing, and therefore they hoped, as they said, that there would be an increase of profits to their farmers—a hope which the public was ill-natured enough to translate into a hearty aspiration for an increase of rents to themselves. But now, where was the protection to the labourer? He had heard a clergyman of the church of England say, that the protection of the labourer was the Poor Law. But it was as much the protection of the landlord. If the latter became poor he would betake himself to the union (oh, oh). But what protection had the labourer akin to the protection which the Corn Laws gave the landowner? This house, within the memory of many of those who now sat in it, had passed no law for the purpose of giving employment to the labourer, or raising the rate of his wages. The hon. member—the senior member, he believed, for Wiltshire (Mr. Bennett), at a meeting held the other day in his county, made a long speech to the farmers. He reviewed the condition of the agriculturists in this happy land, and concluded by stating that, had he to come into the world again—had his life to be lived over again—he knew no condition which he would choose with so much contentment—with so much pleasure as the humble lot of an agricultural labourer (laughter). He (Mr. Bright), really felt some delicacy (laughter) in saying anything which could imply a doubt of the sincerity of the hon. gentleman. He was older than he (Mr. Bright), he had lived among agricultural labourers all his days, and he ought to know something of their condition. However, after all, he would take the opinion of the agricultural labourers themselves upon the point, rather than that of the hon. member, landowner in Wiltshire though he was. Now, it happened that there was a meeting of peasantry, at which the matter was debated the other night, at Goatacre. He was aware that some hon. members had stated that that meeting was got up by the League (protectionist cheers). And he must say that the omnipresence of the League had been so impressed upon hon. gentlemen, that if he stated that the League had nothing to do with the Goatacre meeting, he believed that some of them would go away with the impression that, nevertheless, it had been concerned in it (ironical cheering from the protectionists). But there had been a second meeting at a place called Bremhill, at which the chair was taken by a labourer named John Gringell. He knew not whether this poor fellow was a pattern labourer of Wiltshire; but he told his auditory, "I be protected, but I be starving" (hear, hear, and cheers). And it was not in Wiltshire alone that such scenes were passing. Since he had come into the house a paper had been put into his hand by his honourable friend the member for Bolton, drawn up by a most respectable person at Tiverton, and containing accounts of the circumstances of twenty-eight families—the number of each family, and the wages earned by its members. And how much did these wages amount to? Why, 7*s.* a-week. These men—with wives, with five, or six, or seven children each—lived in miserable huts, and earned 7*s.* a week (loud cheers from the Opposition, and cries of "oh," from the protectionists). The honourable member for Northamptonshire said that the labourers there had 12*s.* a week. He asked him whether it was protection that had given the labourer in Wiltshire 7*s.* a week, and whether the peasant there had protection commensurate with that which Parliament had accorded to the owners of the soil (hear)? The hon. member for Northampton was very pathetic on the subject of the coachmakers, who he contended would be thrown out of employment by the change in the tariff; but if the hon. member would go to Southampton, and speak to Mr. Andrews, the great coach-builder there, he would be told that at this moment he was constructing carriages to go to almost every part of Europe (hear, hear). Why, he would not insult his countrymen as some honourable gentlemen did. He would not believe that they were so inferior in skill and enterprise that they could be beaten on all hands—by the French in matters of taste, or by the serf-cultivator in Poland (cheers). But honourable members persisted in expressing great horror at the consequences of the repeal of the Corn Laws. They were continually talking of an inundation of wheat. Now, we had different sorts of inundations. There were actual inundations of water—there were talked-of inundations of wheat; but it was the remark of an acute and distinguished writer on the subject, that rivers of wheat were as rare as rivers of gold. No country produced much more corn than was necessary for its own wants, and there was nothing in the circumstances of any foreign nation, which could make it a formidable rival to the agriculture of this country. They grew upon every acre in England a larger quantity of corn than was grown on a corresponding space in any country in the world (hear). There could be no doubt of the fact, and as little of the other fact, that of the produce of the land the English labourer got less for his share than fell to the lot of the actual tiller of the soil in any other country whatever (loud cheers, met by protectionist counter-cheering, and cries of Oh, oh). Why, if their prices were so much higher, as they said they were, and the wages they gave but 7*s.* a-week, and if each of their acres grew nearly twice as much as any other acres in the world, how could any conclusion be come to other than that the labourers of England received a smaller share of the produce of their toil than the peasantry of any other country in the world (cheers). Then look to the advantages by which the landowners were assisted. They possessed more manure, they had better and cheaper implements, they had better roads, and markets beyond comparison more valuable, and yet they complained of not being able to get on without protection (hear, hear). It was protection which had damaged them—they had protected their farmers into a state of decrepitude; and now, when a stimulus was to be applied, they trembled for the consequences. How did matters at present stand? Take the county of Cheshire. There they found a high aristocracy and a poor tenantry. Land of fair quality was most wretchedly cultivated—in fact, there were all the elements for the production of a mass of pauperism as great as that in the southern and western counties, had it not been for the proximity of Lancashire. It was not that the people of Cheshire were inferior to their Lancashire neighbours; but that an unfortunate system of legislation had destroyed the vitality of agriculture. The hon. member for Berkshire complained of the burden of poor-rates on the land. He (Mr. Bright) contended that the tenant farmers paid no poor-rate whatever on the capital they employed in farming. Those opposite complained that he (Mr. Bright) did not pay poor-rate on the machinery in his mill, and his stock in trade. Well, they could not wish to mete out another measure to the manufacturers from that which they applied to themselves. Let them see how this plan of taxation would work. The hon. member may have a tenant who had some thousands wherewith to cultivate his land; that tenant paid no poor-rate on his household furniture, on his stock, his growing crops, or his cattle, or his horses. Not a farthing poor-rate did he pay on all these things, nor on any portion of his capital, unless by permanent improvements it became incorporated with the land. Was that true or not? Now, if he (Mr. Bright) was obliged to pay on his machinery, it was quite clear the tenant farmers must pay on their stock (cheers). Such a system would be found totally impracticable, and as it would work infinitely greater injustice than service, he advised the honourable member for Berkshire to say nothing more about it (loud cheers).

Mr. PALMER : I only quoted Sir R. Peel's speech on that topic.

Mr. BRIGHT : Yes, but you used the right honourable gentleman's argument as unanswerable at the present time (hear, hear). There was another burden on land about which they heard nothing in that debate, and that was the burden of the game ("oh," from Col. Sibthorp and others). There were two sons of the Duke of Rutland had spoken in that debate, and were about to vote against the proposition of Government. Now, in 1844, that noble duke paid 915*l.* for game damage on 389 acres of land (an ironical cry of "hear" from the protectionists). Now, he asked honourable gentlemen how they could sanction a law which prevented a full supply of food being furnished to a starving people, and at the same time destroy large quantities of food by game, kept solely for their own gratification and amusement (cheers)? I believe, in reality (said the honourable gentleman), you are not afraid of a repeal of the Corn Laws. You are angry with the Government, but you are not afraid of protection being abolished. In this house and out of it you have said repeatedly "that if the Corn Laws were abolished the land would be neglected, that no rent could be paid by the tenants (an assurance some of you will be reminded of before 12 months elapse), the labourer would starve, the interest of the national debt would not be paid, that there would be no revenue, that a proud aristocracy would be lowered, that the church, and therefore Christianity, would be endangered, that the Crown itself would be insecure, and that the sun of England (whatever that means) would set for ever" (laughter and cheering). This is but a short list of the calamities that were to come upon the country. Now do you adhere to the statement, or are you anxious to repudiate it (hear, hear)? You exhibit no alarm, you show no resistance. You say that seven-ninths of the population are connected with agriculture, and that all connected with agriculture are in favour of protection; and yet, though all the calamities I have enumerated have been predicted by their leaders and guides, there is not the smallest prospect of insurrection (laughter). And the right honourable Secretary for the Home Department assures us that for the last twelve months not even the sound of sedition has been heard within the precincts of the Home-office (cheers and laughter). But you don't believe that any such dread calamities are at hand. The people don't believe it. Where are your public meetings? There was a meeting in Dorsetshire of 1500 persons (hear, hear, from the protectionists). I myself addressed 3000 in that county, and in that same field, and presented their petition for total abolition (cheers). But where else have you held meetings? Did you see the Lancashire petition with 300,000 signatures? Did you see the petitions of the metropolitan members signed by 400,000? And honourable gentlemen opposite came down with their 150 petitions, each with 12 or 18 signatures to each petition. Where is public opinion in your favour? Look to the public press. All the newspapers which have the widest circulation are almost without exception in favour of the Government proposal. The public laugh at your predictions, and you yourselves disbelieve them. We have heard of men going merrily to battle; there is the chance of escape, and the hope of such renown as successful battle gives; we have even heard of some reckless and daring criminals who have joked upon the scaffold; but never have we seen men sliding into the unfathomable abyss of ruin with faces so jovial and complacent as those of the honourable protectionists opposite (loud laughter from both sides). You say the right honourable baronet is a traitor. It would ill become me to attempt his defence after the speech which he delivered last night (loud cheers from the Opposition)—a speech I will venture to say more powerful and more to be admired than any speech which has been delivered in this house within the memory of any member of it (hear, and cheers again). I watched the right honourable baronet as he went home last night, and for the first time I envied him his feelings (cheering). That speech has been circulated by scores of thousands throughout this kingdom, and is speeding to every part of the world, and wherever there is a man who loves justice, and wherever there is a suffering creature whom you have trampled under foot, that speech will give joy to the heart of the one, and hope to the breast of the other (loud cheers). You chose the right honourable baronet—why? Because he was the ablest man of the party. You always said so, and you will not deny it now. Why was he the ablest? Because he had great experience, profound attainments, and, as you have always said, an honest regard for the good of the country. You placed him in office. When a man is in office he is not the same man that he is as when in opposition (laughter). The present generation, or posterity, does not deal as mildly with men in Government as with those in opposition. There are such things as the responsibilities of office (cheers). Look at the population of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and ask yourselves whether, with all your valour, and although you talk of raising the standard of protection, and cry "Down with the Anti-Corn-Law League," there are not men in your ranks (and I defy them), who will take that bench (the Treasury) pledged to a maintenance of this law (loud cheers)? The right honourable baronet took the only honourable course (a laugh from the protectionists). He resigned. He told you by that act "I can't any longer do what you want—I can't defend your cause." The right honourable baronet, no longer your minister, came back the minister of the Sovereign and of the people, and not the advocate of a class who placed him at their head for their own special and private objects (cheers). The right hon. gentleman has not used you badly. He offered no obstruction to your taking office (hear, hear, from Sir R. Peel). The right hon. gentleman stated distinctly that he had not advised the Sovereign to send for Lord John Russell, but that he left it to his Sovereign to use her own discretion as to the party to be selected for her minister. It would be presumptuous in me to assume the considerations that swayed the decision of the Sovereign, but I doubt not there entered into her mind the question, "Shall I select for office men pledged to uphold the present Corn Laws?" and the Sovereign doubtless felt that to have done so would have jeopardised the aristocracy, and have done a thousand times more damage to your institutions than the instantaneous sweeping away of every vestige of the system of protection (loud cheers). What sort of Government would you have made? There is a programme of your administration published this morning in the Times (a laugh). There is the hon. member for Somersetshire at the Board of Trade. I don't say that all the mills of Lancashire would have shut up at the announcement, but certainly either irrepressible laughter or general consternation must have followed in all the trading districts. Lord Stanley was to have been a leading man in your Government (loud cheers from the Protectionists). Now, recollect the noble lord's geography as to a Russian province (a laugh). The hon. member for Norfolk, who sits at the table, challenged my hon. friend, the member for Stockport to a discussion, at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, and in the courtly language of the Central Society he predicted there would be a "shindy." Well, the hon. gentleman proposed certain resolutions on principles which he said were advocated by Henry Clay, once president of the United States. Well, if one member of your cabinet knows so little of geography, and another so little of history, I am afraid your rule over the destinies of the empire would not be a very brilliant one (cheers). You were, too, to have the Duke of Richmond, remarkable for the freedom of his assertions. That noble duke said last week that my honourable friend the member for Stockport got thirty thousand pounds a week by his business, and that one of his own tenants paid a larger amount of poor-rates than all the Leaguers put together. That may be true; but if it is it says little for protection when one tenant of its greatest advocate is obliged to pay so much to the poor-rate of his parish. But what sort of Government would Lord Stanley, the honourable member for Norfolk, and the Duke of Richmond have formed? I am quite sure of one thing, that in all my public speaking, of which so much has been said elsewhere, I never said anything so disastrous to the aristocracy, and especially to the order of dukes, as has been said by the Duke of Richmond during the last four months (cries of hear, hear, from the Opposition, and "oh, oh," from Colonel Sibthorp and others). Yes: I refer to his exaggerated statements, to charges against men from whom he differed, to such statements as he made last night, "that it would be easy to send itinerant agitators in the manufacturing districts to show that cotton would burn as well as stacks" (loud cheers). And yet for men capable of such things you profess yourselves anxious to remove the statesmen who now occupy the Treasury benches? You know the country would not tolerate such a Government a week (Opposition cheers). I do not believe that even you are anxious to place the protectionists in office; but you wish to be avenged on those who have forsaken the obligations of party, in order to obey the call of a great country, imploring them to work out its commercial deliverance (cheers). I was going to make an observation to the honourable baronet, the member for Oxford, if he had not left the house: I fear the honourable baronet has forsaken his usual associates in politics—the Bishops (oh, and cheers). Henceforth I shall doubt his orthodoxy if he vote against the Government when all the Bishops are about to vote with them (cries of Oh, oh). Would any gentleman dare to say that when there is the intensest suffering in your counties, and when famine is at hand in Ireland, any one dignitary of a Christian church would dare to give a vote for preventing the opening of the ports, and allowing a supply of food to a starving people? The hon. baronet laments the breaking up of a great party. I doubt if the people of England will regret it. But the hon. baronet need not despair; while there is wrong to support, there will be a wrong party; while there is an abuse left, the hon. baronet will have an opportunity to defend it; so long as there is an imposition, civil or ecclesiastical, he may throw over it the shield of the constituency he represents—a constituency which, from the passing of the Oxford decree, in 1683, to this hour, has demonstrated that the minutest acquaintance with books is compatible with the profoundest ignorance of men (loud cheers). Now, as to the measure before the house, I hesitate not to say that it is a great measure, and does great credit to the Government (loud cheers). But great measures, like great pictures, are sometimes tarnished by defects, and I believe it is a serious defect in this measure that it does not propose an immediate abolition (cheers). I know that the tenant farmers in many districts prefer it to a gradual repeal. I ask for it not only because there is no alarm in the country, and men are giving higher prices for their farms, even now, when the Government proposition is on the table of the house, but on this ground, that we have always advocated the repeal of the Corn Laws, because they were a defiance of the laws of God, and an odious tyranny on our fellow men. If the emergency is so great as to justify the Government in going so far, it pronounces their condemnation if they stop where they are. If there be suffering throughout England, and a pending famine in Ireland (and no man is insane enough to deny it), the Government can never defend the duty of from 4*s.* to 10*s.* for three years on the importation of food (hear). Honourable gentlemen say the emergency is not great; if my honourable friend, the member for Manchester, had been allowed to obtain complete statistics of our agriculture, he might have known exactly how we stand; but as some will not believe in a flood while it drowns only those who dwell in cellars, others will not give credit to the existence of famine until it reaches Belgrave-square (hear, and cheers). The hon. member for Hertford and the noble lord who sits for Warwickshire, made an attack on the League because they were said to purchase votes in the counties. I recommend them to read the decision of the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. He says it is a course not only legal but laudable (cheers). If there be any member of this house who fears that the incompleteness of the Reform Bill may give cause to agitation, it must be a matter of rejoicing to him that a mode has been discovered by which tens of thousands of honest, industrious, and meritorious artisans have brought or may bring themselves within the pale of the constitution (hear, and cheers). But not a farthing have the Anti-Corn-Law League given for qualifications. We merely ask those who are of Free Trade principles to qualify for counties if they have the means of doing so. A noble lord elsewhere has called on the Government to put down that proceeding. I am not afraid that his advice will be taken. The League is expressly framed for the purpose of procuring the total and immediate abolition of the Corn Laws, and when that abolition is effected, its organisation will be instantaneously dissolved—but not till then (Opposition cheers). I doubt not that the class of men who through its instrumentality may obtain the franchise will use it at least as independently as the tenant farmers, and as much for the good of their country (hear, hear). I ask the hon. members opposite, representing pocket boroughs and nomination counties, what they imagine their countrymen will think of the course they are now pursuing; when, if there be truth in the minister—if there be truth in the statements of the hon. member for Cork, and of all those who had any opportunity of being acquainted with the facts, there was a terrible calamity impending over the country for which somebody must be responsible (cheers)? The Government say they will not take that responsibility upon their shoulders, and sooner than do so, they risk everything to remove it, and ask this house to do that which common justice at all times requires, but which necessity now demands (hear, hear, and cheers). I ask you if you think that the gratification of your vengeance against the minister will be held as any excuse for the course you are now pursuing by your country and by posterity? Do you believe it will? You know that your Irish fellow-subjects are fainting, dying of hunger,—that millions are almost foodless, and are driving on to despair. Should you succeed in breaking up the Government,—in dissolving Parliament,—in rejecting a great and wise and most necessary measure,—how glorious, how compensating will be your reward, when you reflect that by your factious conduct you have been successful in bringing misery and ruin upon multitudes of the most defenceless of your countrymen! (The hon. gent. resumed his seat amid loud cheers).

Mr. HUDSON said he was compelled to claim the indulgence of the house on the present occasion, for though it was true he not unfrequently addressed public meetings, he felt he was now about to speak on a question of no ordinary importance, before a house with the forms of which he was imperfectly acquainted. He was not returned from any pocket or nomination borough (protectionist cheering). He came there as independently as the honourable member for Durham (renewed cheering), and he could return to his constituency with as much consistency and honesty of purpose as that honourable gentleman, or any honourable member in that house (cheers). As to the question now before them, feeling its great and paramount importance, he had deeply reflected and thought upon it in its various bearings. He had listened to the speeches and arguments of the right honourable baronet and gentlemen opposite, and he had read and thought upon the subject as a man who was interested—and justly interested—in the welfare of his fellow-men (hear, hear). With the deepest attention he had listened to the speeches of the right honourable baronet, but he confessed he saw nothing in the arguments therein adduced to alter his firm conviction that the opinions he entertained, when first he addressed the electors of Sunderland, were not based on sound and constitutional principles. The right honourable baronet had grounded this measure on the failure of an article of home-grown food—but we had, in his (Mr. Hudson's) opinion, nothing whatever to do with an unfortunate calamity of that nature. No man more sympathised with the persons who had fallen under it than he did—no man had heard the right hon. baronet with greater feelings of regret and distress, or with a greater anxiety to alleviate the sufferings of the sister country than he did; but he contended that the house could not be called upon to legislate so extensively as the present measure; because, if a practical calamity, however sudden its effect, these effects might be met by employing the executive powers conferred by the constitution. He did not think that the right hon. baronet had treated the party to which he had belonged with that fairness which they had a right to expect (protection cheers). He had appealed to the distress which might soon be feared as the grounds for this measure, and had drawn a terrible picture of its effects, to induce Parliament to concur in this measure. He (Mr. Hudson) thought a far different course should be adopted, and believed, if the danger of want were so great; the best way to provide for it would be by a public subscription. If the emergency were so great and pressing as it was said to be, why did not Government come down at once, and propose to Parliament some measure for immediate relief? The feelings of the house had been influenced by the pictures of harrowing distress; and if those statements were correct, he called on the right hon. baronet and the executive Government to take up the matter at once, and to provide instant measures of relief. Such meatures would, he was sure, be favourably received by all parties, and he had no doubt honourable gentlemen opposite would readily concur in giving their support. He objected, on public grounds, to such extensive legislation, to meet a want which was merely temporary, and thought it would have been much better to have made a suitable motion in the House for its relief, than to have introduced such a measure as that before them. As to the question, whether or not a repeal of the Corn Laws was advisable, he admitted there was room for the greatest possible discussion, but in that discussion, he contended, they ought not to be encumbered by the consideration of other topics. The right hon. baronet grounded his first appeal to the House for the removal of the present system of Corn Laws, on the good effect resulting from the tariff and the other commercial changes of the year 1842. He had since been compelled to abandon that position, and go back to 1825, for he found his argument untenable, and discovered that other measures had contributed to the prosperity of the country, besides the alteration in the tariff (hear, hear). The first interview he (Mr. Hudson) had with Her Majesty's Government resulted from his desire to effect the continuance of a railway between England and Scotland, which, owing to the great depression existing in this country from the extensive importation of foreign corn could not be carried on. From 1839 to 1842, in consequence of that, the balance of trade had been decidedly against this country, and the result was, it was utterly impossible to raise any fund for the execution of the works. In his anxiety to carry out that system, which would, he believed, confer greater benefits on the country than any other measures the right honourable baronet would propose, he had gone about begging from company to company, for the purpose of procuring a guarantee of 6 per cent. to the promoters of the new line, and that was the period of her Majesty's Government during which the right hon. baronet maintained there was great prosperity (hear). In his exultation at the supposed success of his measure the right hon. baronet, on the second night he addressed them, forgot how much he was indebted for the prosperity he mentioned to the large production of wheat at home (hear, hear, from Sir R. Peel). It was all very well for the right hon. baronet to say "hear hear," but he could not join in his exultation unless it appeared that the prosperity of that period was produced during an importation of foreign corn. The fact was, the prosperity of the country, and the ease of the monetary system at that time, was not owing to the cheapness of corn, nor the result of altered tariffs, but entirely arose from the plentiful produce of wheat and other grain at home, and from the employment of capital throughout the country. The right honourable baronet proposed to reduce the duty on shoes, on papers, and other articles of produce. Did not the matter resolve itself, then, into a question of labour? He believed that the labourers here could not contend with labour from abroad. The shoemaker was required to pay poor-rates, county-rates, and other charges which did not affect the labour of the foreigner. He had taken some pains to ascertain what would be the probable price of wheat under the present bill; he had had large dealings with the interest more immediately affected, and had felt that it would not be right to offer an opinion on the subject without consulting many practical men. He recollected having a corn speculation in 1837, and he was enabled to deliver wheat in the ports of this country, all charges paid, at 25s. a quarter, weighing 61½ pounds. What he had done in 1837, why should he not do in 1849 (hear, hear)? Before they entered on a measure of this importance, affecting such vital interests, they ought to have been furnished with information as to the probable price at which corn could be delivered. If he took a reduction in price of 10s. as the probable effect of a Free Trade in corn, he thought he should not be taking an unfair view of the matter, or one not borne out by the information which he had received. He would assume that the average price of corn in this country under the new bill would be from 35s. to 40s. He should rejoice in its success, but he could not refuse to communicate to that house the information he had received from various quarters and from practical sources. He would like to ask the right hon. member for Wiltshire, who had spoken of the distress prevailing amongst agriculturists, and declared at the same time that he thought protection was of no benefit to agriculture, if he thought that with the taxes required to pay the interest of the national debt and other charges, the farmers would be better off at the price of 35s. to 40s. a quarter than at the present rates (hear)? Why, it appeared to him to be mockery and an attempt to deceive. The right honourable member had talked of distress in the agricultural districts—he wished the right hon. member would come into Yorkshire, as another gentleman had wished him to come into Northamptonshire, and the right hon. member would see no distress. As to its being a matter of rent, he believed firmly and honestly that it was no such matter. If the land were let without rent, he believed the farmer would not be able to cultivate it (hear, and a laugh). The right hon. baronet said the farmers of England would be as well off as before, and that he would not make any reduction in the charges of the income tax. He (Mr. Hudson) had got a paper called THE LEAGUE, which had ventured an opinion as to what would be the probable result of the operation of this bill. In 1849 they thought the bill might work exceedingly well; but they went on to state their opinion that it was at least equally probable that the 1st of February, 1849, might be the commencement of a period of unexampled distress and ruin to the whole class of farmers, re-acting with fearful weight on the entire community. That was the opinion expressed by persons who had been the agitators of this question. He was not prepared, on the experiments of the moment, to recall the opinions he had entertained for many years. He was not prepared, because the right hon. baronet had changed his opinions, he believed most unsatisfactorily to every person, to throw over those principles under which this country had risen to a height of prosperity unparalleled in the world. The effect of the Government proposal would be to throw large quantities of land out of cultivation. Afterwards for a time we might revel in low prices; no doubt there would be abundance; but the manufacturer would not derive the benefit he anticipated, for he would lose his best customer—the home customer (hear). That when a bad harvest came, we should have high prices, and the right hon. baronet would have to come down to the House with some proposal to give food to the people. He believed in his conscience that the measure would be ruinous to the best interests of the country, and it ought not to be forced without an appeal to the constituency. (Hear, hear.) If Ireland were in a position of distress and difficulty which rendered interference in her behalf, on the part of the legislature, necessary, let some temporary measure of relief be introduced by all means, but let not the whole commercial system of this country be subverted, and the experience of many years be totally disregarded, in order to meet the pressure of a temporary calamity. (Hear, hear.) He felt that he was discharging his duty to his constituents, and the country at large, by opposing the measure which had been introduced under the patronage of the right hon. baronet at the head of Her Majesty's Government. (Hear, hear.)

Lord DUNCAN moved that the debate be adjourned till Thursday next.—Motion carried.

LEAGUE REGISTRATION.—The registration movement, so far from having been checked by the prospects of speedy success in the League movement, seems but to gather strength. At a meeting of the Freeholders' Building Society, held in the Free Trade Hall on Wednesday night, the extraordinary number of 1300 new shares were taken up by persons resident in various parts of the country, making a total of 5200 shares engaged in two months; in other words, 5200 new freeholds, each giving a county vote, are bespoken! The meeting presented an extraordinary scene, upwards of 50 money stewards being engaged in racing about the immense hall for more than two hours and a half to receive the subscriptions of members. No less than 250 gentlemen in Liverpool have bought qualifications in South Cheshire, 125 in Oldham, 81 in Ashton, 60 in Rochdale, 60 in Manchester, 25 in Stockport, 24 in Congleton, 20 in Chester, 20 in Northwich, 18 in Leek (Staffordshire), 10 in Nantwich, 10 in Bury, 9 in Macclesfield, 6 in Sandbach, 4 in York, and 4 in Holmes Chapel—total, 726! These are independent of many new qualifications obtained by Free Traders in the agricultural districts of Cheshire. It will be seen that the plan is to purchase qualifications, not for the county alone in which the purchaser is resident, but to give the register "a lift" wherever it can be done with most effect. All the League does is to receive lists of properties for sale giving a vote, and by this means the money is so well laid out that the purchaser makes a good investment, generally ensuring a return of 6 or 7 per cent.

FORTY SHILLING FREEHOLDS.—The 30th Jan. is now past, and no freeholds, hereafter purchased, will be available for the register of 1846. Now, therefore, is a fitting time to report the issue of the effort that has been made in Newcastle and Gateshead, since the great Free Trade meeting of the 5th inst. to strengthen the Anti-Corn-Law cause in North Durham and North and South Northumberland. North Northumberland was not thought of in the first instance; but an application from Edinburgh, indicating the anxiety of Scottish Free Traders to "come over and help them," induced the committee on the Tyne to extend their operations farther than they had originally intended. The result is, that 73 freeholds have been conveyed to Free Traders residing in Edinburgh, Dundee, and other places, at an expense to the purchasers of 2457*l.*, exclusive of the cost of conveyance, which also falls on the newly made Northumberland freeholders. In South Northumberland 123 freeholds have been purchased, and 118 in Durham. The total number in the three divisions is 314, North, and the total cost nearly 10,000*l.* Lord Brougham's spiteful speech of the 22d inst. justifies us in repeating (although the repetition is, perhaps, superfluous), that not a penny of the expense has been borne by the League. The new freeholders have themselves provided the purchase money.—Observer.

ORIGIN OF THE LEAGUE.—In consequence of the reference in the Daily News, and by Lord Radnor in the House of Lords, to the seven persons who originated the movement which gave rise to the National Anti-Corn-Law League, we have had letters from various parts of the kingdom requesting us to name the individuals. They were, Edward Baxter (now of Belfast), W. A. Cunningham, Andrew Dalziel, Jas. Howie (now of Edinburgh), James Leslie, Archibald Prentice, and Philip Thomson. At the second meeting of the association, although above 50 persons had given in their subscriptions, there was again an attendance of seven, the place of Mr. Baxter, who was absent, having been taken by Mr. William Rawson, now the Treasurer of the League. Mr. Rawson was the first Englishman who joined the association. Of the original seven, six were natives of Scotland, and one of Ireland. The grand impulse to the movement was given when Mr. Cobden, who was abroad at the time of its origination, joined it. The first person who subscribed more than 5*s.* was Mr. Robert Stuart, now one of the magistrates for the borough, who, on being applied to, said, "What is the use of subscribing 5*s.*? Put me down for 10*l.*"

DANIEL O'CONNELL.—The London correspondent of the Liverpool Chronicle says:—"Daniel O'Connell is breaking up; he no longer treads the ground firmly, and walks fast, with carriage debonnaire. 'Poor Dan's a-cold,' and creeps along with chin resting on breast bone, or would rest there, but for the ample folds which pillow it up and keep him warm. I never saw such a change in a human being as that which O'Connell presented yesterday in the Strand, compared with the burly and active man of last year. Unable to creep—there is no other word for it—he hailed a cab, or, rather, I should say, the cabman, seeing the enfeebled state of the old man, hailed the great Liberator, who immediately groped into the vehicle with a sigh."

A musician, in giving notice of an intended concert at Cleveland, Ohio, said, "A variety of songs may be expected, too tedious to mention."

THE NEW JOHN GILPIN.

SHOWING HOW PEEL WENT FURTHER THAN HE INTENDED, AND CAME SAFE HOME AGAIN.

(From Punch.)

Sir Robert was a Minister

Of credit and renown;
And eke, by virtue of his place,
Adviser to the Crown.

Now Richard Cobden said to him,
"Protected Corn has been Thro' thrice ten tedious years since eight-Een hundred and fifteen.

"Yet landlords and eke tenants say
Of profits they despair;
Despite Protection, growing corn
Is a losing affair.

"There's Mr. Bright, and there's myself,
And Mr. Fox make three;
We've raised a League, and you must ride
(As Ben says) after we."

Said Peel, "Your doctrines I admire,
But I am only one;
Still, if the Duke will stick to me,
I'll try what can be done.

"I am a Premier stout and bold,
As all my party know;
And my good friends in Manchester
Will lend their horse to go."

Now see him in his new Tariff,
On Free Trade—noble steed!
Full slowly taking duties off,
With caution and good heed.

Then came the blight, and fears arose
We'd not have food to eat,
Free Trade, from walking, 'gan to trot,
Which shook Peel in his seat.

"Fairly and softly," Peel he cried,
But Peel he cried in vain;
The trot became a gallop soon,
And Free Trade flew again.

Then giving up, as needs he must
Who cannot help his plight,
Peel seized Free Trade, and like a shot Flew past Protection quite.

Free Trade, who by a Tory lord
Had ne'er been cross'd before,
What thing upon his back had got
Did wonder more and more.

Away went Robert—neck or nought
Past Radical and Whig;
He little thought when he began
His bill would be so big.

The Post did bark, the Herald scream'd,
Out spoke the farmers all,
And every Duke cried out "For shame!"
As loud as he could bawl.

Away went Robert! Who but he?
Free Trade still gaining ground,
He carries weight—he'll win his race,
His horse's wind is sound.

Still, as Division-day drew near
'Twas wonderful to view
How overboard the men in place
Their old convictions threw.

Thro' manufactures of all kinds
His gambols he did play,
And came to Corn Laws at the last,
Which stood dead in the way.

The sliding scale he knock'd about
Unto his friends' dismay,
And fix'd how that at three years' end
The tax should die away.

Free Trade, not satisfied at all
To wait for three years more,
Straight gallop'd off with all his might,
As he had done before.

Away went Robert, with the League,
Still thundering at his heel,
Insisting loud in total and Immediate repeal.

The county members in the house,
Thus seeing Robert fly,
With Lord John Russell in his rear,
Set up a hue and cry:

"Stop thief! Stop thief! a highwayman!"
Not one of them was mute,
And Ben D'Israeli and Colquhoun
Did join in the pursuit.

In the "Protection" heavy coach,
The Upper House gave chase;
But Free Trade's bottom, bone, and wind,
Made it a hopeless race.

The race is run, the race is won
With credit and renown;
Nor did Free Trade draw breath until
The Corn Laws he ran down.

Now let us sing, Long live the League,
And Cobden, long live he;
And when Peel next doth ride Free Trade,
May Punch his Laureat be.

SHEPTON MALET.—The League has sustained a heavy loss in the death of W. Richardson, Esq., of this place, who was one of its most zealous and active members. He has for many years past been actively engaged in disseminating the principles of Free Trade; and in this neighbourhood he stood for a long time almost alone in their defence. The day before his death, which was sudden, he was distributing the subscription books of the League among his friends, which shows how near and dear its cause was to him. He died on Saturday last, the 7th inst., and is much lamented by a large circle of friends and by his fellow-townsmen at large, for he was ever a friend to suffering humanity, and to every cause which had for its end the moral and intellectual improvement of his fellow creatures.—J. FREE TRADE MEETINGS.

MEETING OF THE WORKING CLASSES AT NEWBURY.

NEWBURY, FEB. 13.—The protection demonstration made a few days ago in this town has led to a counter-movement of the working-classes. This evening they assembled to the number of at least 1000 in the market-place, in compliance with the requisition of men of their own order, and with the view of making such a public manifestation of their opinions that no one could have reason to infer that they sympathised with the advocates of the existing Corn Laws. Although public meetings held entirely by the labouring population are novelties in a purely agricultural district, nothing could exceed the decorum and propriety with which the proceedings of this evening were conducted. There were no noisy interruptions, no squabbling or confusion of any sort, but the audience—humble and coarsely clad, and poor as they were—listened with earnest attention to each speaker, who addressed them.

W. GRIFFITHS, a working man, and who was selected to fill the chair, was the first spokesman. He said, fellow townsmen and labourers, you have done me the kindness in calling me to the chair, and I'll do the best in my power; but when I look around me and see so many more able, I call it a great charge. But when we see, from the length and breadth of the land, a question agitated from the humblest to the noblest, it becomes us to see if you will approve the measure brought before the Legislature (hear hear). Having called on the mover of the first resolution,

G. ADRIY said—Fellow countrymen, I appear before you to-night as a stranger almost, for I have been living in this town only six months, but my heart is glad to see there is no law to keep us from a meeting like this. We are here as a party of working men, and so you must expect nothing but working men's speeches (hear, hear). I am not here to try and instruct those superior in life, but to speak my opinion of the Corn Laws to my fellow men of my own rank. I have wondered, while living in the town, that my fellow men have been so backward in not calling a meeting like this, seeing we have so long laboured under that cursed law, the Corn Law. Perhaps before Saturday I may be asked by my professed friends my reason for being here, and to save them the trouble I will tell now my reason—because I believe the law a curse to the nation (hear, hear). I think that it is every man's duty to leave the world better than he found it; and if we go out of the world leaving the Corn Law we do not do our duty (cheers). My friends, our retired habits seldom bring men like me before the world; but it is needful to do so; and I have felt astonished that you did not come forward before, because, in the county I belong to, there has been meetings for two years, ten of which I attended; and we have had gentlemen come from Bath and other towns, who thought it no disgrace to take the chair. Now I wish some of the gentry in this county would do so, and let the labouring men tell the miserable state they are in from distress and the bread tax. If the Corn Law is for our benefit, our condition would be comparatively good; but I ask you—is your condition good (cries of "no, no")? If not, speak out, and let the protectionists sound your condition. The Corn Laws made food dear; they have impoverished the farmer, so that he cannot give wages, and instead of the land employing more hands, they have been getting fewer on it for years (hear, hear). I say, if such is the case, there must be terrible distress in the agricultural labourers—and they have been in great distress (hear, hear). The New Poor Law passed to suppress the poverty which the Corn Law created, but it failed in its effect (cheers). We must then, my friends, fix our hopes on abundance of provisions, which will be the result of Free Trade, and I hope that every one here will sign a petition for Free Trade. I watched the proceedings a week ago at the council-room. A poor humble man went and asked them, "If there were any questions to be asked?" and he was scornfully answered, "No." If there is any protectionist here to-night that wishes to ask a question, if we can answer it we will, and if we cannot we will tell him so (hear, hear). But without alluding to this county at all, I say that if we watch with a discerning eye the proceedings of the protectionists in the land, we should be able to judge of their cause even though we knew nothing of the Corn Laws. They are like a party of men going into the field to fight; but they like a gun of their own sort, not one with a straight barrel, but one that would shoot round the corner, without their being shot at again (laughter). In Wiltshire, the chairman of the agricultural protection society got one of his men, when just roused out of a sleep to sign a petition to say that he was not in distress, and the petition had been sent up to Sir R. Peel, to show that Wiltshire was well off. This man had six children besides himself and his wife, and only 7s. a-week wages; and yet he was made to sign a petition of this sort. There was 1s. of that for rent, and 1s. for firing, and 1s. for soap and other household necessities like that, and the rest was all remained for feeding and clothing himself and his family. Now, I think that at the end of six months his stomach would be able to digest a total repeal of the Corn Laws. The protectionists used to say that the labourer could fill his stomach with potatoes; but suppose this true, I ask you if he had a horse worth 30l., would he be satisfied on a long journey to give his horse coarse hay and no corn (hear, hear). It is not the quantity we want, it is the quality; and why should we not have good wholesome food like the protectionists? we could have it if it was not for the tax on it (hear). I assert, if protection it is that the farmers get, it is a very curious sort of protection in some cases. Some time ago, in a part of the country, foxes became extinct; but it was determined that fox-hunting should not be done away with; so foxes were imported from France, and turned loose on the land; and such was the farmer's loss of poultry, that it was quite enormous (hear, hear, and laughter). Now this is the sort of protection that the landowners give. They keep up a stock of foxes for hunting, and all sorts of game, to cut up the farmer's profits. Yet the farmer was foolish enough to be led about by the landowners, like a brown bear led by an Italian through the country (cheers and laughter). I remember, in a village near my own, that I spoke something about the Corn Laws; and for what I then said I had almost to beg my life; but now it was very different, for since then the labourers had found out that it was not true, as they had been led to believe, that when bread was 9d. a gallon they were not better than now that it is 14d., even though the wages were higher. At the meeting in the council-room the other day, the protectionists said that they had high objects in view; that they would petition the House of Commons, and the House of Lords, and these were not enough, but that they would petition to the king of kings. Now, I think that, however weak my speech should be, in the ears of the protectionists, I could say nothing weaker than that (hear, hear). To think that a man could utter such a weakness as to petition the king of kings to starve the poor of the nation (hear, hear). Any one would blush to think that a land of light like England should produce a mind of such heathen darkness. I believe that Sir R. Peel had honesty about him, and that the landlords crammed him with lies, telling him that the working men were comfortable (hear, hear). Now, the scale of living was to this effect, not among the working classes, but among—first, the transported thief, the convicted thief, the suspected thief, the soldier, the able-bodied pauper, and then the independent protected labourer—or the poor white slave (hear, hear, and cries of "That's true"). If I am not mistaken, the average runs to 330 ounces of food per week to the others, while the protected labourer gets only 122 ounces (cries of Shame). Was it not enough to make the labourer a desperate man when he found that he couldn't get with working hard in so good a condition as the man who was transported. I remember on a Saturday night, about six weeks ago, not very far from this, hearing a grocer remark to some one with him, "There are not many country people here to-night; but when we look at what they get, is it a wonder that there are not many more on Saturday nights?" In the parish where I used to live, the clergyman and his lady went to a poor man's house and asked him how he was getting on; and the man told him that he was not well off. They were at the time dining on two-penny worth of bacon, and three-quarters of a gallon of bread, so the lady told them it was "delicious" living; and when they spoke of distress the parson told them that there were too many people in the world (shame, shame). Now, I ask you if it is not an awful insult to the face of God to say this? Can we suppose that God created more than he was able to provide for (cheers)? I ask you, when I came to this town, did I not, with my family, bring my wants too? The man where I buy my bread and my groceries, knows that I have. But let me have a day's work and fair wages for it, and Free Trade, and we'll spend it right merrily (cheers).

The following resolution, having been moved and seconded, was then carried unanimously:

"That this meeting is of opinion, that any duty on the importation of grain and other articles, is undesirable, and that we, therefore, are anxious to sign a petition to the House of Commons that trade shall be free."

—JACOBS, apparently from his accent, a foreign Jew, then addressed the meeting. I have been called here (he said), to do my duty, and propose a resolution to you, my fellow-workmen. The question is, whether we are to have food to eat sufficient to keep up our strength, or we should starve? The meeting is to consider whether we should have Free Trade or not; whether there should be taxes and restrictions on food, or whether we should have as much of it as we want. I am a foreigner, and know that you boast that yours is a land of liberty; but it is an easy thing to boast that you are free. I am sorry to say you are not free. Every man that is free should have the liberty of his hands and legs, his head and his body. If a man's legs are tied he is not free; and if you say that this is a free country, I deny it. You can't pay for your loaf where you will, for your sugar where you will; you must buy it from the monopolist; and if such is the case, I ask you if you are free (hear, hear). But as you have got the name of being free, and have some of the privileges, I hope that you will raise your voices, and try to break down the monopoly of corn and other food, because it ties your hands and legs, and prevents your liberty (cheers). What have the agriculturists gained by protection? If you listen to me I will tell you. Agriculture, if it is so protected, I suppose that it is the better off it. That should be the result. But if I can show that protection has been a curse on that and every other class of the people, I think it should not exist. The farm labourer has to work for 7s. a week on the average, and what then can he afford to buy? What is he likely to use? What food? What clothing, and what sort of bed? His cottage is strewn with gravel, for there was not even a brick in it. At least, there were plenty of that sort in Wiltshire. His food was principally of potatoes (hear). Now will any of the protectionists tell me that the labourer can't eat beefsteaks as well as he can do. Can't he eat good bread? I think I could eat it. If the labourer has potatoes and a little bacon, he is told that that is quite enough. In Wiltshire bread was quite a luxury, and such things as tea and sugar were never hardly seen. All the animal food they were able to procure there was the entrails and heads of pigs, whose carcases were sent to the London market, and sometimes to this town even (cries of Shame). Now I ask you is that protection? If you think me correct in this, then I call on you to speak out as Englishmen, and to destroy this tyrant of monopoly (cheers). Let us now see what the state of the labourers is in the manufacturing districts. He is able without protection to get an average of from 12s. to 16s. and 21s. wages per week. If you go to any part of the manufacturing districts on a Saturday night, the working-man will go to market, and buy a leg of mutton, or a shoulder of mutton, or ribs of beef; but how many ribs of beef or joints of mutton shall the farm labourer buy in the year? Now, what an appalling thing it would be were Free Trade to compel a man to leave his employment of 7s. to get 15s. wages a-week (laughter). Then the protectionists say, that the land will be thrown out of use; but I deny that. It will bring more corn into the country, and not allow it to fluctuate as it at present does. It will create a spirit of commercial enterprise, and secure to every working-man the full value of his labour. Is the English labourer a lazy fellow? He wants to work; but he wants to eat, too (hear, hear). The protectionists said that the country can grow sufficient corn; but if you go and ask a friend to dinner, and calculate on so much for each person, when you sit down to a leg of mutton, and there is nothing left, then you think there is not enough. If you then get of rib of beef, and some of it remains, you then believe there has been sufficient. But when the platter is well licked, and left clean, then you think there has been a scarcity (loud laughter). Now, if this country grew enough of corn, there would be no need of corn from abroad. But in the face of the protectionists, every year thousands of quarters of foreign corn were imported into the country. Instead of some of the corn in the country being left over, we were obliged to buy every year from foreigners (cheers). Can the protectionist lady go out without being, from her shoes to her bonnet, decked out with foreign produce? Her bonnet, her shawl, her stockings, her very petticoats, may be foreign; and if it is a shame for the poor man to eat the loaf of the foreigners, why should she wear their finery (cheers)? The time has now come for you to stand up and speak out for your rights (cheers). It will be a great thing for the poor man to be able to get plenty to eat, for he will then wish to earn his food by a hard day's work. I was in Liverpool at the last election, and saw the brown loaf shown there which the labourer eats abroad. But have you got enough of white bread to eat? (Cries of "No, no.") I am not standing here to wish you to eat the black bread of the Poles; but a hungry man, who has not enough white bread to eat, if he has brown bread besides, will eat that. Now I ask you to come forward, as the times are coming to a critical point, and pray that the Parliament may repeal these laws. A resolution to the following effect being then moved and seconded, was carried unanimously:—

"That this meeting is of opinion that all restrictions on the free importation of corn is unwise, unjust, and a grievance."

G. GADD was the next speaker who addressed the meeting. He said, I was in hopes, fellow countrymen, there would be enough said without me; I neither court the smiles nor frowns of any man. Some say that they have never been at college, but I have been at Pinchbelly College, in the town of Oppression, on the side of Bread-tax-hill (laughter). We come here either for plenty or taxation. We are aware that protection has done us no good, and we are willing to have the Corn Laws abolished, to try if that will better us. Under the present laws we can't get a bellyful (hear, hear). I was at a house last week, not six miles from here, and I said, "Mrs., do you want oranges?" "No," says she, "I can't get money to buy bread. We have only had a gallon of bread all the week for myself, my husband, and nine children." "What have you lived on?" says I. "On potatoes," says she. Now is that the sort of protection we want? No. We want to tell the wrongs we are suffering, and to try for our rights. The protection meeting held last week was called on market day, when the town was full of farmers, but this has been got up by poor men in the open air, and at very short notice, and that is the difference between it and the one at the Mansion-house. If the working men are satisfied, what calls them out from their homes at this time of the night to stand here and hear their wrongs talked of. The protection people might ride about on slap-up horses, and have all the pomp they wished, but let the poor man have his rights too, for why should we be starved to keep up the pride of a few. We could buy 3 ounces of tea, 2 ounces of coffee, 8 ounces of sugar, 3lb. 8 ounces of meat, 7lb. of flour, 7 pints of ale, 1 quarter pint of brandy, and 1 ounce of tobacco, if free of corn, the Custom and excise duty at 2s. 4d., the present cost being 7s. 7d., of which 5s. 3d., was a tax on the consumer (cries of hear, hear). This country pays a smaller land-tax than any other besides. The tax on land amounts only to 2,000,000l., while that on the people amounts to 23,000,000l. I dare say a repeal of the Corn Laws will hurt the "big uns" a little. It will perhaps hurt the large farmers; but there never was such times as when the land was let in about 200 acres; and if that time came back again, it would employ a great many more hands. The present large farms of 90 and 100 acres, if they were cultivated as they ought to be, would support a much larger number of labourers. The land would not be allowed to grow thistles and weeds, as it now did, but would be made to raise corn. At present the labourer goes to his work in the morning with a little bit of bread and cold water, although God has given every herb that grows and every living thing to man for his use—free and without a tax. The farmers had been told that their lands would go out of cultivation, and that the higher the price of bread the higher were the wages. But let any man say if he has not been better off when bread was cheaper. I deny that the rate of wages rises and falls with the price of wheat. When the average price of wheat was 44s. 6d. a quarter, wages were, in Wiltshire, from 5s. to 7s. a week; in Somerset, from 7s. to 9s.; and in Dorset, from 5s. to 6s. 6d. Now, when wheat is at 50s. a quarter, when the labourer has not less than 7s. a week, was that enough for any man to work on? I see it was said at the protection meeting the other day, that the labourer was better off now than when bread was cheaper; but if he has only 7s. a-week, out of which he pays 4s. a-year, or 1s. 8d. a-week for rent, and 4s. 6d. for soap, candles, firing, clothing, &c., that leaves him only 14d. a-day for feeding himself, his wife, and family. Let us not only endeavour to get the tax from corn, but from the other necessities of life,—let us assemble and agitate for our rights, and never rest till we have equal laws and equal taxation (cheers). I went to the protection meeting the other day, and asked a great man there, who was fond of proposing bread rules for union workhouses, if I might put a question, and he answered scornfully, "No." He said the meeting was one which should be attended by labourers, yet when a poor man asks him a question he says that he has no right to an answer. A man there proposed that the malt tax should be done away with, but does the labourer ever buy malt to brew his own beer. Remove the taxes from the necessities of life, and this country will prosper, and never till then (cheers.) This speaker, concluded by moving that a petition be presented to Parliament praying for Free Trade.

—BLUNDEL seconded the motion in a speech of some length. Referring to the potato disease, he said a gentleman in the neighbourhood proposes that you should take the diseased potatoes and wash them, and then to get the grater

THE FLAW IN THE BILL.

If there is force in plain truth plainly stated, in a strong argument strongly put, in convictions of present necessity and permanent policy, which were irresistibly strong four months ago, and which every hour's subsequent experience has overwhelmingly confirmed, Sir Robert Peel must and will relinquish the miserable device—we do not call it his, for it is not his—of the three years' sliding scale. We cannot believe in the possibility of this part of the ministerial measure finally making its way to the statute book.

He will give it up. Even if he had not told us as much, we should know, without his telling, that he is but "waiting for an excuse" to have done with it. It has become plainer and plainer, night after night, as the debate has proceeded, that he knows and feels the thing to be wrong. Not a reason—not a pretence of a reason, nor apology for a reason—has been pleaded for it. All the reasons are against it. The whole of the ministerial argument is an argument against the ministerial measure as it now stands. The ministerial case is decisively complete and strong at all other points—panoplied all over with facts and principles;—but it is ridiculously weak here; and they know it. In the admirably conclusive and vigorous defences of Free Trade principles and measures that have been made by the Government speakers during the past three weeks, the new sliding scale is left out by everybody's desire.

They talk much—and not too much—of the "emergency." They urge, with all possible earnestness and solemnity, the necessity of providing for this emergency. But they do not provide for it. If "emergency" means anything, it means OPEN PORTS; and the ports are not to be open now, but three years hence, when the emergency will, it is to be hoped, belong to history. They proclaim a famine—and they recommend a law for keeping out of the country certain supplies of food that would else come in. They quote the precedents of former famines, met, by Prime Ministers and Parliaments, with open ports—and they do not follow the precedents. They close the ports against so much of our possible available supplies of food, as cannot afford to pay the tax and leave a profit to the importer. Open ports in 1849 are their remedy for famine in 1846. To believe that Sir Robert Peel really approves of this extraordinary arrangement would be to believe him demented. Four months ago he knew better, and he has not unlearned his knowledge since then. On that first day of November to which, of all the days of his life, he will ever look back with the most "pride and satisfaction," he judged it "necessary" to open the ports to the admission of human food. On Monday-week, he was of opinion that "the necessity which existed for the adoption of this measure on the first of November, is now, on the sixteenth of FEBRUARY, ONLY INCREASED;" and since the sixteenth of February, it has gone on increasing again. We are very sure it is not Sir Robert Peel's opinion, that the larger necessity should be met with a smaller remedial measure.

Never was a thing more preposterously and glaringly incongruous with the wants, necessities, fears, and convictions of the time, than is the proposal of a little food-tax now. If the three years' sliding scale means anything, it means that from now to the first of February, 1849, the British people will be in danger of having too much to eat. The danger, to be sure, is only of a little too much; and accordingly, the precautionary tax is little likewise. If we can but succeed in keeping out so much corn as will not bear a four-shilling or ten-shilling tax, we shall be all right. Now, we need not argue that this is a monstrously absurd fear. The ministers themselves tell us that it is monstrously absurd. The ministers themselves tell us, that the danger is all the other way—not of a little too much, but of very much too little. "Honourable gentlemen," says Sir George Clerk, "instead of indulging in any apprehension that our home-market will be inundated with foreign corn, ought to apply themselves to the consideration of this question, whether, if our population continues to progress at the ratio in which it had of late years been advancing, we shall be enabled, even though the resources of Russia and some other countries should be developed to the very utmost, to procure a sufficient supply of corn for our own people." Well, then; why do they not "apply their minds to the consideration" of this question? And why do they keep up a make-believe of applying their minds to the consideration of the flatly contrary question—how to keep off the chimerical and impossible inundation?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is still stronger on this point, and reinforces the general argument with some most alarmingly suggestive hints, as to the probable condition of the potato-eating millions during those very three years for which we are now about to legislate against plethora:—

"He had seen accounts on this subject from North America, where the disease in potatoes had prevailed for three consecutive years. It was observed that in the first year the disease prevailed to a comparatively slight degree, in the second year it appeared in a more aggravated form, and in the present year the disease prevailed to as great an extent as it had in many parts of Ireland. The extent and continuance of this disease for a series of years might happen in this country as elsewhere; it was only safe then to provide beforehand for the emergency, in case this disease should continue in this country and Ireland, as in America, for a series of years. But this disease obtained not merely in England, Ireland, and America, but it prevailed to a great extent in many parts of the Continent, and if it there continued, the demand for corn in those countries would necessarily increase, and we should not be able to obtain a supply of that article from these quarters for our rapidly increasing population; instead of having an inundation of corn, as many honourable gentlemen had supposed. He would ask, had honourable gentlemen looked at the altered state of things which had arisen from the increase of our population? The addition made to the number of the population of this country every year was such as would require from 100,000 to 200,000 acres to be taken into cultivation for wheat to meet the wants of the increased population. In such a state of things you must be able to add almost an additional county under cultivation every year. Did not such circumstances make it incumbent on them to make provision in time?"

And yet it is proposed to make provision against a diametrically opposite and intrinsically impossible emergency!

We beg the most serious attention of all persons who are inclined to blink at the faults of the Ministerial scheme, for the sake of its vast and undeniable excellencies, to the truly tremendous prospect here held up before the country. It is not only this year's certain wants, but the probable wants of future years, that we have to provide for. If we are to judge from analogy, we have not yet seen the worst of the potato rot. It may come again—it almost certainly will come again—probably in a "more aggravated form;"—i. e., if the potatoes should be in existence in sufficient quantities to render the menaced aggravation a physical possibility; for, even this is dubious. It is far from certain that potatoes enough will be saved out of the existing stock to serve as seed of next year's crop. The Government are, it seems, most anxious on this point, and are contemplating special arrangements for the express purpose of reserving from present consumption an adequate store of seed potatoes. Sir George Clerk even goes to the length of saying, that "it will be absolutely impossible to find a sufficient quantity of potatoes for the seed required in the cultivation of the soil." So that what we have to prepare ourselves for, is not merely the certainty of a potato famine during several months of the present year, but a certain deficiency—and, perhaps, an utter failure—of the potato crop of next year, and the year after that. We have not merely to tide over a temporary difficulty with temporary expedients, but to make arrangements for a radical and permanent change in the diet of four millions of people. For so gigantic a task we shall need the very uttermost of our strength and resources. It is no time to be higgling with the landlords for shillings. So stupendous a demand calls for an unlimited supply. We can stand "inundation" to any amount. We want all, and more than all, that we can by any possibility get. The agriculture of Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australia, together, cannot over-do and surfeit us.

We do not believe that these truly awful considerations, to which Cabinet Ministers themselves teach us to attach so grave and tremendous an importance, can be urged in vain on the Government and the legislature. Sir R. Peel will not—he has told us that he will not—obstinately insist on again charging himself with any portion of a responsibility which he has already felt to be perfectly unbearable. He will not forfeit his right to look back on the first of November with "pride and satisfaction," by falsifying now the counsels which he gave then. He cannot be immutably resolved on tarnishing his name and fame in the hopeless attempt to conciliate the sordid imbeciles who are afraid of a famished people obtaining, from the world's poverty-stricken granaries, too much to eat. Everything invites and urges him to do his great work in a great spirit. He has, in truth, no alternative. The protectionists have left him none. He must put out all his strength. They talk of "appealing to the people." There is only one quite effectual way of meeting this. The Premier, too, must "appeal to the people"—by offering to popular acceptance a measure so thoroughly true to the public wants, necessities, convictions, and sense of justice, as that the people will take charge of it, and see it safely through Parliament. Only let him throw himself unreservedly on the great principles of which he is now the vigorous and accomplished advocate, and on that support which the intelligence and will of an educated nation are ready waiting to give him—and he will make short work of it. He need not concern himself with a too close measure of the resistance, if he will but make sure of his momentum.

MR. D'ISRAELI'S FIRST LESSON IN FACTS AND FIGURES.

The world had promised itself a good deal of entertainment from the speech of the honourable member for Shrewsbury, and the world has certainly not been disappointed, though the fun was of a decidedly different description from that which had been anticipated. This time the laugh has not been with, but at the honourable member for Shrewsbury—which makes no great difference, so far as the laughers are concerned, though the distinction is undoubtedly of some moment to the kind caterer for the public merriment.

Everybody thought, when Mr. D'Israeli rose to bear his part in the monster debate, that he was going to come out very strongly on the Peel apotaxy, the Peel treason, the Peel tergiversation, &c.; and everybody expected, of course, a grand treat. This sort of thing is Mr. D'Israeli's forte. He understands it. He likes it. He does it well—almost too well for those charitable and Christian-minded people whose sensibilities revolt at anything like cruelty to animals. Unluckily for himself and his Parliamentary reputation, Mr. D'Israeli thought proper, on the present occasion, to do something quite different. Whether he was tired of the old line, or thought other folks might be tired, or how else it came about, we know not—but Mr. D'Israeli took it into his head to strike out a new line. Nothing would serve but he must “treat the question on its merits”—a thing for which he is just about as competent as his own Messrs. Taper and Tadpole. He must teach Sir Robert Peel a secret or two in economics. He must lecture “the school of Manchester,” on political science. He must have a dash at facts and figures. He must be statistical, by way of proving the universality of his genius. Accordingly, after a good deal of hard, heavy reading, the honourable gentleman was enabled to treat the House of Commons to that comical jumble of facts turned inside out, and philosophy run mad, which the curious and patient reader may find in last Saturday's morning papers.

What could possibly possess Mr. D'Israeli to leave his own proper line, and indulge in the freak of treating a great public question on its merits, we cannot pretend to say. Never was temerity more cruelly chastised. It was really painful to see how, on Monday night, that highly-respectable, and particularly heavy gentleman, Sir George Clerk, took the coxcomb down—pulled him regularly to pieces—unravelling the tangle of his logic—knocked down his nine-pin “facts”—and, on the whole, made minced meat of the speaker and the speech. It was a rich example of the triumph of sober, steady-going dulness, over brilliant pertness and presumption. The dull man carried it hollow over the bright man. Mr. D'Israeli was wrong here—he was wrong there—he was wrong everywhere. He was quite mistaken about tea—he was altogether under a misapprehension as to cotton—and he had got hold of the wrong figures with respect to silk. He put the case quite incorrectly as regarded France, and was entirely misinformed about Turkey. He was quite out about America, and made a sad mess of Russian tallow. His theory of the “territorial constitution,” and the “preponderance of the landed interest,” was mildly protested against as little better than anarchical in its tendencies; and his dearly-beloved “reciprocity” dogma of the hopelessness of “fighting hostile tariffs with free imports,” was kindly shown to be contrary to common sense—for, as the Vice-President of the Board of Trade sagaciously put it, the people of this country will not buy things if they don't want them; and if they do want them, it is, on the whole, as well that they should buy them. The thing was really extremely well done. We are sure Sir George Clerk both earned and received the warmest thanks and commendations of his Premier.

In future, we dare say Mr. D'Israeli will take a more careful measure of his own powers, before assuming to treat a large and important question on its merits. The mistake may, perhaps, be accounted for. This gentleman has played so many parts in his time, that he might, naturally enough, think there could be no great harm in trying his hand at facts and logic, and coming out as philosopher in ordinary to the landlords. He should have considered, however, that inconstancy of principle is not identical with versatility of genius, and that a talent for getting up disagreeable impromptu is no guarantee for a man's shining in political logic and arithmetic. There are limits to everything. Mr. D'Israeli does many things remarkably well—but there are some others which, we take it, he cannot do. He cannot treat, on its merits, any question requiring accurate and comprehensive political knowledge, without showing himself a dunce; he cannot induce Sir Robert Peel to take him on as one of the regular official staff; and he cannot conceal from the public scorn the real nature and grounds of his present bitterness against the Minister whom, not so very long ago, he was ready to worship as a sort of Pitt redivivus.

THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

The long and tedious debate on the preliminary step towards the abolition of the Corn Laws, sufficiently proves that the protectionists will make use of every possible legislative artifice, not only to defeat or delay the success of Free Trade measures, but that they will all also endeavour to impair the efficiency of every law which they find themselves unable to reject altogether. Mr. Monckton Milnes has given notice of his intention to move that the clause ensuring total repeal, in February, 1849, shall be omitted; and we have reason to know that many influential persons on both sides of the house, who give general support to the ministerial scheme, not only view this proposition with favour, but are making urgent efforts to recommend it in private. The great struggle is yet to come; at present the Protectionists, like the Sikhs in India, have taken the offensive—they have crossed their Sutlej, and attacked the minister in his camp. Every one knows that they will be defeated and pursued into their own territories, but the difficulties of the campaign, both in India and England, will be immensely aggravated when our troops have to take up their position on a hostile soil. The strength of Sir Robert Peel's majority decides the fate of the existing Corn Laws; but the question then comes, what are we to have in their stead? Shall it be total and immediate repeal, or some other juggling scheme of modified protection? The case is not without danger to the interests of the country. The League will have to use all its vigilance and all its exertions to prevent the victory ending in a modern convention of Cintra, which would allow the enemies to retire with their plunder intact, and their means of future mischief undiminished.

We, therefore, urge the Free Traders to redouble their efforts at the present crisis. The greater the amount of resources which the League can command, the less will be the peril of the issue in the decisive contest. Battles must be fought at the hustings, wherever a Free Trade candidate can be brought forward with any prospect of success. Even should there be no dissolution, there are chances of a more than an ordinary number of vacancies to raise contests at single elections. Wigan is vacant at the present moment, Captain Lindsay having with prudent precaution declined to meet the exposure of the practices at the late election, and abandoned the defence of his seat.

At this moment we must bear in mind that we have to meet the fight with allies on our side, whose attachment to the League and its principles is of very recent date, and whose firmness through the entire duration of a protracted campaign must not be calculated upon with sanguine reliance. It is possible that there may be some likely to follow the example of the Bengal cavalry, and to charge the Sikh protectionists in their entrenchments. To meet the chances of such a defection, the League must hold large resources in reserve; it will be too late to assemble forces when the fight is over.

Famine and fever in Ireland are potent auxiliaries to our cause. They proclaim, in terms not to be mistaken, the dangers of delay. But this very necessity of proceeding rapidly may be so used by the protectionists as to introduce a system of delusive compromise in the excitement of haste and hurry. When everybody is agreed that something should be done, it is to the most active and vigilant that the privilege will belong of dictating what that something shall be. We have no fear that the popular members for Ireland, O'Connell, Lord Clements, N. A. Fitzgerald, &c. will propose or accept a compromise, even though Mr. Smith O'Brien should continue to patronise restrictions on food in the midst of a starving population. His appeals to selfishness will, we know, be vain; but his name may be employed to gloss over a plan which he is too prudent to come over and defend in person. We are not in the habit of ascribing any importance to Mr. Smith O'Brien, or his opinions on questions of political economy; he is hopelessly ignorant of the very rudiments of that science; but we are not without fears that a shallow man may afford a shallow pretext to the protectionists for declaring that a repeal of the Corn Laws goes beyond the popular demands and the present exigencies of Ireland.

There are other elements of danger before us and around us, which it will be the duty of the League to guard against and to meet. On our confederacy, at the present moment, mainly rest the nation's hopes for maintaining the existing tranquillity, and ensuring the future prosperity of the country. Were the League to withdraw from its conspicuous vantage-ground, the space would be occupied by the disorganised legions whom want of food and want of employment, aggravated by the loss of hope, would have lashed into despair.

In claiming support, in requiring fresh and vigorous exertions at the present crisis, we have grounds of appeal stronger than existed at any former period of our arduous struggle. While our prospects are brighter, our dangers are greater. The protectionists never really believed that their monopoly was in danger, until the present phase of the strife burst upon their benighted mind. Like the mute son of Croesus, they have acquired the use of language only when the object of their affection was about to be struck down. It is all very well to say that their clamour is utterly senseless, and to ask with the prophet, “What meaneth this bleating of sheep and lowing of oxen in our ears?” It has a meaning and a purpose. Its object is to introduce insidious means of rendering those measures inefficacious which cannot be directly resisted, and to insert injurious clauses at a time when men are so stunned by noise, and so wearied by iteration, that they are likely to make any sacrifice to get rid of the annoyance.

The interests of the nation require that victory should not only be complete, but should also be speedy. Trade stands still, commerce languishes, the Exchange is silent as the halls of Baalbec; and ships are idle in our harbours for want of freights. The protectionists know well the evils of this state of suspense; but they protract it on the chance of something occurring which they may turn to their own advantage. But the League has also something to gain during the interval. The chances for immediate repeal increase by delay in a greater ratio than the chances for maintaining protection, and the League must be strengthened to push those chances to a decisive and a successful issue.

Free Traders are no longer in danger from too much timidity—our present peril is excess of confidence—a belief that the battle has been won for us by the conversion of the great leaders of great parties. This would be just such a blunder as Pitt committed in the revolutionary war, when he looked for the overthrow of France to his coalitions with Austria, Russia, and Prussia. His example proved that nations cannot safely rely on their allies, but it would be still more dangerous for a people to repose implicit confidence in political parties. God helps those who help themselves. Earnestly and confidently we appeal to the Free Traders throughout the empire to renew and to increase their efforts. The precious moments of opportunity slip by like the grains of sand with which Time is represented as meting out human duration; and when these have all fallen, neither for individuals nor for nations will Time “turn his glass again.”

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER FROM JERUSALEM, DATED JAN. 1.—“We have reason, indeed, to praise God—we have just had some rain, which brightens our prospects a little. Water was rising every day in price; we have been paying for some time 9s. and 10s. a day for the quantity that was absolutely necessary; the distress in the city has been fearful. Now we expect that all prices will fall. Corn and meat have been at an almost incredible price.”

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE

Sixth Week, ending Saturday, February 28.

The interest of the debate on the Corn Laws has been thoroughly exhausted; and it would therefore be absurd to notice in detail the speeches of individual members whose opinions are only of importance to themselves and their constituents. It may seem ungracious to speak with apparent contempt of men who, in their private relations, are respectable and estimable; but after the leading men in the House of Commons have all declared their sentiments, the country cares very little about the style or the manner in which the smaller unknowns utter their views.

The only noticeable man who spoke on Friday night was Mr. Disraeli, who made himself conspicuous by the extent of his failure. Dropping inductive, he tried his hand on commerce; and spoke much clever nonsense. The secret of his failure lies in the fact that Mr. Disraeli does not believe what he says about protection. In attacking Sir Robert Peel, he is in earnest, for the Prime Minister has neglected him, overlooked him, wounded his personal feeling; but were he not member for Shrewsbury, he might have made a clever speech in support of a Free Trade policy.

On Monday night we had Sir G. Clerk, Vice-President of the Board of Trade; and on Tuesday night, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Both these gentlemen made excellent speeches, and demonstrated most effectually that people can express themselves clearly and vigorously as soon as they get on the right track. Sundry insinuations had been thrown out, in the course of the debate, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a reluctant supporter of the policy of Sir Robert Peel. On Tuesday night he most completely upset that idea; and made a speech, which, for fact, argument, and force, transcended all that he has ever yet spoken in the House of Commons. Mr. Goulburn is an excellent financier, but is a somewhat prosy orator; yet it is no idle compliment to say that, on Tuesday night, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not merely effective, energetic, and intelligible, but he actually threw novelty into a debate of which even the very leas have been expressed. His great point was the effect which Free Trade would have on the shipping interest; and most successful was he, in showing the fallacy of the fears which have been urged on this point.

Mr. Ferrand showed himself on Tuesday night; and his speech, the earlier portion of it, at least, was a specimen of happy audacity. He read, in a loud tone, extracts from the speeches of Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, and other members of the Government, when they used to advocate the necessity of protection; and certainly the contrast between their former and their present sentiments sounded oddly enough. But though Mr. Ferrand, like everybody else, is advancing in life, his mind stands still. There is not a particle of more discretion—not the slightest indication, that he gets wiser as he gets older. In precisely the same style which he used in 1842 he charges the manufacturers of Yorkshire and Lancashire with cruelty, monstrosity, wickedness and abomination; they are the ogres who feed on the babies of England, and devour the "witals of the poor." Mr. Ferrand is so tremendously intense, throws his ball with such fury, that it rebounds and hits his own nose; but he don't feel it. His madness has unquestionably some method in it; but the man roars away in such a wild, extravagant manner, that you feel convinced that he would ruin the best and safest cause ever intrusted to human advocacy.

Amongst the speakers have been Mr. Edward Buller, Mr. Liddell, Mr. Hutt, and others; and on Tuesday night, when the debate was proposed to be adjourned till Thursday, Mr. Miles undertook, in a somewhat gracious and patronising way, that it should terminate on Friday night.

The debate of Thursday night was an exception to the dreary dullness of the preceding week. There were several able speeches delivered on the Free Trade side of the question, whilst some of those on the protective side exhibited a little variety in manner, if not in matter.

Before the debate began, Mr. Roebuck asked how long it was to be continued? when terminated? He then pointed to the speech of Mr. Ferrand, who, on Tuesday night, had occupied nearly three mortal hours in violent vituperation couched in vulgar language, and delivered in a swaggering style and with a blustering demeanour. He besought the landed interest to uphold the credit and character of the house in public estimation, and to bring forward something better in defence of their cause than "violent hatred in violent and vulgar language."

Mr. Ferrand happened not to be present; but Sir B. H. Inglis took up his defence, and expressed an opinion that Mr. Roebuck was not quite the man to complain of personalities. Immediately afterwards, three members rose in succession to contradict, on authority, specific allegations made by Mr. Ferrand, in his usual confident and recklessly-undaunted style. The first was Mr. Bright, who vindicated Mr. George Wilson, the chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League, from an absurd charge of attempting to procure a protective duty on—starch! The next was Dr. Bowring, who complained of the wild audacious way in which Mr. Ferrand attacked the character of the amiable, benevolent, intelligent Henry Ashworth, a gentleman held in universal esteem, and who is incapable of hurting a fly, but yet who has been accused, on more than one occasion, too, of "cold-blooded cruelty." And lastly, Lord Morpeth, on the express authority of the Yorkshire operatives, vindicated them from the accusation of having been coerced to sign Free Trade petitions.

Mr. Ferrand having been set down, the debate began, the first speaker being Mr. Ross, member for Belfast, who dealt specifically with the question of flax, and showed the benefit which Free Trade would confer on Ireland. Following him came Mr. Beckett Denison; and some interest was felt to hear his sentiments, as he had seconded the address, and trustworthy Mr. Ferrand had affirmed, as if on his authority, that he had been "tricked" by Sir Robt. Peel. Mr. Beckett Denison repudiated Mr. Ferrand, who would take better care of his reputation if he were more cautious in his statements. [This was a mild and gentlemanly way of intimating a decided opinion that Mr. Ferrand was in the habit of indulging himself in the amusement of "throwing the hatchet."] Mr. Beckett Denison expressed a high opinion of Sir Robert Peel's personal integrity and honour, but declared himself unable to follow him in his Free Trade policy. It is a pity, then, that he should have seconded the address, even though he was not "tricked" into it.

Mr. Brotherton made a very sensible speech, which was well received in the house; and Mr. Christopher followed in a somewhat prosy oration, in which there was far more of sound than of sense. He was, however, gentlemanly in his manner, and did not indulge in invective.

Mr. Edward Cardwell, member for Clitheroe, and Secretary to the Treasury, next rose. This young gentleman made a most able speech—coherent, consecutive, and logical—the whole of which was one lucid argument, admirably arranged, and delivered with spirit, temper, and effect. To answer him there rose Mr. Finch, who was in the house some years ago, but has just been returned for Rutland. He spoke very fluently, but also very flippantly, and with an air as if he felt that he had been specially returned to take the "leadership" of the protectionists, and to rally their forces. Mr. Finch might have made a much more effective speech if he had been less anxious to be "smart," and had curtailed his oration by one-half. It is an unfortunate circumstance that now-a-days, "length" should be taken as a criterion of excellence; orators are too frequently not satisfied that they have left an impression, unless they exhaust their subject, their audience, and themselves.

Mr. Seymour, one of the new members for Dorsetshire, (he and Mr. Floyer having been returned in the room of Lord Ashley and Mr. Sturt) next spoke, with considerable spirit as to manner; and he showed his good taste by not trespassing too long on the attention of the house. His object was to tell the Legislature that the tenant farmers of Dorsetshire, and indeed, of all England, were in favour of Protection.

Mr. Villiers closed the night with one of those truly elaborate speeches, with which he has so often urged the "great question" throughout the long years during which he has been its leading advocate. Facts, arguments, reasons, were all marshalled in their due order; the present position of the question was pointed out, and the helplessness of the protectionists to govern the country exposed with pith and spirit. Mr. Villiers never shrinks from calling things by their proper names; he lets the protectionists know that a spade is a spade, and monopol is a class interest and a public cruelty: but he intermingles it all with pleasant sarcasm, and enlivens his gravest facts by a happy jocularity which never detracts from the dignity of the subject in hand, but only gives point to his meaning.

Whether or not the debate will terminate on this night (Friday) is still uncertain. Lord John Russell expressed a hope that it would; and Mr. Spooner agreed with him, but said it should not terminate until he had an opportunity of delivering his sentiments. There are still, apparently, a large number of members anxious to take part in the debate. Should the division occur to-night, or rather on Saturday morning, the result will be communicated in our "Postscript."

DRAIN OF GOLD

The fear of "money going out of the country" is still one of the greatest bugbears of the protectionists. It especially haunts the minds of those one-idea people, like Mr. Hudson, who look to the effects of "a lightning of the market" upon their scrip. Let us try, for the twentieth time, to refute this fallacy, with an argument, if possible, level to the capacity of even the member for Sunderland.

Corn imported from abroad must be paid for, either in gold, bills, or manufacture; and it is contended by the protectionists that, unless paid for exclusively in manufactures, the effect of such importation of corn will produce a pressure on the money market prejudicial to our internal trade.

The direct and immediate advantage of a payment in manufactures is not denied by the friends of Free Trade, nor is it necessary to their argument to deny that advantage in order to prove that payments for corn could not derange the money market under a regular and open trade. That the money market has been deranged under an irregular, uncertain, and fitful trade in corn, such as we have had under the present Corn Laws is quite natural and perfectly true; because the uncertainty attendant on them prevents those channels of commerce being opened which under a regular and certain trade in corn would provide a regular and certain mode of payment for it, without occasioning those sudden and unexpected drains on the money market which have occasionally marked the operation of the present law.

To prove this we have only to trace what will be the operation and effect of a free importation of corn on our own trade, and on the trade of those countries from whence we import it, and the mode of payment.

Let us take the trade of one country as an example for the rest—say Russia. The first effect on Russia will be to increase its consumable power of foreign products, such as sugar, coffee, silk, cotton, tobacco, &c., for which orders will be sent, not only to the countries producing those articles, but also to the bonded warehouses of this country, in which, at all times, a large stock of them is in store. The increased consumption of those articles in Russia will increase the prosperity, and consequently the power of consumption of those countries by which they are produced and supplied, and create an increased demand for those articles of luxury and convenience which they cannot produce for themselves, amongst which British manufactures will hold the first place. The consequence will be that large orders for British manufactures will be sent to this country from Brazil and elsewhere to meet the increased demand for them, and these manufactures will be paid for in bills drawn against increased shipments of produce to Russia, to meet the increased demand consequent on Russia having found a regular and open market for her corn; in payment for which corn those bills, drawn in Brazil and elsewhere, for British manufactures, will be remitted to Russia, and thus the account will be settled, without the aid or medium of a single shilling of coin or bullion being used in the transaction, and without in any way deranging the exchanges. These foreign bills on Russia will meet and balance the amount of bills drawn in Russia or England for corn; and as the powers of consumption would in both cases regulate the demand, there could never be any fluctuation in their relative amount, at least none large enough to produce any effect on the exchanges. In this statement we leave out of account the bullion and coin which could be emitted from foreign countries in payment for our manufactures in increased quantities with the increase of our trade, but which would form an important additional security.

FREE TRADE AGITATION IN FRANCE.—We are glad to learn from a correspondent, that the first step towards an organisation of the friends of commercial freedom in France has just been taken at Bordeaux, where a meeting has been held and a society formed, with the Mayor at its head, for the purpose of advocating the removal of all protective duties. The plan of operation proposed is precisely the same as that proposed in the earliest stages of the League agitation. A subscription is to be entered into for the purpose of disseminating printed publications, and creating a public opinion out of doors, previous to raising the question of Free Trade in the Chamber of Deputies. M. Bastiat, who has published a volume in France upon the proceedings of the League, and who is a native of the south of France, was present at the meeting, and took a prominent part in the proceedings. Bordeaux, the metropolis and port of the wine district, has always been celebrated for its liberal commercial views. We trust the movement now entered upon will be prosecuted with spirit, and that we shall soon hear of similar demonstrations in other parts of France.

SOUTH NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.

NOTTINGHAM, FEB. 25, 22m. PAST 6 P.M.—The last express from the polling booths arrived here at 6 precisely, bringing the close of the poll at Sutton-upon-Trent, thirty miles distant, and those of Southwell and Lowdham. The Newark, Bingham, and East Leake had previously arrived. You will perceive by the statement subjoined that in all the districts the poll has dragged on at a slow rate all the day.

REQUISITION TO MR. VILLIERS, M.P., AND W. BROWN, ESQ., FROM THE ELECTORS OF SOUTH LANCASHIRE.—We beg to call the attention of every Free Trade elector of South Lancashire to the requisition now in course of signature to the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., and Wm. Brown, Esq., of Liverpool, a printed copy of which appears in another part of our paper. We need make no appeal to the electors of South Lancashire on the subject of this requisition. The eminent services of Mr. Villiers throughout the long struggle for commercial freedom have identified his name too closely with the interests of that great county to render it necessary for us to urge upon the electors the public duty of thus testifying their appreciation of his character and claims to the honourable distinction of representing such a constituency in the House of Commons. Mainly to South Lancashire will the nation be indebted for the successful issue of the struggle for Free Trade. To the Parliamentary champion of that cause, through long years of tried fidelity and zealous self-devotion, no more fitting testimony could be made of public gratitude to public men than the proffered confidence of such a constituency. We trust that every Free Trader whose name stands upon the register for South Lancashire will at once append his signature to this requisition, inviting the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., and W. Brown, Esq., of Liverpool, to become their representatives in Parliament at the next election.

REPRESENTATION OF WIGAN.—The Honourable Captain Lindsay has declined to defend his return, and unless some of his supporters volunteer to oppose the petition on his behalf, which is very improbable, the electors of Wigan will be once more called upon to choose a representative. During the few months which have elapsed since they were last appealed to, the cause of Free Trade has advanced with gigantic strides. We trust that in Wigan public opinion has not stood still, and that bribery and corruption will give way before the popular demand for unfettered commercial intercourse with all nations. At such a crisis as the present, when the protectionists are asking themselves whether they dare throw out the Government measure, the return of any man who is not a thorough friend to Free Trade, as the representative of a borough solely dependent for its prosperity on manufactures, might have a very important and a very prejudicial influence on their determination. Free Trade is now no party question; all are equally interested in its adoption; and all parties in Wigan, we hope, will concur in this missing faction, feeling, and work energetically for their common cause.

WIGAN ELECTION PETITION.—We understand that a great number of very gross cases of bribery at the last election for Wigan, are already in the hands of the petitioners against Mr. Lindsay's return. Although Mr. Lindsay has resigned the seat without a contest in committee, it is still the intention of the Free Traders to prosecute the inquiry, and we have no doubt that several cases for criminal prosecution subsequently will arise out of the evidence.

REPRESENTATION OF LEICESTER.—Soon after the formal announcement from Wynn Ellis, Esq., that he should not again become a candidate for this borough, a requisition was forwarded to Mr. George Thompson, of the League, who, in company with Captain Cogan, presented himself to a crowded meeting of the Liberal electors and other inhabitants in the New Hall, on Monday evening. After a long address from Mr. Thompson, in exposition of his views, a resolution, declaring that gentleman's fitness for the representation of that borough, and pledging the meeting to support him at the next election, was moved by Mr. C. Billson, seconded by Mr. Slade, and an amendment for an invitation to Mr. Ellis was moved by Mr. J. Staines (agent to the Reform Registration Society), and seconded by Mr. Edmund Mitchell, when the resolution was carried by a very large majority. It was also stated by the chairman that Mr. Bright, M.P., having been written to by an elector (not favourable to Mr. Thompson), had declared that were he an elector of Leicester, he would give Mr. Thompson his unqualified support.

NORTH NOTTINGHAMSHIRE.—NOTTINGHAM, THURSDAY.—Lord H. Bentinck will walk over. There will be no contest for the North Division of this county.

ELECTORS' CHANGE OF HOMES AFTER REGISTRATION.—Householders who have changed their residences after registration may now vote (if on the register of voters), provided, after removal, they had resided within the city or borough, or within seven miles. This reasonable amendment of the former law on the subject was made in 1813, by the enactment of the 6th and 7th Vic., c. 18, sec. 79.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. LVII.

TO JOHN BRIGHT, ESQ., M.P.

SIR,—About the time when these words are passing through the press, you will probably be giving a vote which will help to "lay the domination of the aristocracy in the dust."

That phrase will not be forgotten by your enemies; nor, I trust, by your friends. It is too practical not to be memorable. It is prophecy as well as precept. The forty shilling franchise is the weapon you recommended as capable, in case of need, of accomplishing this prostration; and that is henceforth the people's weapon against all unjust and injurious "domination" on the part of those who prove themselves inaccessible to fact and argument; and who uphold, by the insolence of power, laws which tend to the plunder of industry.

The man who lost his temper, and was consoled by the assurance that it was a very bad one, typifies the section of the aristocracy to which you alluded. The "domination" which denies bread, deserves to be in the dust. Its possessors should repeat Archbishop Tillotson's ejaculation over the damnable clause of the Athanasian Creed, and "wish to heaven they were well rid of it." It alienates them from the community, robs them of respect, paralyzes them for good, attracts hatred and contempt, associates their names with sophistry and rapacity, and identifies them with the cause of scarcity, of crime, and of disease. Morally, and in every sense, except the most sordid one, such domination is a damnification.

The labourers have long been laid in the dust by this domination. As it succumbs they will revive, and bless the helping hand that raises them, by its prostration. Your name is greeted with the grateful shouts of the toiling and starving serfs of Hampshire. Nor is that the only justification which events have conferred upon your language since its utterance. Think of three weeks' speaking against Time, with famine in his train. In this prolonged debate, lives have been sacrificed by speeches; as surely as if words were the deadliest weapons. A thus far dominating minority has secured a three weeks' march in advance for scarcity and pestilence. That domination will bring destitution to the dust. Is more justification required? Look at the "unnatural combat." The father warring upon the son, and seeking the destruction of his fair name and honourable position. We had before seen brother discarding brother, and a constituency submitting to become the agents of fraternal wrong. Scenes like these in Christian England call for interposition. They are the works of a demon, who must be ejected and laid in the dust or the Dead Sea, no matter where; and for whom you have found the best exorcism in the forty shilling franchise.

Peace and philanthropy have ever characterised the religious body to which you belong; and the weapons of your warfare are not unworthy of their Christian spirit. You could destroy the bad of aristocracy by the good of democracy. You propose to vanquish a wrong by the power of a right. You exhort the many to emancipate themselves politically, that they may achieve a moral emancipation for those whom cupidity or ignorance has enslaved. The banner of such warfare is the white flag of peace, its sword the keen point of argument, its battalions the well-marched array of facts, its artillery the thunder of a people's cry, and the domination which the victory lays in the dust, a wrongful power over human food, not less pernicious for its authors than for its victims.

Associated with Mr. Cobden in toils long to be remembered, speedily be your name blended with his in the most memorable of triumphs ever achieved by peaceful agitation. On you especially has devolved the exposure of the doers of an enormous wrong, and the claim of sympathy for the suffering. Not merely in the technical language of religious classification, but in the broadest and best sense of the word, society knows you for "a friend." On the wide plains of Wiltshire, or the quiet downs of Hampshire, the grateful recognition of your exertions blends with that which is breathed amid the busy clatter of your own Rochdale factories. Nor is your energy exhausted in the success now so nearly achieved. You are already labouring in another field of usefulness. In the Game Laws there is another form of crime-engendering domination, which you have also to lay in the dust. Spare it not; but from winning freedom for industry proceed to win also protection for the farmer and the peasant.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

AGRICULTURE.

A MONOPOLIST PROPHECY.

When a public man has gone on for thirty years making predictions which subsequent events have invariably falsified, one would think that he might possibly suspect he had gone upon a wrong tack. Now, Mr. Benett, of Wiltshire, is a man of that sort. He has prophesied on the subject of agriculture and protection from the year 1815 downwards, and every prophecy has signally failed; yet with mindless loquacity he last week again took upon himself, in the House of Commons, to make the most ridiculous predictions of evil to farmers and labourers as the result of Free Trade in corn.

Now, Mr. Benett is a genuine monopolist; and it will be curious to trace his course from the year 1815 to the present time, and then mark the absurd inconsistencies of his latest speech in favour of monopoly. To farmers such a review will be eminently useful, because Mr. Benett being a high professing "farmer's friend" and a voluble talker, had at one time considerable influence amongst the Wiltshire farmers. How utterly unworthy of their confidence this gentleman is, a little examination of his incoherencies will speedily show.

In 1814 Mr. Benett was the owner of an estate on Salisbury Plain, some part of which he farmed himself; and he had, both as a landlord and an occupier, derived great profits from the high prices of grain during the preceding twenty years. Mr. Benett's estate is of that description of light land which most largely partook of the advance in value caused by the high prices; sheep farming, and to some extent turnip husbandry, were adopted in that district with considerable success. But, although the system of husbandry in Wiltshire, in the year 1814, was a vast improvement upon that which existed there before 1793, it was a forced and artificial one, dependent entirely upon high prices. That is, it consisted of a moderate amount of capital spread over a wide surface, in a word, low farming. Mr. Benett, who was examined before the Parliamentary committee of 1814, probably gave a very accurate account of the actual system when he said the price of 100s. per quarter for wheat was indispensable to enable the Wiltshire farmer to make a profit. He gave a detailed account of the expenses and produce of his own farm of 945 acres; and taking the price of wheat at 96s., and of barley at 48s. per quarter, his estimated loss was 66l. a year! Of course Mr. Benett was an ardent supporter of the law of 1815; and when some few years afterwards he was brought into Parliament by the squires and farmers, he was everywhere execrated by the agricultural labourers of the county.

A supporter of Mr. Benett's views could scarcely pass a town or village in safety, so atrocious did the labouring population of the county deem Mr. Benett's opinions. The sight of his ribbon was the signal for a riot for there was then no affectation of regard for the interest of the labourers on the part of Mr. Benett. "Barley bannock" and "oat-cake" formed the diet to which, as it was generally believed, Mr. Benett had said the rural labourers should return and conform to. That monopoly is not less odious to the Wiltshire labourers now than then, let Goatsacre and Bremhill bear witness; though they now know how to use arguments far more effective than violence and riot.

From that hour to this, Mr. Benett has been the consistent advocate of laws for the creation of artificial scarcity. Undeterred by failure after failure, he has constantly urged the farmers of Wiltshire to look to monopoly for safety, and to high prices for profit.

Unfortunately, his purpose of deteriorating the diet of the labourers is the only one of his avowed public objects which has not failed; for, instead of the inferior grains, the Wiltshire labourer has fallen to the lower depth of potatoes; while the Wiltshire farmers have contrived to struggle on with prices little higher than the half of the sums promised them by Mr. Bennett and his fellow landowning legislators.

Let us now see what Mr. Bennett urges in defence of monopoly, and it will be found that his present assumptions are as baseless as ever. He said:

"It was assumed that cheapness of food would confer the greatest amount of happiness. He agreed that cheapness of food was most desirable; but in cheapening food care must be taken that the people were not reduced to greater distress than they would suffer if food were dear. Cheapness of food, by home production, was undoubtedly most desirable. Cheapness, occasioned by the extent of production in favourable seasons, was most desirable; but in this he agreed with the right hon. baronet, that the amount of the wages of labour always depended upon the proportion of the demand to the supply; and it was for them to consider whether they might not, by cheapening food in the way proposed, lessen the demand for labour without lessening the supply."

And he then went through some calculations, or would-be calculations, to show that every quarter of foreign wheat brought into this country "would displace the demand for labour to the extent of 25s."

In a subsequent part of his speech he said that the average produce of wheat per acre in Wiltshire is three quarters, or 24 bushels—we doubt whether it be in fact so much—an admission which at once proves the absurdity of the assertion, that "the demand for labour" would be lessened by Free Trade. Nothing but the uncertainty induced by reliance on the Corn Laws has kept the produce of Wiltshire so low as it is; and all past experience has shown that there, as elsewhere, moderate prices have always led to increased exertions on the part of farmers; and, consequently, to a greater demand for labour. And what, according to Mr. Bennett's own showing, is the actual state of farming in Wiltshire,—at a time, be it observed, when not a farmer in the county can doubt that Free Trade in corn is inevitable?

"But whatever might be the rate of wages, he could tell the hon. member there were as comfortable farmers and labourers in Wiltshire as in any part of the kingdom. There was no land better cultivated; he knew that the Salisbury Plain land was producing four (so we understood the hon. member) quarters the acre. Science was doing wonders, and much capital was being invested. Every thing was thriving there, and every labourer was employed. Harrowing stories had been told of men drawing in carts, but the fact was, the stones were only drawn from the road into the field, in an ingeniously constructed machine, which was much less laborious than the common wheelbarrow. Besides, these were not farmers' labourers, but old men who preferred earning 5s. a week in that manner to going into the workhouse. He thought it hard then—he thought it unwise, when everything was thriving in the country—when all parties were employed—the farmer getting a fair but moderate price—for 52s. was only a moderate price—when, in fact, everybody was satisfied, that the right honourable baronet should have chosen such a moment for proposing his measure, it seemed to him a most astonishing event—one that had astonished him more than anything in the course of a long life—that ministers should have been so easily frightened from their property—that for a disease so trifling and temporary, to say the most, so desperate a remedy should have been prescribed."

Now, though there is too much evidence, of far greater weight than the testimony of Mr. Bennett, that everybody in Wiltshire is not satisfied, we may safely accept this passage as proof that capital is being invested in farming by the Wiltshire farmers, which is in itself a decisive answer to the huggaboo cry of "lessening the demand for labour." The quality of this gentleman's judgment may be gathered from the fact of his having thus reiterated in the House of Commons the very silly assertion he made at a local agricultural dinner, that, had he to choose his own station in life, he would be a Wiltshire agricultural labourer! Mr. Bennett said:

"The hon. member for Durham had spoken of the condition of the labouring classes; and particularly of the agricultural labourers in Wiltshire. He (Mr. Bennett) was not going to suffer any personal allusions of the hon. gentleman to divert him from the present discussion; but he begged to assure the hon. gentleman and the house, that he respected the peasantry as his friends. He entertained a strong sense of their worth. And in allusion to what he had himself said on a former occasion, he had declared to those men—knowing the valuable services they rendered to society, and being fully aware of the delight derived from a consciousness of fulfilling one's duty—that if he were to be born again he should not covet in this world any station beyond that which they themselves sustained: that was the true sentiment of his mind—it was warm and sincere."

Truly it may be said: how little wisdom suffices for a legislator!

BEWARE OF FALSE FRIENDS.

Farmers, if they are wise, will hasten to repudiate the remnant of protection which the landowners of the House of Lords have extorted from Sir Robert Peel; for there is no mistake about the matter.

The Minister is far too clear-sighted not to see that immediate as well as total repeal of the Corn Laws is for the public weal, and the three years' postponement of Free Trade in grain, by which the Government plan is deformed, is avowedly a concession to the prejudices of the Peers. A few of the monopolist aristocrats, in their agony of wrath against the Government at first, said they would prefer an immediate Free Trade in corn to the prospective Free Trade of the Premier; but latterly they have drawn back from that position. Now, in reference to that threat—for such was the form it assumed in the House of Commons—in his late splendid speech, Sir Robert Peel said:

"Bond fide believing the arrangement to be a better one, believing also that it was more for the advantage of agriculture, I, on the part of her Majesty's Government—I made that proposal, and it is my intention to use all legitimate means I can for the purpose of giving effect to it. It was said the other night by the hon. gentleman the member for Somerset, that he greatly preferred, speaking on the part of the agricultural population—that he greatly preferred immediate repeal to the measure proposed, and he turned round to his friends, and that sentiment at that time received, apparently, a general concurrence from them. Now, sir, as I have before said, it is the intention of the Government to adhere to their own proposal. They state the reasons why they propose it, and why they are inclined to adhere to it, considering the opportunity there will be for the improvement of the country in the interval. But I stated this distinctly, that if the agricultural body are not of opinion that it is for their advantage, and that they think that immediate repeal is preferable to deferred repeal (laughter and loud cheering from the Opposition benches), by taking part with the hon. gentleman opposite they may place me in a minority (laughter and cheers again). Then the only consideration I shall bear in mind will be this, what course should I best take to give effect to the law as amended at your hands. We will do all we can to carry the proposition—I prefer it. I proposed it believing it to be favourable to agriculture. I don't say what course—speaking for myself—I may possibly take. I don't say what effect success here may have in other places (hear, hear). This I will say, that my opinion with respect to the final adjustment of the Corn Law will remain unaltered, and I shall decidedly prefer immediate repeal, so carried against me, to throwing this country into confusion by any attempt on my part to prevent it (loud cheers and laughter from the Opposition). It is right to consider what course would be most advisable to adopt, and I do believe that the final adjustment of this question is now become paramount to all."

The "cheers and laughter" with which this mode of meeting the monopolists' threat was received shows how entirely their utter hollowness is appreciated in the House of Commons. There is not a man in the house who is not aware that the three years' postponement is the sop to the monopolist landowners; and the last thing they think of doing is to hazard that part of the Government measure.

But how stands it with the tenant farmers? Our readers will recollect that wherever the Corn Law question has come under discussion in a genuine agricultural assembly, however farmers may have differed as to the policy, or otherwise, of Free Trade in corn, they have invariably declared, that "if Free Trade is to come, let it come at once, that the question may be settled, and we shall then know where we stand." And this is the common-sense view. But when did a common-sense view of the subject meet acceptance with the monopolist landowners? They have indirect objects to gain by the Corn Laws, and a principal one is to use the farmers for their own political objects. Now, on two grounds, immediate instead of ultimate repeal should be the earnest demand of every tenant farmer in the kingdom. First, because no settlement, at all events, no settlement advantageous to the tenant, can be made with the landlord during the period of transition, namely, for four years; secondly, because, designing political landocrats will, during the three years' interval, foster a delusion amongst the less intelligent tenantry, that the "protection" may be continued. And such are the very grounds which secretly make the monopolist landocracy adhere to this shred of monopoly. It will delay, perhaps prevent, that which of all things they most dread, the emancipation of the rural middle classes—the tenant farmers. It will prevent, or delay, that influx of intelligence and capital, into the business of agriculture, which will grow six quarters of wheat instead of three, so much deprecated by Mr. Stafford O'Brien, because the increased produce must be grown by farmers, rendered independent of the whim, caprice, or cupidity of their landlords.

It will delay that period—until which farmers and husbandry will never occupy the right position—when the tenant farmers will care as little for, possibly know no more of, their landlords, than the occupier of a house in London cares for the ground landlord; he will pay the stipulated sum, and there the matter will end. From the hour of total Free Trade in corn, but not till then, the removal of the rubbish of feudalism which lingers in the relations of landlord and tenant in this country will begin to be swept away; and although landowners will benefit by the change at least as much as any other class, the narrow-minded and mortgaged landowners—the immense majority of the class—relinquish with anger and regret that part of their importance which arises from the depression, the unnatural depression, of other classes.

Every farmer knows the unwillingness with the landlords to grant fair leases; and the eagerness with which, now the necessity of leases is admitted by all but themselves and their tools, they listen to every shift and expedient, such as legislative allowances for improvements and tenant rights, proposed to keep up the system of yearly holdings. Upon this part of the subject we shall have much to say to the farmers hereafter; but, at present, we content ourselves with calling their attention to the uses, such as we have stated, to which the monopolists are about to turn their three years' grace, which the Lords have obtruded upon the Government plan.

In Huntingdonshire, a Squire of the name of Hammond said that three years' protection ought not to be regretted, because, after the next general election, the law might be altered, and the protection rendered permanent. Again, in Essex, a clergyman of the name of Cox, who seems to be more voluble than discreet, said

"When I first read his (Sir R. Peel's) speech I said this is a mockery of protection; it never will do; we must make war with all protecting duties, and then they will see they cannot go on, because they will not have the sinews of war. But our advice now is this, stand fast to your protection; and let me tell you it is a great deal easier to add to a protective duty than to give it up and begin anew. We must fight the battle as long as there is a plank of the ship left. Therefore our advice is to stand by all protected classes, and don't any of you be fools enough to say, we will have Free Trade immediately, for Free Trade is anarchy, it is democracy in the true sense of the word, and, if you had it, it would shake the throne to the foundation, and the church and all other great interests would be destroyed. The Central Society says, fight the battle till you are beaten, and then we will give you the best advice we can. Our advice now is 'no surrender.'"

Now, so far as regards the chance of prolonging protection, such advice to the farmers is simply ridiculous. The maintenance of monopoly has become an utter impossibility, and the only effect of lengthening the period of transition is to postpone that day when farming will become a steady and profitable business, and tenant farmers be men who dare to act upon their own convictions.

POTATO SEED FOR YORKSHIRE.—FRASERBURGH, FEB. 13.—We are sorry to have to report that the crop in this neighbourhood, like adjacent counties, is seriously affected with the prevailing epidemic. Until the last few days, the growers considered they had escaped this destructive disease, but though late in appearing, it is making rapid progress. At this place, large quantities are annually shipped for seed to Yorkshire; and, from the flattering accounts forwarded by the shipping agents to their Yorkshire friends, the latter were consoled in some degree for their recent heavy losses, by the prospect of obtaining good plants from this old quarter for their ensuing crops. Fraserburgh and Yorkshire will not be the only sufferers by this unfortunate disease. Another correspondent speaks in a similar strain of the condition of the potatoes in Euchar—of the wholesale repudiation by the Yorkshire dealers of the quantities purchased in this quarter. They will not take them at any rate, not even at the average rate fixed at the Rattray market, the other day, which is so low as 10s.—Aberdeen Herald.

THE MARQUIS OF WESTMINSTER AND THE CORN LAW.—Last week, the Marquis of Westminster entertained a large body of his tenantry to dinner at Eaton Hall, and presided on the occasion. The noble lord expressed his belief that the measures of Sir R. Peel would not have any material effect upon the native agriculturists; whilst they would aid our commercial interests; and he enjoined that any anticipated depression should be met by increased energy, and the adoption of those improvements in agriculture which experience had shown would lessen the cost and increase the amount of production. He also said, that if any of his tenantry felt any cause of dissatisfaction at the terms on which they held the lands in their occupation, he should feel it his duty that the grounds of that dissatisfaction should be submitted to investigation, and if they were too highly rendered he would reduce them. All his declarations were made in the broadest sense of liberality and fairness, and gave great satisfaction to the tenantry.—Chester Chronicle.

THE CORN LAWS.—Notwithstanding the prognostications of the "protectionist party," that the proposed measures of the Government would immediately tend to a vast reduction in the price of wheat, there was an advance in the price of nearly every description of grain at Maidenhead market on Wednesday. Wheat had advanced 5s. per load, and met with a brisk and ready sale at 17l. for middling quality. Our informant, who was at the market, and who had opportunities of ascertaining the sentiments of the farmers of the neighbourhood on the subject of the anticipated immediate reduction of the duties upon corn, states that the great majority of the agriculturists who attended appeared to be of opinion that the sliding scale had not had the effect which had been expected, and that the sooner the question was set at rest, by the carrying the plan submitted to Parliament by Sir R. Peel, the better it would be for the real interests of every person engaged in agricultural pursuits.—Globe.

ANTI-CORN LAW MEETING.—THE LABOURERS OF HAMPSHIRE.

GOSPORT, TUESDAY, FEB. 24.—Last night a meeting was held composed of the agricultural labourers of Hampshire, for the purpose of their furnishing to the world a description of "their state and condition under Corn Law protection." Such were the terms of the handbills which had been extensively circulated in the districts which abut upon the locality which was appointed as the rendezvous. The spot selected was Sheril Heath, which forms part of Waltham Chase, a wild district in the parish of Droxford, and situate about five miles from the Botley station, on the South-Western Railway, about ten miles from Gosport, and the same distance from Southampton. On reaching the spot shortly before the hour at which it had been announced the proceedings would commence (5 o'clock) we found that notwithstanding the heavy rains which had fallen during the day, and the threatening appearance of the atmosphere, which still continued, that a large body of the peasantry of the neighbourhood had already collected, while other numerous bodies were seen wending their way to the selected spot from various points of the vast space which lay unbroken to the view. All was order and decorum, and many of the groups of labourers with their wives and children appeared in their best homely but cleanly gear. To serve the purpose of a hustings or rostrum for the reception of those who were to take the most active and leading part in the business of the evening, three carts had been rudely bound together at the rear of a small outhouse. In one of these carts a rustic chair was deposited for the reception of the president, while a second contained a small table for the accommodation of the representatives of the press. Here also were arranged three small candles, while as many flambeaux of a rude construction had been prepared to illumine the station of the chairman and the speakers. With these flickering and uncertain lights the affair proceeded, and the scene presented a novel and somewhat singular appearance. About five hundred persons, all of the same grade and class, had assembled, and nothing could exceed the good order which was preserved throughout. Mr. John Ekless, a yeoman residing at Bursledon-bridge, near Southampton, who has attained considerable fame for the stand he has made, with success, against several attempted innovations of the rights of poorer classes, by projected enclosure bills, appeared to lead in the way of suggestions as to the mode in which the proceedings ought to be conducted. A labouring man of the name of Jesse Burgess (of whom particular mention is made in the subjoined report) was elected to the chair, and having assumed it, he called upon Mr. Ekless to open the business for which the meeting had been assembled.

Mr. EKLESS, in obedience to the call, spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman and friends, if you will leave off talking yourselves, and will listen to my talk, you will hear what I have got to say. In the first place, I am most happy to see so many assembled here this evening; and, considering the state of the weather, your numbers show that you must have a strong feeling upon the question which has assembled us, or you would not have attended here at all. I congratulate you upon the choice of your chairman, for though he is one of the humbler classes, he is still, as I know, a respectable man. To my knowledge he has brought up a family of eleven children, and has only had the aid of 24s. from the parish; and that fact, in my judgment, constitutes him a respectable man (cheers). He is not only respectable, but he also fills a prominent place in the pages of history. Jesse Burgess is a man whose name is immortalised in the immortal writings of your great friend, and the defender of the rights of labour, William Cobbett (shouts of applause). Jesse Burgess is the man whom William Cobbett was accused, at the Coventry election, many years ago, of having flogged to death—a most wilful and diabolical charge, brought forward by his opponents. This man—I mean your chairman—was sent for, post haste. He went down to Coventry, and from the hustings there boldly proclaimed the falsehood of the charge by shouting, "I be the real Jesse Burgess" (cheers and laughter). So that his name will go down in history to the latest period of time. We are met here this evening on a requisition or invitation to the labouring classes of this county to meet together, to describe their state and condition under Corn Law protection, as stated in the handbill which has been printed and circulated. Now, there have been many similar meetings held in Somersetshire, in Wiltshire, and in Berkshire; but they have been repudiated in the House of Commons as not being the genuine and spontaneous acts of the labourers themselves, but got up by emissaries from the League. Now I do not know that this has much to do with the matter, unless the astounding statements made at these meetings could be denied. I find, however, that some members of the house did not deny them; and amongst them, Mr. Sidney Herbert, the Secretary at War, member for Wiltshire, got up, and in a speech which did equal honour to his head and heart, said he was grieved to believe that the statements which had been made were quite true, and that the poor of Wiltshire were labouring under privations such as had been described, and the right hon. gentleman added that the only thing he could do to alleviate their sufferings and distress would be to support Sir Robert Peel in the repeal of the Corn Laws. I, for one, care not how these meetings are got up. The only question is this, are the statements made at them true or false? Now, in order that there shall be no mistake, I will tell you how this meeting has been got up. I am no Leaguer—I am not connected with any political party or faction. I never paid to or received from the League one penny, but a friend of mine, one of yourselves, one who has risen from the plough-tail, met me, and said to me, "Do you not think we could get up a meeting like that which has been held in Wiltshire?" I stated some difficulties, which I thought would attend the getting up of the meeting, and suggested that it would be hard to get a sufficient number of labourers together, and so we parted. About a week ago we met again, and he said, "What do you think of a meeting now that the farmers be repealers?" "I have been talking," said he, "with 100 highly respectable farmers of the neighbourhood, and I have found that with one solitary exception they are all in favour of total and immediate repeal, referred to the three years of deception which the measures of Sir Robert Peel would produce, and now if the farmers have not courage and pluck enough to carry out their own wishes, let the labourers come forward and help them" (loud cheers). Well, I was bound to yield to my friend's unanswerable arguments. He said, "Will you help us?" I said, "If I am capable, and in health, I will." We then went to work, and this meeting is the result of that consultation (applause). Whether legitimate or illegitimate, such are the circumstances under which this meeting has been convened, and I say fairly, that we do not wish to prejudice the question, or to pass any petition for or against the Corn Laws, yet we are here to call upon the labourers of Hampshire to describe their state and condition under Corn Law protection. It has been argued by the protectionists, that the Corn Laws are necessary for the protection both of the farmers and the labourers; therefore, if you can prove that there has been such a state of happiness and prosperity during the time the law of 1815 has been in operation—now a period of thirty years—if you can prove that your state and condition has been improved; that you lived better; that you are better housed, and better clothed; then, no doubt, some straightforward Englishman will get up and propose a petition praying for the continuance of that law. (Cries of "No such thing—Free Trade for ever.") But if, on the other hand, a state of privation and suffering, such as our forefathers never knew, is developed at this period, then, I contend, that you will advocate and carry petitions to both houses of Parliament praying for the total and immediate repeal of these laws (cheers). My friends, because I say that I am not one of the League, do not suppose that I mean to repudiate or impugn that body. We owe the League much; and every man, woman, and child that eats bread owes the League a deep debt of gratitude. (Here an interruption arose from the interference of a farmer named Whale, who was in the body of the meeting.) Mr. Ekless, addressing the person named, said, "Whale, we know you are a rum fish, but you must not interrupt the business of the meeting." (Cries of "Silence, Whale; you beats down the wages of the poor, and drives them into the unions, you rascal.") My friends, take no notice of him, for, like most of his species, he is composed principally of blubber (cheers and laughter). But, my friends, I will go further and say, that I not only respect the League as a body, but there are certain members of the League whom I highly esteem, which is more than respect. I allude to Richard Cobden and John Bright, who agree with me, and of the honour of whose intimate acquaintance I am truly proud (hear, hear, hear). Richard Cobden is one of ourselves—he was brought up at the plough tail, and had served part of his time within a few miles of the spot where we are now assembled. (Mr. Whale here again interrupted the speaker, and was met with general cries of "Turn him out.") Mr. Ekless proceeded—If you think, Mr. Whale, to disturb the meeting, you are most miserably deceived, for you shall not be allowed to do so many minutes longer. If you have anything to say come up here, and we will willingly listen to you; but you shall not disturb our proceedings. (Loud cries of "Come up here, and speak out like a man if you have anything to say.") Mr. Ekless resumed—I was about to say that we are met within a few miles of the spot where Richard Cobden spent part of his time, and that I cannot do justice to the honourable character of that individual; but I do not in my conscience believe that a more sincere, constant, and zealous friend of the tenant farmers of England exists in this country than Richard Cobden, or a man who makes greater sacrifices to promote their interests, happiness, and prosperity, much as he has been impugned and vilified (hear, hear). With respect to John Bright, eloquent and all-powerful as he is in the cause of Free Trade, he has proved himself the friend of the farmer by moving last session a motion, which he has resumed this session, for the appointment of a select committee to take into consideration, with a view to its repeal, that curse, that plague-spot—that relic of the Norman yoke—the Game Laws—which has become so fertile in crime, and injurious to the best interests of society, and so destructive to property (cheers). For this John Bright would descend to his grave with laurels on his brow, compared to which the laurels of the battle-field were but as mere weeds (loud cheering). Now, I had always been taught to believe, when I was young, that our forefathers were in a most most miserable condition—that they were half-starved—that they were dependent upon the upper classes, to whom only luxuries belonged, while squalid wretchedness was the condition of the lower orders. But when I got older, and began to read the pages of history, I found that 400 years ago, during the reign of Henry VIII., an Act of Parliament was passed, the preamble of which recited—"Whereas, beef, mutton, pork, and veal, are the common food of the poorer sort." So that, in those days, the very serfs were well fed (cries of "We do not get it now.") And in a subsequent reign, another act was passed, which also shows what was the state and condition of our forefathers. It was called a sumptuary law, and it shows that such had been the state of civilisation, that a law was necessary to restrain the people in regard to the luxuries of dress, and accordingly an act was passed 350 years ago, to prohibit every artisan and mechanic from wearing cloth of the cost of more than 30s. per yard, and every field labourer from wearing cloth of the cost of more than 20s. per yard (cheers). My friends, no such law as that is necessary now. Supposing a full-sized labourer of the present day to be fed on beef, mutton, pork, and veal, he would require a much bigger coat than fits him at present, and if he took at that time two yards of cloth, at 20s., it would have been about the cost of two bullocks, or thirty sheep, or eight quarters of wheat or malt (cheers). This statement is not of my own making, but these are facts which I quote from the records of the nation. It is Fortescue and Clarendon, two Lord High Chancellors of England, who state these things, and who then described the state of the people "as the envy of surrounding nations and the admiration of the world" (loud cheers). I come now to the period of the Revolution of 1688, and I find that there was double the quantity of malt consumed in England by the same number of inhabitants as there is in the present day (cheers). But I will bring you down to a still later period, and to a spot near home. I mean to the parish of Titchfield. I hold in my hand a statement given to me by Mr. Carver, of Upham, taken from the farm-book of Mr. Huxman, who held three farms in the parish of Titchfield, forming together an equilateral triangle, and there I find that, in 1782, a farm labourer with his wages could buy 27 gallons of malt, or 19 gallons of wheat, or 33 lbs. of peg meal (cheers). And I also find that James Rutter, one of the labourers, paid 2s. 10s. a year for his house rent and the grazing of a cow; so that from this time to the present the state and condition of the labourer has been gradually deteriorating until it has reached the degrading level on which it now stands (cheers). But what do I find still further? I have another authority on this subject, contained in the Journals of the House of Commons for the year 1820, which is only five years after the law of 1815 was passed, and from an entry in those journals, it appears that the state and condition of the labourer was then so wretched that the legislature thought it advisable to move for a committee of the whole house to take the subject into consideration. And what was the result? Why, men of the first respectability were examined at the bar, and of these, the first was Mr. John Elmore, now a celebrated protectionist in Sussex, who, when asked what had been the condition of the agricultural labourer 30 or 40 years before the time at which he was examined, replied, that then every provident labourer in his parish brewed his own beer, and enjoyed it with his family at his own fire-side. Now, he added, there are only two or three to whom I supply malt (cries of "shame, that is true"). The next witness examined was a gentleman whose name I forget, but who was High Sheriff of the county of Wilts, and he stated that the labourers "then subsisted principally upon good bacon, bread and beer." On what do they subsist now? was the next question, and his reply was, that their principal food consisted of potatoes, which they carried cold with them to the fields (loud cries of "shame!"). Thus, my friends, you see that your condition, from whatever cause, has gone on gradually deteriorating. I do not say that this is to be attributed to the Corn Laws alone, because many other causes have conspired to produce these fearful results, but I do say that the Corn Laws have not prevented them, and that if those laws had been conducive to the prosperity of the country, the condition of the labourer would have been ameliorated and bettered instead of made worse. There is no man present whose intellect is so obtuse as not to know this fact, and it is wrong to suppose that a man, because he has been brought up at the plough tail, has no skill or common sense. Now, as to this Corn Law. You all of you remember the late war and privations which were then endured with a patience unexampled. We had then all the world against us, and we were told that this nation was so isolated, that we must stand together to beat Boney, and defend our happy fire-sides. We were told also that peace would come, and with peace plenty (hear, hear; and loud cries of "yes, we remember all that"). The labourers of England did come forward, and were ready to shed the last drop of blood in their bodies in defence of their native land (cheers). Well, the year 1815 came, and then, only one year after peace was restored and plenty had been promised, the House of Commons passed a law, which enacted that no wheat should be imported into this country until it had reached 80s. per quarter for the three preceding months. It was said that this law was necessary, not merely to keep up the respectability, but the very existence of our country as a nation. It was opposed by a gentleman now a half-and-half protectionist—I mean Lord Ashburton—then Mr. Alexander Baring, a merchant and a money lender, so violently that Mr. Robinson (now the Earl of Ripon, then Chancellor of the Exchequer) accused him with fomenting mobs outside of the house, and threatened him with the consequences. Lord Ashburton dared Mr. Robinson to postpone the measure for another week; that if so there would be such an expression of public opinion against it that the bill would never be passed into a law. Lord Ashburton described the measure thus. "He said that seeing its tendency to raise the price of bread, a more cruel act of injustice towards the labourers of this country could not be perpetrated. And what did Mr. Robinson reply? Why that the measure would not have any injurious effect upon the labourer, because if he could not earn enough wages they would be made up to him from the parish pay-table, so that he had a resource to fall to. And so matters went on until a great cry was made that the poor were going to eat up the country (loud cries of "That's true!"). A report was then drawn up, than which a grosser libel on the working classes never was published (cheers). On that report a bill was founded and brought in—a bill which I am almost afraid to mention, for it raises my feelings and makes my blood boil with indignation—it is the accursed Poor Law Bill (groans and hisses). Now I contend fairly and honestly the passing of that abominable law—which cuts off from the labouring man that out-door relief, which he preferred in the shape of wages, to being doled out in charity, affords a fertile reason for the repeal of the Corn Laws, because if one law was passed to make bread dear, and another law was passed to constitute poverty a crime, it was a proceeding so monstrous that I can hardly speak of it with calmness, and the most cruel injustice ever practised on the rights of mankind (cheers). I consider that the Corn Laws were virtually repealed by the passing of the New Poor Law, and it ought to have been so, in fact (great cheering). Hence, it is our bounden duty to our wives, our children, and our country, to raise our voices against the Corn Laws. It is now proposed by Sir Robert Peel, yielding, as he does, to the voice of public opinion, to abolish the Corn Laws at the end of three years; and a difference of opinion exists as to the wisdom of continuing them for three years, or of repealing them immediately, but I am happy to say that the great mass of the farmers, instead of agreeing to a deception for three years, join almost to a man, heart and hand, in supporting total and immediate repeal. I have met with only one exception, and that is my friend, Mr. Whale (hisses and groans). If, then, the farmers are severe—(cries of "Who will doubt it?")—it is in strict keeping with our duty as labourers, (for I call myself one of yourselves,) to come forward and do their work for them (cheers). If, however, they have not the energy and decision to come forward and prove that the Corn Laws have not produced happiness and prosperity, I trust we shall adopt a petition for repeal; but if, on the contrary, it should be the feeling of the majority of this company that, during the 30 years those laws have been in operation, the labourers have enjoyed happiness and comfort, and have been better fed, better housed, and better clothed than they were before, then adopt a petition for the continuance of those laws (cries of no, no, never). I do not come here to set the labourer against his master, because I believe that unless the farmer is in a state of prosperity, the labourer cannot enjoy any degree of comfort. I believe that the real interests of the farmer, the labourer, and the landlord are identical; but if the farmers would adopt the use of a little "Cobdenised eye-salve," and look a little beyond their noses, they would see that they had been the mere cat's paws of the landlords. The law is not a farmer's, but a parson's law. It has worked a great moral evil; it has never fulfilled its purpose, or the pledges given with respect to it. It has turned out a mere delusion, and it has swept away four-fifths of the renting farmers of this country, leaving the remainder in anything but a state of prosperity (loud cheers). If they were in a state of prosperity, what hypocrisy it was for them to go whining about distress before no less than five committees of the House of Commons. Mr. Ekless proceeded at still further length to comment on the operation of the existing Corn Laws, and after pronouncing a warm eulogy on the services of the Times newspaper in advocating the cause of the poorer classes, concluded by asking for as fair a hearing for every person as he had obtained himself. Three cheers were enthusiastically given for Mr. Ekless.

JAMES BEDDLE, a labouring man, clad in a smock-frock, then came forward and proposed a resolution, of which the following is an exact copy: "Resolved, that we be the farmers labors be as bad of as we can be not being able to get the Necessaries wat we and our Fameles wants and tho a good many saie we be pertected by the Corn Lawes we thinks we shoud be better of if thare woodent noan." The mover stated that last winter he had earned nine shillings per week, out of which he had to keep a family of seven in number; and this year he had got ten shillings a-week to keep eight. He had no house-rent to pay; but they wanted eight gallons (a term peculiar to Hants) of bread a week, which cost 8s. 2d.; which left him and his family 1s. 10d. (A Voice—"Where is the meat to come from?") Last winter all he had to eat during the whole of the cold weather was bread twice a day. (Another voice: "Your family had not any roast joints at home.") No, they had not. All they had was bread. (A third voice: "Had you not a little water, Jam?") Yes, plenty of that; but I leave you to judge after that (cries of "Shame.")

JOHN LIPSCOMB, another labourer, seconded the resolution. He said that perhaps some of his fellow-labourers around him might know his state as well as he did himself; but if not, his state was thus: He went to work six days in the week for nine shillings. His family consisted of four children, his wife and himself making six in number. They required six gallons of bread a week, which took seven shillings of his earnings; and if he calculated to spend the remainder in butter, it would be only a halfpenny worth for each per day. But he did not spend the money in that way. From the 10th of December to the 22d of February he had never seen either cheese or butter in his house; and if it had not been for one gentleman (William Garnier, Esq.,) letting him have an acre of his land at a reasonable rent, he and his family would have been almost starved during the past winter. The man with much feeling thus concluded:—"May God Almighty, who rules the hearts of our Queen and her subjects, turn their hearts to us, and look upon us with an eye of mercy and pity; and to relieve our distresses give us Free Trade if it will afford us any good. I have described my state as well as I can; I have nothing more to say. I have got no money." (Loud cheers for Lipscombe.)

JANE CLREVE, a cleanly-dressed, middle-aged woman, next came forward, and said she had a sick husband and a sick child, and had applied to the parish, who had given her five shillings and six loaves of bread during the time her husband was ill. She had two shillings a week to pay for house-rent, and they wanted three-and-a-half gallons of bread to give them two meals a day. Meat she never saw, but a piece one of her neighbours had given to her sick boy. Her family consisted of five children, her husband, and herself. The doctor had been to see her husband, and she had applied for a little tea and sugar, but was told it was only allowed when the party was in a dying state. ("Shame.") She went before the board of guardians, and had been allowed 2lbs. of mutton to make a little broth, and last week she had received 3s. 6d., which was sixpence a head for her family. She hoped the Corn Laws would be done away with, if that would do any good for the poor (loud cries of "Free Trade for ever.")

POLLY EDWARDS, a comely looking matron, next came forward and said she had come to state her case. She was the mother of five children who required six gallons of bread a week. She paid 1s. 6d. house rent, 6d. a week to her husband's benefit club, and 6d. a week for her children's schooling, and after this she left the people to guess how much she had remaining out of 11s. a week. Many nights she had gone to bed with a baby to suckle, after having had nothing but a bit of bread and a drink of cold water (loud cries of "shame.") One ounce of tea, and a quarter of a pound of sugar had to last seven of them an entire week. She hoped the Corn Law would be repealed and that her husband would be able to go to work from 6 o'clock to 6 o'clock, with some meat to eat instead of a bit of "bread and scrape," if he had even that. This was her case, and she had walked five miles to tell it.

Mr. EKLESS remarked that a more honest, trustworthy, orderly moral couple than this woman and her husband did not exist. Her coming the distance she had, reflected great credit upon her, and he proposed that she should be greeted with three cheers.—The proposition was promptly and energetically adopted.

HENRY EDNEY, a labourer, from the neighbouring parish of Droxford, stated that he had a wife and nine children, six of whom were at home. His wages were 9s. per week, and his family wanted seven gallons of bread a week, which came to 8s. 2d. This left but 10d. to buy other necessities. He could say that there had used to be a few mice in his house, but that now they were all starved out. His family had been or three days with only one quatern loaf among them (shame). He was not ashamed to tell it—(cheers)—and he had worked three days, having eaten bread only once in that time.

The CHAIRMAN having inquired whether any other person wished to speak for or against the resolution, and no reply having been given, he then put the resolution, to the meeting, by whom it was unanimously adopted amidst loud cheers.

JOHN DEDIMUS then mounted the platform and said he had got a resolution "wrote" out, which he would get Mr. Ekless to read for him.

Mr. EKLESS read the resolution, which was in these precise terms, "Resolved—that we send up a petition to Both Houses of Palament to take up the Corn Lawes, cause we thinks we should be better of without em."

DEDIMUS stated that he was a labourer at Weckham, and worked for Captain Green, at 10s. a week. He had a wife and six children. He paid 2s. house-rent, and sixpence to his benefit-club, which left 7s. 6d. per week for eight of them to live upon (loud cries of "Shame"). That was every farthing he got, and six gallons of bread a week was as little as they could do with, and this left but sixpence a week. (A voice, "Where's the beef, mutton, pork, and veal, and the blasters and salmon.") He got none, and was often puzzled how best to lay out the sixpence—(a voice, "Mr. Whale will tell you how to spend your sixpence"—to which another voice replied, "No, Whale is gone home with a harpoon stuck in him. Cheers and laughter.) His children had not a shoe to their feet or anything to keep them warm in the day, and scarcely so at night. (A cry of "Where is the fire?") As to the fire he was forced to steal that—he did not wish to do so, but he was forced to it. (A shout of "There's Corn Law protection for you.") The Corn Laws could not be worse, and any change must be for the better. He wanted to work to support himself and family, for he did not like to be poked into those holes—the union workhouse. His wife went to the union at the fore part of the winter, in hopes to get a little relief for their large families, and some of the great bloated fellows there said that if they could not live on 10s. a week they must come into the union altogether. These fellows sat there with wine and beef before them, while his wife had not two ounces of bread inside her (loud cheers, and cries of "Shame.")

SARAH TITTERIDGE, an intelligent-looking woman, came forward to second the resolution. She said that she had six children, who were not able to do anything, and that her husband was ill. When he was at work his wages were nine shillings per week, from which, deducting two shillings for house rent, left seven shillings for eight of a family to live upon. Her husband paid sixpence a week to his club, from which he had some assistance when he was not able to work, but if it had not been for being trusted on next summer's earnings, she and her family would have been starving during the past winter.

MARGARET HILYER made similar statements—her husband was a shepherd, earning 10s. a week, and they had nine children at home and two at service.

PETER BARFOOT, a venerable looking man, whose appearance would form an admirable study and subject for an artist, stated that all he had earned during the present month of February was three shillings, with the exception of a few coppers he had been given that day.

No other speakers presenting themselves, The CHAIRMAN put the resolution, which passed amidst loud cheers.

Petitions to both houses of Parliament, in the following terms, were then agreed to.

"The humble petition of the labourers of Hampshire, in public meeting assembled, sheweth—

"That your humble petitioners, after going on from year to year under Corn Law protection, with bare subsistence wages, despair of an amendment of their state and condition, under those restrictive laws.

"That your petitioners, therefore, do most earnestly entreat your honourable house will be pleased to pass an act for the immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws, which, as they hope and believe, would be followed by an equitable adjustment of tithes, the protection against game, and the repeal of the malt tax, thus placing the renting farmers in a more secure and legitimate condition than they have been in under the last thirty years of Corn Law protection; which would, as they also believe, improve the state and condition of your petitioners, by keeping the price of provisions more moderate and steady, and by an increased demand for their labour, through an outlay of capital on the land, which the present uncertainty, occasioned by Corn Law protection, has had a powerful influence in preventing.

"And your petitioners will ever pray."

On the motion of Mr. Ekless, three cheers were given to the reporters of The Daily News, the Times; and of the local journals then present; and three cheers for Cobden, Bright, and Free Trade; and the concourse of persons who had remained throughout the proceedings, which occupied until half-past eight o'clock, began to move off towards their respective homes in the same peaceable and quiet manner as they arrived.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"Be instant in season, and out of season."

SIR,—Allow me, through the medium of your journal, to acknowledge the receipt of 10s. from C. H., Bristol, for the use of the poor in my neighbourhood. Many thanks to C. H.

Sir, while I have the pen in my fingers, I may as well inform both yourself and your many readers, that Free Trade doctrines are gaining ground in our high church neighbourhood; and the farmers in general would, I know, much rather have the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, than the measure as proposed by Sir Robert Peel. The farmers of our province were taken by no small degree of surprise, in our market place, on Friday, the 20th inst. I employed a man to distribute about seventy-five copies of the League and Economist newspapers, including a great number of Anti-Corn Law tracts, and about fifty copies of the Anti-Corn Law Catechism among them. It was highly amusing to see how some of the worthy cultivators of the soil threw the League up into the air, just as they would shake off a serpent; but the great bulk of those who took the papers, &c., put them into their pockets: and I have not a doubt that, in consequence of the simple plan which I have adopted, to promulgate Free Trade doctrines, many hundreds of farmers, farmers' wives, sons and daughters, have now become more friendly, and more willing to think and act for themselves, than they have been accustomed to do.

I am indebted to my old, well-tried, and constant friend, Joseph Proctor, Esq., Manchester, for the greater number of the papers which have been distributed at my request and by my directions. And it is my duty and privilege to add, that Mr. Proctor has forwarded the sum of 10l. to be laid out by me for the benefit and to promote the comfort and elevation of the starving and half-naked poor in my own neighbourhood. For this rich and seasonable gift for the peasantry of the district in which I live, and often sigh and weep over the miseries of my fellow men, I give thanks, and take courage. I am still hard at work, walking day after day from hovel to cottage and from hamlet to village, to see and examine for myself how far the statements made to me at my own door, and by hundreds of the peasantry, are true and to be relied upon; and I can assure your readers that the more I search out the real condition of the field-labourers, the more I am constrained to say to the "protectionists," "With force and with cruelty have ye ruled them."

Last week both my wife and myself paid a visit to the hamlet of Arncoft, in the parish of Ambrosden, Oxon. Arncoft is about five miles from Bicester.

Out of the many applications made to us for relief by the poor of Arncoft, we have selected a number of the most wretched and destitute families we could find, and have given them, blankets, sheets, and smockfrocks. We shall not soon forget the miseries, privations, and sufferings of these poor people; neither can we ever forget their artless, simple, and heartfelt expressions of thanks to those Free Traders who have enabled us to assist them.

These poor people (hundreds in number) have no other water, summer or winter, to boil or to drink, than what they draw from the stagnant and filthy ponds at which cows and horses drink, and in which ducks and geese swim. The consequence of using this puddle, and of the hunger endured by the people, is an annual typhus fever, by which several persons are hurried every year into eternity.

It is not long since, a labourer's wife in Arncoft was so destitute of bedding, that she had to remain on her death-bed without any other covering than a chemise, while a poor neighbour washed the only sheet which the dying woman had to cover her, and she died before the sheet could be rendered fit for the bed!!

One of the men to whom we gave sheets and blankets last week, whose name is Green, has had the typhus fever in his hovel for seven weeks; his wife has been ill, and not able to stand by herself, and consequently the poor man has had to hire a woman out of his 8s. a-week to attend to him, and his three children have been ill of the typhus fever, and confined to the house for seven weeks. The poor man used to lay one of the children on an old sack on the floor before the fire, while he attended to his delirious wife and other children. Another sober and industrious man, to whom we have given sheets and a blanket, has been seen this winter by a member of my church, with his wife and children, 10 in number, eating out of an old beehive; but their food was neither "locusts" nor "wild honey" no,—but their rich repast was made up of boiled Swedes and greens, mashed into a kind of pulp.

Another great sufferer in our neighbourhood is a young man who lost his father a few years ago. The poor lad was brought up in the midst of plenty, but since the death of his father—especially this winter—he has been almost starved to death. I know it to be a fact, that the poor fellow was so reduced by hunger a few weeks back, that he could not walk up stairs to his bed.

Sir, I have done what I could to relieve the most distressing cases which I could find in the town and neighbourhood in which I live and labour, but I have not reached more than one-half of those cases of wretchedness and misery which call aloud for help. It is now about seven years since I took up the cause of the rural peasantry. I then said that whenever others in other counties could be induced to follow my example, the peasantry as a whole (in the South of England), and not the peasantry of this or that county, would be found a ruined wreck.

Others have since followed my example in pleading for the poor, and those who read THE LEAGUE know the result. I should like to know when I am to have the remainder of the beds and bedding promised me. I have promised them to the bedless sons and daughters of toil, and they are ready to worry me for them. The following is an exact copy, spelling and all, of a letter addressed to me, begging for a bed. The writer is a sober, pious, and industrious man, and a member of the Primitive Methodist Society.

"DEAR SIR,—I hope you will not be offended with me for my coming to you, for I hear that you have beds to give away—I have no bed of my own, we sleep on my mother's bed—I have been out of work for 3 weeks, but I have work now and I have six shillings a week for 3 persons to live on And I ham afrade I shall not get one without you are my friend." Jas. STANFORD, Merton, Oxfordshire.

"29 January, 1846."

Sir, I have presented in this letter a FATR specimen of the PROSPERITY AND MENTAL CULTURE of the PROTECTED LABOURERS in the counties of OXON and BUCKS, and beg to close this epistle with the following short petition:—"Perish protection—flourish Free Trade."—I am, Sir, yours very respectfully, Wm. FERGUSON, Minister of the Congregational Independent Church, Feb. 23, 1846. Bicester, Oxon.

THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE—THURSDAY.

MR. ROEBUCK, before the orders of the day were read, begged leave to put a question to the honourable gentlemen who occupied the benches opposite. He wished those hon. gentlemen would give him to understand the time at or about which the present debate was likely to terminate (hear, hear, hear). Because it appeared to him that the debate had taken a turn quite different from that which it professed to have in view, and that it seemed to be directed rather to waste time than to improve it (hear, hear). He had heard an honourable gentleman the other night occupy two hours and a half of the very valuable time of the house on subjects that had reference to anything and everything but to the business of the debate before them. He (Mr. Roebuck) thought that such a proceeding did not reflect any honour on the house. It certainly was not the way in which to promote the character of the house for decency, order, or anything that was great. That honourable gentleman had spoken for two mortal hours and a half by the clock on any and every subject but the one before the house. He (Mr. Roebuck) did not wonder at the proceedings of the honourable gentleman. He was accustomed to him. But what he was surprised at was, that honourable gentlemen opposite should have cheered and encouraged him in such a style of proceeding, as if they or their cause had been deriving any assistance from his vociferations. If the house were to maintain its dignity, it was not by permitting or indulging in vulgar vituperation, or indecent menace. The honourable gentleman looked as if he had come down like Orson with his club to lay about him; and he indulged accordingly in furious, outspoken, mere—there were words in the English language which would express most properly his opinions of the honourable gentleman's speech, but which would hardly be in accordance with the rules or usages to which the house was accustomed, and he was therefore driven to the use of words that were less expressive but more decent (laughter and cheers). The difficulty of finding suitable language was not raised by him but by that person—by that honourable member who had so violated decency (loud cries of "order, order," from the protectionist benches). Did they cry "order" at him? Did they cry "order" when the violence of which he spoke took place (hear, hear, from the Opposition benches)? No, they did not. And were they as a party so low, that instead of argument they were reduced to rely on blustering and swaggering demeanor? This was an accurate description, and he hoped that the hon. member had something to display beyond the exhibition of intense passion. It was not the reading of extracts from former speeches, or saying that such and such an individual was a dishonourable person, because he had not done exactly what the honourable member thought he ought to have done, that anything was gained in the way of debate or argument. Besides, what was the worth of that honourable gentleman's opinion? Was there a human being, measuring its value professionally, who would give a guinea, or half a guinea, or half a farthing, even, for any opinion he expressed? He (Mr. Roebuck) admitted that great ability had been displayed on the other side; he had been improved and informed by listening to many honourable members; but he must be allowed to add, that it was not by an exhibition like that in the last night's debate that the character of the party opposite would be elevated. He hoped, for the honour and credit of the landed interest, that they would have something better to put forward this evening. He (Mr. Roebuck) did not care for personal imputations; he had lived too long in the atmosphere of this house to value them, but he earnestly hoped that the country gentlemen of England would not be driven to depend upon such advocacy. If the house were to divide, let it divide on argument alone; and to-night he trusted that they would furnish something a little more like it than the speech to which he had referred, and not require the house to sit and listen to violent hatred, in violent and vulgar language (cheers).

MR. BRIGHT agreed that this was not the best time for entering into such matters; but he was anxious to say a few words on what fell from the honourable member for Knaresborough, respecting the conduct of an intimate friend of his (Mr. Bright's), who had not an opportunity of defending himself (hear, hear). He alluded to Mr. George Wilson, the chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League. He did not intend to enter into any detailed contradiction; but to be at liberty to say that nearly every portion of what the honourable member for Knaresborough had stated as facts, and every particle of inference he had drawn from them was to be set down as utterly untrue. Mr. Wilson had never called any meeting of the starch-manufacturers: he had never presided at any such meeting, and he had been no party to any deputation that waited upon Government. The object of the starch-manufacturers was not to obtain protection, but as their raw material was enhanced in price by protective duty, it was necessary that the imported article should have a protective duty imposed upon it. When foreign malt was brought into this country, it would only be just to the malsters, that they should be protected to the amount of the exorbitant duty upon home-grown malt. Mr. Wilson was the last man who would join with the starch-manufacturers, if what they wanted was protection in the sense in which the word was used. There was a strange fatality about the assertions in the speeches of the honourable member for Knaresborough, that as far as he (Mr. Bright) had ever heard or read, he had not been able to substantiate any of them (cheers).

DR. BOWRING thought the house had great reason to complain of the absence of the hon. member for Knaresborough, who had directed serious charges against a personal friend of his (Dr. Bowring), who was unable to defend himself. He alluded to the benevolent and intelligent Henry Ashford, of Bolton, who had been brought before the house as having been guilty, to use the words of the honourable member for Knaresborough, of cold-blooded cruelty. His acts had been processionised in the face of the house by the hon. member, who had talked of the dirt, the poverty, and the squalid state of the dwellings of the people Mr. Ashford employed (hear, hear, hear). He (Dr. Bowring) had had some opportunity of knowing the real condition of the population by which his friend was surrounded, and he would venture to assert that in the midst of the dire distress that assailed Bolton a few years ago, the workmen at the mills of Turton and Egerton formed a striking contrast to the rest of the inhabitants. He had written a note to the noble member for Newark (Lord J. Manners), and he hoped that he was in his place. He had also requested the presence of the hon. member for Canterbury (Mr. Smythe), because they had both done Mr. Ashford the honour to visit him, and to inspect the state of his work-people, in order to ascertain whether there was any truth in the representations made in the House of Commons and elsewhere as to the condition of those employed by Mr. Ashford. He (Dr. Bowring) was sure, if they were present, they would pay due homage to truth and justice, by stating the fact. The statement of the honourable member for Knaresborough was altogether untrue (cheers). He (Dr. Bowring) felt called upon to add that if there were anybody who was bound to be singularly scrupulous and careful in his assertions, it was the honourable member for Knaresborough; few were less at a loss for boldness than the honourable member.

A Member, whose name we could not learn, observed that no doubt the honourable member for Knaresborough had many faults, but it was fit that he should be present when he was told of them. An opportunity would occur on a future day (cheers).

LORD MORPETH wished to be permitted to make one reference to what had been said by the honourable member for Knaresborough. He had been the last speaker on Tuesday, and it seemed not unreasonable to expect that he should be present now. He (Lord Morpeth) had a letter in his pocket at the time the honourable member was making his address, which directly contradicted the statement that the operatives at Union-hall had been compelled by their master to sign the petition for the repeal of the Corn Laws. The letter accompanied the petition, and asserted that the signatures were as free as the air the subscribers breathed. Such they believed was the case with other petitions. They made the remark, they added, because it had been said that they had been compelled by their masters to sign it. The operatives, it went on to state, were more anxious than their employers for the total and immediate repeal of all duties on articles of food (cheers). His lordship subjoined that he had received similar letters from other quarters.

MR. ROSS did not feel himself called upon to notice what the honourable member for Knaresborough had advanced respecting the election for the West Riding of Yorkshire, or the personalities in which he had indulged; least of all the assertion that the honourable member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden) had been guilty of selling milk to his work-people. Had that honourable member spoken at all to the question before the house, he (Mr. Ross) should have been prepared to answer him. The honourable member for Northamptonshire (Mr. S. O'Brien) had delivered a speech near the commencement of the discussion, as remarkable for the excellence of its phraseology as it was lamentable for its lack of argument; but he had advanced one position which he had put syllogistically, of which it might be necessary to expose the fallacy. The position was that the labourer was entitled to protection, and thus he endeavoured to prove it: the labour of a working man is his property—therefore he is entitled to protection. If the labour of a working man were his property, any man who by any means deprived him of his property ought to be criminally punishable, and the fallacy was, that although the working man is entitled to protection in the exercise of his industry, he is not entitled to the protection of his labour as property. A confusion seemed to have arisen in the honourable gentleman's mind between protection and property, and he had been driven to use a fallacy in spite of his own understanding. After reading an extract from one of Pym's speeches, in order to prove that even at that early date, he was a warm and sincere friend to Free Trade principles, the honourable member adverted to the statistical details brought forward by the honourable member for Dublin, and to the contents of a petition he (Mr. Ross) had presented from Belfast, signed by all the flax-spinners and other artisans in favour of the unrestricted import of grain. For himself he was quite clear of any equivocal motive for the course he now pursued: he had not adopted his opinions for the purpose of obtaining his seat, but he had been freely selected by his constituents long before the late dissolution, on account of the knowledge they possessed of his claims to their suffrages. He was not surprised that those who thought differently acted differently: they dreaded a danger which he thought chimerical; but as they really feared it, he could not expect from them the more than Roman virtue to plunge into the gulf with their eyes open. He took the course he now adopted because he had arrived at a fixed belief that the repeal of the laws restricting the import of food would be beneficial to the country at large. He would advert briefly to the dependence of the agricultural interest on manufacturing prosperity, and he laid it down as incontrovertible that the influence of the one interest was the prosperity of the other. For this reason he contended that the measure, instead of injuring, would benefit Ireland. At that time he admitted that many improvements in agriculture were yet required. In Roxburghshire, Berwickshire, and the Lothians, the perfection of farming might be said to exist, and it had been mainly produced by competition. An impulse of the same kind would be given to agriculture generally when free importation of grain was allowed. In reference to this point the honourable member noticed the introduction of the growth of flax into Armagh, as well as the improvements in the cultivation of it, so that in a short time it seemed very possible that it might surpass the flax of Belgium, and drive it out of the home market. Upon this question he went into some statistical details, which illustrated and enforced his position. Another article in which great improvements had been made, and still greater were possible, was Irish butter. At present a vast quantity of Dutch butter was weekly brought into the market, which might ere long be superseded by Irish butter, if greater care and skill were displayed in the manufacture and cure of it. He had no doubt this country would maintain her wonted supremacy in arts and arms, if the Corn Laws were at once repealed, notwithstanding the gloomy forebodings which hon. gentlemen opposite indulged in (hear, hear).

Mr. B. DENISON regretted that Mr. Ferrand was not in his place; for Mr. Ferrand had alluded to him the other night in his absence, in a way in which he was by no means justified. Mr. Ferrand had stated to the house that Sir R. Peel, when he did him the honour to ask him to second the address, had deceived him as to the measure which he (Sir R. Peel) intended to propose. Now, Sir R. Peel was the last man in the world to deceive anybody; and in no way, either directly or indirectly, had he deceived them. When he (Mr. B. Denison) seconded the address, he expected that Sir R. Peel would propose a measure of the same character as those which he had proposed, on several occasions in the last three years, and which had been so eminently successful; but he had not been prepared to expect that Sir R. Peel would propose a total abolition of the Corn Laws, after a period of three years, during which we were to have a diminished sliding scale, accompanied by certain compulsory propositions. He thought that in propounding such a scheme, Sir R. Peel had committed a mistake, which many now regretted, and which he hoped that Sir R. Peel would never live to regret himself. Though he should oppose to the uttermost that scheme, he hoped that, if it were made law, it would promote the public interests in the way which Sir R. Peel expected.

Mr. BROTHERTON said that the honourable member for the West Riding of Yorkshire seemed to think there was something derogatory to a man's character involved in a change of opinions; but he (Mr. Brotherton) had read in an old book, that the wise man changed often; but that one of a different nature continued in his perversity (hear, hear, and a laugh). As to the statement made by the honourable member respecting the proportion of foreign corn consumed in the country, he would say that if the honourable member had attended to the returns laid before the house, he would have found that from 1815 to 1831 the proportion of the population that fed upon foreign corn was 1 in 30—that from 1831 to 1831 it had increased to 1 in 22—and that from 1831 to 1841 it was 1 in every 16½ (hear, hear). If the average were to be taken now, he (Mr. Brotherton) was convinced that 1 out of every 10 persons now depended for his food on the foreign market. He would not dispute that many persons voted for the Corn Laws under the impression that they tended to keep up agriculture. Those laws might have been framed with that view—they might have been designed—not to keep up the rents, or render food dear—but to encourage agriculture, and to enable the country to produce sufficient food for the population (hear, hear). But the question now was, have they answered their end? He believed they had utterly failed to do so, and that for 30 years the numbers of the people fed on foreign corn had been rapidly increasing. In Ireland, 4,000,000 of people lived on potatoes. The Prime Minister states that those people were on the brink of famine from the disease of that vegetable; and it could not be denied that the Government had shown wisdom in providing against such a calamity. In arguing against the measure the country gentlemen had given expression to their feelings in speeches which, discarded of verbiage, meant nothing more nor less than this: "The land is ours—we will do as we like with our own. We have a right to govern you, and you cannot complain of your condition; for we have given you employment, and you are much better off than the serfs of Poland or Russia. We are determined you shall be fed at our prices, and by our produce alone" (cries of Hear, hear, and No, no). He firmly believed honourable gentlemen opposite would prevent any foreign corn coming into this country if they could (no, no). There had been a great deal of cant uttered during the debate about the condition of the working-classes and the benefits conferred on them by the Corn Laws—he had heard too much about the distress of the agricultural labourers (hear, hear). That might all be very charitable and humane; but honourable gentlemen would do well to consider who employed the labourer. He contended there were fewer agricultural labourers employed in 1841 than in 1831, and that in 1831 there were still fewer than in 1821, though the population had increased 4,000,000 since the latter year. There were now about 1,200,000 agricultural labourers in the kingdom (oh, oh, and cheers). That was the number given in the return (hear, hear). On an average each labourer was paid 8s. a week. The annual consumption of wheat might be taken at 20,000,000 quarters, which at 25s. a quarter came to 25,000,000l. a year. How was the difference in value made up, and by whom were the labourers paid (hear)? The law as it at present stood was inhuman and unjust, and the increase in the price of food induced by its operation this year alone made a difference of 1,000,000l. sterling to the people of Lancashire. The best encouragement to agriculture was foreign competition (hear). He thought the measure before the House entitled to the support of the country, and though he would have preferred an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, which would, in his opinion, have been truly worthy of a great minister, he would, nevertheless, give his vote to her Majesty's Government, because he was convinced that their proposition, so far from being injurious to the working classes, or to any class, would cause a decrease in the amount of poverty, crime, wretchedness, and be conducive to the advance of the general interests of the country (hear, hear, hear).

Mr. CHRISTOPHER expressed his intention to resist the measure of the Government, and to give his cordial support to the amendment of Mr. Miles. He considered the explanation which Sir Robert Peel had given of the reasons which had induced him to resign and resume office perfectly satisfactory (hear, hear); but he could not express himself in terms of equal satisfaction as to the causes which had induced the right honourable baronet to introduce so sweeping and so perilous a measure as the present (cries of hear, hear).

Mr. CARDWELL next addressed the house. He said that, although it would be his misfortune to differ from his honourable friend the member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and from his hon. friend who had just sat down, in the vote he was about to give, it would not, therefore, be necessary for him to differ from all the positions which those hon. gentlemen had laid down; but, on the contrary, in the few observations he should submit to the house, he should frequently have to admit many of those positions upon which they seemed to lay the greatest weight, and to press, as he thought he might justly do, into the service of his own argument many of the facts and illustrations they had thought it expedient to introduce into theirs (hear, hear). To his honourable friend the member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, he (Mr. Cardwell) could have no difficulty in admitting that agriculture had gone on improving with the increase of the population of the united empire. Also, he could have no difficulty in allowing, that although we had had a constant relaxation in the protective system, and the ordinary prices of agricultural produce were now, as the hon. member had said, lower than at the commencement of the century—notwithstanding all this, agriculture was in a prosperous and improving condition, and the general welfare of the country had gone on improving likewise. On the other hand, it was not necessary for him to dispute that with the variations of the harvests the prosperity of the country had varied. The obvious and first result of a bad harvest was to cause great scarcity of food, and it would be inconsistent with the argument he was about to offer to contend for a single moment that the prosperity of the country had not varied in exact ratio with that circumstance. Nor would it be necessary for him to deny that the condition of the population had gone on generally improving. So far from denying these facts, it would be necessary for him to draw from them the illustrations of his own argument. As he had never had the opportunity of expressing in that house his opinion upon the subject of the Corn Laws, perhaps he might be excused if he now stated the grounds which induced him to give to this measure, for the final settlement of them, his most cordial support (hear, hear). His hon. friend, who peculiarly represented the agricultural interest, had rested his case for protection upon the assumption that it was calculated to promote the interests of all classes of the community. Upon this ground he (Mr. Cardwell) desired to meet him: and most unworthy should he be to enter upon so great a question in that house, if in dealing with it as affecting all classes of the community, he did not recognise amongst the first of those classes, that great interest which hon. gentlemen near him so ardently, and in many instances so creditably supported. The arguments upon which the honourable gentlemen rested their case were these:—They said that the existing system of protection had maintained an independence of foreign supply; that it had given security on which capital could be cheerfully invested in the improvement of domestic agriculture; that it had ensured to the farmer steady prices, and that it had provided for labour a protective rate of wages. Did those honourable gentlemen remember that the declared annual value of our native manufactures was 50,000,000l.? Did they remember that during the war, at the conclusion of which we were engaged with both America and France, we were indebted to the first for our cotton, and to the last for our corn (hear, hear)? He knew the distress that had existed in 1842, but it was not occasioned by our dependence upon foreigners for food, for at that time the law for the protection of native agriculture was upon the statute book as now, but by the failure in the demand of our foreign customers, by which our traders became involved in difficulty, and our labourers in a state approaching to starvation. But if this country was at the present moment as dependent upon foreigners in every other way as one free country could be upon another, was it less dependent as regarded the article of corn? Hon. members seemed to make light of the fact that the gross annual import of foreign corn for our own consumption was two millions, or ten per cent. upon the whole consumption of England. If that were so, it was not using language according to its practical signification—it was little better than a play upon words—to say that the existing law secured to this country independence of foreign supply (hear, hear). As to the security which the law afforded for the cheerful investment of capital in the improvement of domestic agriculture, he put it to honourable gentlemen whether, in the actual situation of England, knowing as they did that there was a strong prevailing sentiment in opposition to the existing law, that a strong tide of public opinion had set in against it—there would not, in the nature of the constitution under which we lived, necessarily be much difficulty in maintaining that confidence and security? Of this fact there could not be the slightest question, that the notion of a protective system was every day becoming less popular (hear, hear). He believed he was perfectly warranted in asserting that every member of that house, on whom had devolved the responsibility of giving advice in the councils of her Majesty, was upon principle opposed to the maintenance of protection in this country (hear, hear). The manufacturing interests were strenuously opposed to it; and if his gallant friend, the member for Liverpool, were in his place, he was sure he would admit that the commercial interests were also averse to it (hear, hear). The principle could find but few defenders, unless amongst the agricultural interest. And even then, could it be said that unanimity of opinion prevailed on the subject (hear, hear)? Surely not. Was it not notorious that many advocates of the system amongst the agricultural party had recently followed the steps of the late Lord Spenser, and the present Lord Grey, and had not the hon. member for Northampton himself admitted that he had never contended that protection was to be permanent, and that all the British farmer wanted was certainty against future changes (hear, hear, hear). This being the true state of the case, were they (the protectionists) prepared to admit that if they were to succeed in frustrating the contemplated proposals of Government, and in maintaining the law as it at present existed for a while longer—were they, he asked, prepared, having accomplished this, to go down to their respective estates and to invite the farmers to come forward and take long leases, under the guarantee of the existing law (cries of "no no")? Honourable gentlemen cried no, no, but where was the boasted security said to be guaranteed by the Corn Laws to the agricultural interests, if the landlords were not prepared to make this proposition, and the farmers equally ready to accede to it (hear, hear)? It had been argued in favour of the protection system that it had the effect of securing remunerating prices to the farmer; but he denied that it possessed any such merit (hear, hear). If they (the advocates of protection) could show that they could keep the cost of production in the exact position that it now held, and that they had the power, through the means of the Corn Laws, of limiting the supply while the demand was increasing, the interference would of course be that the remuneration of the farmer was increased by the operation of the system; but if it could be proved that the cost of the production might be diminished, and that the supply might be made to increase under the abrogation of the system, a two-fold benefit would be secured to the farmer, and it would be clear that the abolition of the law would do more than its maintenance in securing good prices. If any one was inclined to question whether, by means of the contemplated measure, the cost of production might be diminished, he (Mr. Cardwell) would take leave to call an unexceptionable witness into court in the person of the honourable member for Somersetshire, whose speech on the tariff of 1842 would be found to be conclusive on the point. There would be no doubt whatever that the direct and inevitable consequence of the proposed relaxation would be to lessen very much the cost of production. And now arose the question, had the demand increased? He (Mr. Cardwell) maintained that it had, and in attestation of the truth of the assertion he need only refer to the speeches of many honourable members favourable to the protective system, in which they had expressly admitted that there never was a period when the country was in a more flourishing condition, or when trade was more active. It was the first symptom of reviving trade in Manchester, that there was suddenly a greatly increased demand for coarse joints of meat from butchers in that city. This demand, of course, originated with the industrious classes, the tradespeople, whose improved condition enabled them to enjoy a greater amount of comfort than they had previously been accustomed to. The demand, therefore, had clearly increased under the new tariff, and it was still increasing. The hon. member for Somerset had adverted to the fact, that during the last half year a falling off of 16,000 sheep a-week had taken place in the market of London since the protection system had been relaxed; but was the honourable member aware of what quantity of sheep had been imported within the last 12 months, for the double purpose of supplying the increased demand, and meeting the defalcation? Why, the fact was, that during the whole 12 months, the entire foreign supply had not been sufficient to make up the weekly defalcation (hear). If hon. gentlemen would only take the trouble of inquiring carefully into this question, they would find that the direct consequences of the relaxations which had already taken place had been to diminish the cost of production, and that an increased demand had taken place wholly disproportionate to the supply. But there was another point on which honourable gentlemen, who advocated the present system of things, laid great stress. They argue, that the Corn Laws secured to the labourer in the rural districts of England a protective rate of wages; and one hon. member, in the course of the debate, had expressed his wonderful surprise that the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government should, with the case of the silkweavers before his eyes, venture to propose the relaxation now in contemplation. Now of all the illustrations of the effects to be realised by the abolition of the protective system, he would most cheerfully avail himself of that which was furnished by the case of those who were employed in the trade of weaving silk. Wherever an article was produced by mere hand labour, there could be no doubt that as competition progressed there was an adverse incidence in the scale of wages, but when the manufacturer arrived at that position, that by the improvements of machinery he could afford to cheapen the article, the demand became much greater, and the condition of those in his employment would be improved. In the manufacturing districts of the north the effect of the introduction of machinery had been to cheapen materials, not to lessen the rate of wages, and the result had been to open markets—markets which had not existed before. The poorer classes, who, as long as the article was at high price, could not afford to purchase it, became customers to the manufacturer when the price was reduced, and thus a great market was secured to the manufacturer; who, when he had a vast number of customers to depend on, felt less sensibly his dependence on any particular class or individual (hear, hear). And what though we were to be met by hostile tariffs? The result of the operation of Free Trade principle, even under these circumstances, would be that the foreign competitor, the German or American, who was already greatly behind the English manufacturer in the course of improvement, would be compelled to undertake the rivalry under disadvantages which would be continually increasing; while the English manufacturer was succeeding in making his commodity every day cheaper and cheaper, the foreigner would find that he could not produce his except at a cost which was continually becoming dearer and dearer, and ultimately he would be unable to protect himself even in his own market. He could only hope to do so at the expense of the agriculturists of his own country, who would have to submit to a constantly increasing tariff, and would have to pay an exorbitant price for his protection (hear). It was then a mistake to contend that we should hesitate to adopt a wise and salutary policy in our own country, because it might happen that we would have to encounter hostile tariffs in other countries. Were it not that he was unwilling to weary them with statistics, he could refer them to an authentic document which he held in his hand, and which would show at a glance how vast had been the increase in our export trade, notwithstanding the existence of hostile tariffs. He maintained that the injurious effects of the hostile tariffs of other countries could be totally annulled by a wise and liberal commercial policy in our own, and if so, what became of the imaginary apprehensions with which certain honourable gentlemen in that house were so fond of torturing themselves (hear, hear)? Some honourable members appeared to be sadly alarmed at the prospect of Russia sending here five million quarters of corn, for which he feared we would be obliged to pay in the precious metals; but such an apprehension was totally uncalled for. Honourable gentlemen appeared to forget that Russia was a country which produced the precious metals, whereas this country did not produce them at all; and to suppose that we should pay in specie for goods imported from Russia was just about as rational as to suppose that a citizen of London, who procured goods from Lancashire, should pay for them by sending coals to Newcastle or Wigan (hear, hear, and laughter). Another argument against the protective system, that which had reference to the peculiar burdens supposed, and to a certain degree justly supposed, to bear upon the agricultural interest (hear). At the present stage of the debate, and having already trespassed to some length on their attention, he would not enter minutely into the consideration of this branch of the question. He would not decline it, however. He knew that this argument of peculiar burdens was one which, so far as it was founded on truth—and that it was to some extent founded on truth he fully admitted—was worthy of the most serious consideration (hear, hear). He was as ready as any of the honourable gentlemen around him could possibly be, to admit that whatever burdens were laid unequally on land, while that land was a protected interest, ought to be investigated most carefully and minutely in the consideration of such a question as the present (hear, hear). It could not be denied that a burden of this particular description having been proved as bearing on a protected interest, it was only just and rational that when it was intended to remove protection, the burden should at the same time be removed (hear, hear). This he admitted to the fullest; but what he contended for was, that no party or class of men in this country had a right to say, "True, we are a burdened interest, but we are resolved to remain a burdened interest in spite of you in order that we may have an argument in favour of the protective system" (hear, hear). And now, having endeavoured to show the fallacy of so many of the positions taken up by the protectionist party, he would take occasion to say one single word in reference to the only considerable argument of theirs which he had left as yet untouched. He alluded to what he would designate the colonial argument (hear, hear). Now he would venture to assert on the part of the honourable gentlemen who took a different view of this question from what he did, that the proposition for which they contended was precisely this—that a colony of the British empire should be to the British Parliament as dear as York or Middlesex (hear, hear). In this doctrine he fully concurred, but he had never heard any such doctrine as this propounded, that we were bound to adopt or maintain in the mother country a course of policy which we believed to be inexpedient for imperial interests, in order that we might subserve in some special or particular respects the interests of a colony (loud cries of hear, hear). There might, to be sure, be some special cases of a peculiar character which might form an exception to the rule; but it was his opinion that that which was in the main good for the mother country would be found in the main to be equally beneficial for the colony, and it was by this principle that we should be guided in considering this question in respect to its bearing on our colonial interests (hear, hear). So much for the colonial argument; and now, having canvassed in succession all the arguments which formed in the aggregate the case of the protectionists, he begged those gentlemen (if, after all he had said, they should now be of opinion that their doctrines were not quite so irresistible and conclusive as they at first believed), he begged of them in that event to consider and reflect what was their position before the public (hear, hear). Were there no stronger and more cogent arguments against them? Let them pause and think. They were endeavouring to put upon the food of the people a grievous tax, a very small portion of which found its way into the coffers of the Exchequer (loud cries of "hear, hear"). They were claiming the not very gracious privilege of interposing an arbitrary barrier to impede the free course of trade and commerce; and they were seeking to deny to native industry the natural and obvious advantage of disposing of its own production according to its own discretion (loud cries of "hear, hear, hear"). Did they not apprehend that this might perhaps be regarded by the country as rather a selfish policy? It was, and more; it was an unwise and inexpedient one (hear, hear, hear). He was averse to reading extracts if it could be avoided, and yet he was anxious to call the attention of the house to a passage from Adam Smith, to show that it was no new doctrine that he (Mr. Cardwell) was advocating:—"All systems, (says that great authority,) either of preference or of restraint, therefore, being thus completely taken away, the obvious and simple system of natural liberty establishes itself of its own accord. Every man, as long as he does not violate the laws of justice, is left perfectly free to pursue his own interest his own way, and to bring both his industry and capital into competition with those of any other man, or order of men. The sovereign is completely discharged from a duty, in the attempting to perform which he must always be exposed to innumerable delusions, and for the proper performance of which no human wisdom or knowledge could ever be sufficient—the duty of superintending the industry of private people, and of directing it towards the employments most suitable to the interests of the society" (loud cries of "hear, hear"). An illustration occurred to his mind which he heard the other day, and as he considered it a very happy and appropriate one, he would take the liberty of mentioning it and applying it to the question now under consideration (hear, hear). He was in conversation a few days ago with an illustrious gentleman who, during the late war, was a distinguished defender of his country. He alluded to the gallant admiral who had been appointed chairman of the commission to inquire into the state of the maritime defences of England. This distinguished personage observed to him, "You have been told that England's ancient boast is over, and that she can no longer rely for security on her far-famed wooden walls. You have been told the truth (loud cries of "hear, hear"). The march of improvement has deprived us of our old security. But our policy is clear. Let us not be afraid of the march of improvement—let us study to keep pace with it (hear, hear). If we do, all will be well. It has robbed us of our old security, but it will provide us with a better. One modern invention will tell us which is the point of danger, and another will concentrate on the point of attack all the disposable resources of a country. Let us keep pace with the spirit of the times, and our country will become, not a defended country, but a fortified citadel" (loud cries of hear). He did not wish to weary the house by statistics, but he could scarcely forbear referring to a calculation which he knew to be perfectly authentic, and which attested the truth of the assertion that the country was rapidly improving under a wiser policy than of old. The calculation had reference to county rate, and was as follows:—

Valuation made for County Rates in the townships which now constitute the boroughs of Manchester and Salford:—
	Manchester. Salford,

showing an increase, since 1815, of 189 per cent. in Manchester, and 194 per cent. in Salford (hear, hear). He also states, that, "since the last return to Parliament in February, 1839, there has been an increase in my district of 529 factories, of 10,641-horses power, and of 59,522 persons employed." This increase has all taken place since Nov.,

1842, when the revival of trade began; and, indeed, the increase of persons employed since that period must have been considerably greater than the above amount; for between June, 1838, when the collection of particulars for the return of 1839 began, and November, 1842, many mills had entirely ceased to work, and others had considerably reduced the number of their hands. The total number of power-looms in my district, ascertained by this inquiry, is 142,949. The only return of power-looms made to Parliament is that of 1835, and I find from it, that in the same parts of England which now constitute my districts, viz., Lancashire, part of the West Riding, and the whole of the North Riding of the county of York, and the four northern counties of England, there were then only 63,861; showing an increase of 79,088 in the ten years; and there are now 26,237 more power-looms at work in my district alone than there were in the whole United Kingdom ten years ago." Now he (Mr. Cardwell) would put it to the House whether a statement of that kind was not pregnant with more argument than almost any fact or argument that could be addressed to them. As the silk weavers had been particularly referred to by an honourable gentleman, he (Mr. Cardwell) could not but notice them, and call the attention of the House to returns in reference to them. The following was the statement in the report with reference to that trade:—"Through the entire district a general scarcity of hands is noticed, and a consequent rise of wages. In the silk districts particularly, hands are very scarce, and I have been informed that instances are not wanting where children working half time have got as much wages, and in some cases it is said that they get more than they did when they worked ten hours; but I am told that a rise also has taken place in the wages of those who now work ten and twelve hours respectively." He would next call the attention of the House to a speech by Mr. B. Moore, the chairman of the Dock Committee, recently delivered in Liverpool, and he (Mr. Cardwell) regretted that his honourable friend who advocated the case of the shipowners, was not now in the House. That gentleman said, "Surprise has been expressed in the council when an increase of 100,000 tons was talked of some time since; but I have not now to deal with an increase of 100,000 tons, but with an increase of hundreds of thousands. In the dock financial statement of the 24th of June, 1845, which was the end of the financial year, the increase was 383,819 tons over the preceding year. The increase in six months, from June to the 31st of December last exceeded that of any previous period, inasmuch as it showed an increased of 600 vessels and 209,409 tons over the corresponding six months of the previous year. The increase in the East India trade has been about 20 per cent., and the increase in the United States and Western trade has been about 30 per cent. I may also state, that in proportion as we afford increased dock accommodation, in the same proportion shall we trade to the port. Suppose that at no distant period—which I dare say will be the case—we were to have modified rates of duties on various other foreign productions (which he specified), which are at present virtually excluded by a high and impolitic tariff; when the duties are so reduced, it is not in the power of man to divine what accommodation will be required in a port like Liverpool" (cheers). He would next refer to the number of vessels engaged in the trade. He begged leave, before doing so, to call attention to one observation made by Mr. Moore with reference to that trade. In 1838 there were 305 vessels—he was now speaking of Canada.—

An Hon. MEMBER: The Baltic (hear, hear, from the Protectionists).

Mr. CARDWELL continued: They had shown an increase in the Baltic, but they would show an increase in Canada also: which ever way they liked he would have it (a laugh). He would show there was an increase in both, and they would see which was greater in proportion, or the more satisfactory (hear, hear). In 1838 the number of British American vessels amounted to 305, with a tonnage of 160,415; in 1842, 165, with a tonnage of 91,179; in 1845, 453 vessels, 239,854 tons. Now, he would take the Baltic. In 1838 there were 72 vessels, tonnage 22,788. In 1842, 33 vessels, tonnage 11,239; in 1845, 113 vessels, tonnage 33,792 (loud and continued cheering from the opposition). He (Mr. Cardwell) was glad to see that his honourable friend, the member for Sunderland (Mr. Hudson) had come into the house, because he was anxious to disabuse his mind of the fallacy that seemed to possess it. He had already dealt in his absence with the fallacy, which he thought to be as plain a fallacy as man could employ with respect to the effect of a circuitous trade, and paying the Russians for their commodities in gold. The honourable member for Sunderland said he would make railways enough in the country if they did not send out the gold of the country to bring in foreign corn. Now he (Mr. Cardwell) would remind the honourable gentleman that during the period he had been prosecuting his successful undertakings they had received two millions of quarters of Russian grain, and they had paid for it, not by sending gold to Russia, but by the increase of their export trade. The result was, that numbers of industrious navigators had been greatly benefited and their profits, if they could analyse them, would be found to have been largely invested in those railway speculations (cheers and laughter from the opposition), and to have done a great deal to promote their success (renewed cheers from the opposition). It was true that he (Mr. Cardwell) did not hesitate to give his vote in former years against the honourable member for Wolverhampton, but he always thought that great changes like that proposed should be regarded as a question of time (hear hear from the opposition). The honourable member for Northamptonshire regarded such questions as questions of time, and why should not he (Mr. Cardwell) also regard them as questions of time? and he would ask, could anybody deny that the present was a time when it was necessary to augment the supply of food (cheers from the opposition)?—and never was there a time when such a change could be effected with so slight a dislocation of existing interests. He (Mr. Cardwell) felt perfectly at liberty to say, that this was a proper occasion to consent to the adjustment of this question (hear, hear). He did say that a great, and large, and important interest in the country, whose support was essential to the Conservative party—he said so without meaning the slightest disrespect to the agricultural interest, for whom, on the contrary, he entertained the highest respect—he did say that the commercial interest did expect a reasonable and constantly vigilant and not unyielding disposition on their part to watch over the ever-varying circumstances of the country, and he was persuaded that he could, in making that assertion, be borne out by facts (cheers from the opposition). He did with perfect cheerfulness, and without hesitation, give his cordial support to the proposition for the final adjustment of this question (cheers). He did believe that its settlement would tend to the advancement of the country, the diminution of crime, the moral amelioration of the people, the general removal of sources of discord (cheers). He also believed that in a due, generous, wise, and discriminating regard for all the complicated interests of the country, the present Parliament was competent to decide upon this great question (cheers from the Opposition), and he felt assured that if they decided in the affirmative, they would confer on this great country a most important benefit (loud cheers from the Opposition).

Mr. FINCH addressed the house because he had been desired by his constituents to make their sentiments known to it. Formerly it was not a question whether there should be protection or no protection, but whether there should be a fixed duty or a sliding scale; but now both those doctrines were thrown over, as if a moral murrain had broken out among the leaders on both sides of the house. He considered their conversion, which was partly ludicrous and partly miraculous, to be the result of circumstances rather than of calm reason and impartial judgment. He then entered into a general defence of the existing Corn Laws, and into a violent denunciation of the proposed alteration in them, concluding both with an impassioned appeal to the house not to assent to the monstrous injustice of sweeping away at once all protection from agriculture.

Mr. SEYMER observed, that some members elected five years ago seemed to have forgotten the sentiments of their constituents; but it was impossible for him, who was only elected on Thursday last, to display such a failure of memory. He undertook to say, that in Dorsetshire the farmers were to a man strong protectionists, and he believed that nine-tenths of the farmers in other counties of England were so too. Their opinions were, therefore, entitled to respect from her Majesty's Government, and he was inclined to think that they would have obtained that respect had they been less loyal and more seditious.

Mr. VILLIERS then rose, and addressed the house as follows: Mr. Speaker, I have some scruple in rising after the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, considering the impartial manner in which you have selected those hon. members who have risen to address the house on the different sides of this question. Sir, I believe the hon. gentleman who has just sat down and myself entirely agree on the question before us (oh, and laughter). If I am not mistaken, coming, as he has stated, so recently from the hustings, and from addressing the farmers in Dorsetshire, he has stated that he could answer for himself upon the question, and he believed he spoke the sentiments of the farmers, that he was for the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws (no, no, and hear). Then, sir, if the hon. member denies that he entertains such an opinion, he has been entirely misrepresented, for there is not a single newspaper that reported his address to his constituents which does not state him to have declared in his speeches during the late election in Dorsetshire, that if there was to be any change in the Corn Laws, he for one should be for a total and immediate repeal of the law (no, no, and confusion). Does the hon. member deny that, when he was canvassing in Dorsetshire, he declared himself to be in favour of immediate and total repeal (hear, hear)?

Mr. KER SEYMER—If I might be allowed to say a few words, I would state what I did say on the occasion referred to by the honourable member (speak, speak). I said that if I had the power to be returned as a member of this house, I would, to the utmost of my humble ability, oppose the measure of her Majesty's ministers; but that, failing in my opposition, and if it was finally carried that the whole of the duty was to be abolished at the end of three years, we had better have it repealed at once (hear, hear).

Mr. VILLIERS—I am extremely happy to find that the honourable member has confirmed the statement of the press (no, no, from the agricultural benches). I am happy to hear a confirmation of that (cries of "no"). Why do you say no, when he has just said yes? Why the honourable member says he admitted that an immediate repeal is better than a postponement of the total abolition of the duty for three years; and I am therefore entitled to claim the honourable member as a supporter of my views (laughter). If the hon. member did really represent the farmers, I believe he would most certainly vote for the measure. He says he represents an independent body of men, and the proof he gives us of their independence is, to tell us that they went in a body to their landlords before they ventured to vote for him, to know how they were to vote (hear, and oh). The hon. member tells us that a great number of his voters hold farms under landowners of liberal principles, to whom they went before they gave their suffrages to him. Fortunately for the hon. member, he says those liberal landlords did allow their tenants to vote as they liked. But the hon. gent. gave us this as a proof that the farmers were independent; and I think it must be a most satisfactory one to you and the country. But, says the hon. member, the farmers generally are loyal and well-affected (cheers from the agricultural benches). This is a satisfactory proof that they are not under the influence of their landlords (oh, oh, and hear). I believe this to be the case. I believe the farmers are well-affected. I believe they are a very good sort of people. I believe they are far more estimable and intelligent, generally speaking, considering the temptations to which they are exposed, than to suffer themselves to be swayed by the vile, disloyal, degrading language that has recently been addressed to them by persons of the upper classes (oh, oh, and hear). Their complaints, generally speaking, are not against the state. They do not quarrel with the Government. Their grievances are much nearer home. Those who know the farmers know that they have got great grievances which are never redressed; but which, if the landlords were to attend to, they would do their duty far better to those tenants and to society than by going before them and saying that the authorities of the country are doing all they can to injure them; and that the ministry are men without good faith, honour, or honesty; for that is what they are telling them. But the farmers are too sensible a set of men to be long influenced by the violent and interested language used by their landlords to them. Sir, as far as I understand the honourable gentleman, the farmers, generally speaking, are for the immediate repeal of this law, and not in favour of its gradual abolition (loud cries of no, no, from the agricultural benches). I think the point of the hon. gentleman's speech was to show us how very much the farmers were under the influence of the landlord with respect to their votes, and how very distinct their opinions are from those of their landlords. I will just refer to a speech that was made before him. That was the most extraordinary address that we have heard recently; it was nearly an hour and a half long. I refer to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Rutlandshire (Mr. G. Finch). He is the last newly-elected protectionist member in this house. I think the hon. gent. must have met the same person as I met with this morning, who asked me what all this was about, and what was the cause of this protracted debate; for he said it was only the same old story over again, and nobody really cared about it out of the house, except that it might be brought to a close. (laughter). The honourable member gets up, and like the chorus in the Greek plays, tells us all that has passed; that people have done this, that, and the other, and concludes, as most of the protectionist members conclude, by telling us that if the Corn Laws are abolished, England's sun will set for ever (laughter). He professes to tell us what is the result of his election—that it indicates the opinion of the public to be against us. The fact is, it indicates nothing but that which the hon. gentleman the member for Dorsetshire has stated—the influence which the landlords have over the tenants in the counties. They have returned him, as many others have been returned, just to represent their own views and opinions (cries of oh, oh, and hear hear). I defy any one to make any thing out of the speech of the honourable member for Rutlandshire, except that it was important, to put an end to the trade with America and France, because those are countries which we might possibly go to war with (hear, and laughter). Why, sir, I really have some scruple in rising to address the house upon this subject. In the first place, there is nothing I can say respecting the measure now before the house, which has not been better said by her Majesty's Government; and, in the second place, that no service would be more highly appreciated by the public than that of facilitating in every way the progress of the measure, and finishing the debate as soon as possible. Honourable gentlemen in that corner of the house do not seem to encourage their forbearance. They have marked out for themselves a course of obstruction, which, perhaps, they can explain, but which, if they can, they are more fortunate than other people. However, I cannot help contrasting the patience with which the house now bears with them with the conduct adopted when the persons who promoted this question at other times have met with. When persons in a minority, in this house, and who have promoted this discussion, have stood up and pleaded for the sufferings of their constituents, and have asked for an inquiry into the connection of this law with all that misery and suffering, were asking even for a partial inquiry, into that which they ascribed to the influence of this enactment—oh, I have tingling in my ears now those hideous noises which were then raised to stifle all expression. (Cheers and laughter). I think there is also presented to us a striking contrast in what took place upon the passing of this law in 1815, with what is now occurring with regard to its abolition (hear). The people were crying out in the streets against the enactment of this law. Soldiers surrounded this house, and the members made complaints that they had not even time to present their petitions to the house, foretelling all the misery and distress which its operation could entail upon them. Notwithstanding which, the Corn Law was passed with the greatest speed with which an act would pass the house (hear). But now gentlemen opposite are pleading for themselves, for the rich, and for the aristocracy; and therefore we are to have this debate protracted to a longer period than has ever been known upon any other question—longer than any question has been protracted within the memory of any member within this house. Now we are to have an unprecedented delay. For three weeks have we sat here listening to the same statements over and over again. After all the experience which has been gained of the mischief of this law, after it has been discarded by every enlightened authority, after all the argument being on one side, and that side being supported by every experienced authority—I say, here we are, having the same things repeated over and over again, for the space of three weeks (hear). Such is the difference between the way in which the interests of the rich, and the rights of the poor, are considered in this house (cheers from the Opposition side of the house, met by ironical cheers from the protectionist benches). However, sir, as the time is to be wasted (laughter), I do not think I should be really doing justice to the principles I have advocated in this house—I do not think I should be doing justice to those whom I represent here, and those with whom I have co-operated throughout the country, if I did not express my joy and satisfaction at the concession that has been made to wisdom, truth, and justice (loud cheers, and cries of Oh, oh) in the propositions and avowals which have been made by her Majesty's ministers. And further, Sir, the subject has been so much intruded upon in this debate, that I cannot help forming an opinion as to whether this concession has been made at the sacrifice of honour or from interest on the part of her Majesty's ministers. And I declare most solemnly, that it seems to me, that the concessions which have been made have been the result of a lively sense of the responsibility which as ministers and statesmen they have of the danger to the country from a continuance of this law (cheers). And I must state to those who have depended chiefly on fact and argument to persuade those who were opposed to them, that it is most gratifying to observe that the abandonment of this system has been conceded by the leaders on both sides under circumstances which place them entirely above the suspicion of any interested views (hear), for I do believe, that when the noble lord, the member for London, declared in this House, at the beginning of last Session, that he considered that the system of protection, as you call it, is the bane of that interest which was thought to be secured by it—when he proposed in the course of last summer, that the House should resolve that those duties were injurious to those who were said to be benefited by them—when he, moreover, addressed his letter to his constituents, telling them that he was ready to act upon such his conviction—I say, that when he did this, I believe he did so simply from an honest sense of what was due to the community; and that I doubt, whether in doing so, he consulted what were deemed by many the interests of his party (hear). With respect to the right hon. gentleman, there has been so much discussion on his conduct that it is impossible not to have formed an opinion upon his position in this matter; and I declare that I cannot see in what respect he has deserved the reproaches which he has received from his party (loud cries of "Oh, oh" from the protectionist members). As far as I have collected from what has been said in this House, the right hon. gentleman does not propose this measure himself without reluctance. He has made the proposition himself, being satisfied that it was right that it should be made, but only after having submitted to others the propriety of proposing it to this House. It is no fault of his, as far as I can discover, that he is minister at this moment, or that he is now the proposer of this measure. I think, therefore, sir, that on this ground, as well as on every other, the public have no ground of regret or complaint; that this Government should have been the one to submit such a measure to the country (hear, hear, hear). If I collect the opinion of the public rightly upon this subject, it is, that they are pleased that the right hon. baronet should have thrown aside those trammels with which every ministry has been surrounded on this question, and that he has at length cleared himself from an insolent domination to which our Governments have been too long subject (cheers), and has become the minister of the country. This party have formerly forbidden their minister to meddle with the subject of corn, and have always threatened a Government that, if they dared to deal with this privilege of their class, he should cease to hold power in their service. The right honourable gentlemen, actuated by a sense of what is his duty to the country, has braved this party, disregarded this dictation, and has come forward and proposed a measure for the interest of the community, and has thrown himself upon that community unreservedly for support (cheers). I believe that the public in general are delighted to see him relieved from the trammels of his former party (cries of "oh, oh" from the protectionist benches); and I further believe that the public will carry him through, not only in this, but in every other measure in which he will consult the public interest, and have the honesty and courage to present it to this house (cheers). Sir, I know that this measure is not a complete one. I am aware that in one respect it falls short of what the country wished. I have been asked by an honourable gentleman; the member for Newcastle-under-Lyne, whether I will venture to recommend the adoption of this measure? Why, sir, I did put on record, within a few hours after that measure was proposed, my congratulations to my constituents at their being likely to receive so large an instalment of that which they had been struggling for so long. If I had not taken that step, I certainly should have done so after the opening speech of the member for Bristol, who proposed the amendment now before the house, and who said that if this measure was passed, the system of protection would be abolished for ever. If I had not done it then, I certainly should have done it after witnessing the opposition which the right honourable gentleman has received from the other side of the house. I say, the vehemence of that opposition will be accepted by the country as an apology for many of the deficiencies and much of the incompleteness of the measure. The right honourable gentleman will be looked upon as a negotiator with that party who has long dominated and tyrannised over this country, having endeavoured to obtain the most that he was able for the country. The public will see from the conduct of the hon. members opposite, what difficulties the right hon. baronet has had to contend with, and what a fierce spirit has been opposed to him on account of the measures he has proposed (hear, hear). Gentlemen opposite are not aware, perhaps, of what service they are rendering to the right hon. baronet, and the popularity they are giving to the measure by their conduct in the course they are pursuing. For my part, I believe that the violence and passion that has been exhibited upon that side of the house in respect to that measure has of itself endeared it to the public—that every member who has deserted the Minister, and exhibits the sacrifice that he has been obliged to make in proposing this measure of national advantage, raises the right hon. gentleman to a pinnacle in public estimation which he could not have expected otherwise to attain. Sir, the hon. member for Newcastle-under-Lyne, asked me whether I would dare to show my face among my constituents after supporting this measure? I would ask the hon. member and any of those who support him, whether two years hence he will venture into any public meeting, and show his face after supporting an amendment which I must consider the most daring defiance of public opinion I have ever known (hear, hear)? It makes no distinction in the measures involved in the scheme, without denying the expediency of many of them; it says simply and peremptorily to the scheme, "We will have none of it." There are many parts of the right honourable baronet's scheme highly beneficial to agriculture (hear). Many people now without means of subsistence would have it if these measures were carried, but simply because they touch one single article from which hon. members opposite derive their income, they say, "We will have none of it" (cries of "no, no," from the Conservative benches). You say, "No, no," but are there not many of you who have said that there were parts of the scheme which were most desirable and which would much benefit agriculture, and which on that account you think would be beneficial? You know that there are immense numbers of the people who have no employment, and that this measure, if carried, might afford it to them (cries of "no, no"); but simply and solely you say, "because it touches that one article in which we deal, and from which we derive our income, we will have none of the measures" (cries of "no, no"). You say, "No, no," but I ask if there are not many of you who have said that some parts of the scheme are most desirable and expedient. I ask if noble lords have not at some of their protection meetings said that several of the schemes included in this measure will be most advantageous to agriculture (cries of "no, no")? Why I can point to two or three counties where protectionists have come forward and said so (cries of "name, name"). There is Lord Essex, in Hertford, who said that Indian corn would be a great boon to agriculture (Oh, oh). Why, he is one of your protectionists, and he would not let foreign wheat come in to feed the people, but he would allow foreign food to feed cattle. You will not even allow those who are graziers, and who want to feed their cattle, to have this food from abroad (hear, hear). You may shake your heads, but I say it is so. (a laugh). The hon. member for Newark, who has just been returned, a rank protectionist, shakes his head; what does he mean (a laugh)? Does he mean that he would not let in Indian corn, fearing lest it might supersede the use of some nobler grain? He would let it in! Then why vote for this amendment? The bill is opposed in toto. The Irish people might starve (no, no). Oh, you would open the ports; how long is it since you consented to do that (hear, hear)? Since you discovered that there was no corn to come in (loud cheers). There was nothing said in last autumn about opening the ports. Then it was said that there was no scarcity, that there was nothing but the basest cowardice on the part of the Government. "Afraid," you said, "afraid of the people starving, while there is our own grain for their support! Why, was there ever such a Government as this? Was there ever such a miserable turpitude?" I heard this expression the other night. This is what you stated then; but now you have discovered that grain is actually going out of this country from the warehouses to neighbouring states, and that there is such a scarcity on the Continent that there is no more grain to come in, and so now you state, and the honourable member for Somersetshire says, "God forbid that we should prevent anything coming in to save the people!" Anything may come in so long as it is sure that prices will not fall. When it is quite certain nobody will be benefited, then you are ready to open the ports (cries of No). Well, if that be so, I do not understand what you mean by saying "no, no," when I assert that you are trying to oppose all the measures comprehended in this scheme (hear). Sir, we have heard in the course of this debate, that it is for the purpose of discussing the great principle, the great system of protection; the system of policy that has long prevailed in this country, that this debate has been so long continued. Now, this is the eleventh day that we have been discussing the system of protection; and I want to know whether any one has the least idea what that system is (hear, hear). Has any one the slightest idea from anything that has fallen from the hon. gentlemen opposite what that system or principle is—whether there is any rule in it—any result from it; whether anything that ought to be dignified by the name of a system of policy resting on general principles and involving general good? Why, it is quite clear that no one has a single idea upon it as a system (a laugh). We have been asked on this side, whether this system of protection can be universally applied. Oh, certainly not. You say you cannot regulate the price of labour, whatever you may do with the price of food. It has been admitted that cannot be done. Can you define the cases where protection ought to be applied? We have not heard the case. "Is it," we ask, "opposed to the principle of competition?" Oh, God forbid! it is not opposed to competition, for Lord Stanley, our leader, defines protection to be "competition subject to regulation" (a laugh). But you cannot tell when or how it should be regulated. You say you do not mean to oppose all the advantages proposed in the measure; but you want to maintain the principle of protection. I thought that the honourable gentleman the member for Shrewsbury (Mr. D'Israeli) would have told us something about the principle; but instead of enlightening us himself, he only complained of others, and lamented that his friends around him had not told him what the principle was. Now, I ask the house candidly, whether this great system, which was said to be in question, has not dwindled down into a complaint of that fanciful obstruction to the supply of food, called the sliding scale, being in jeopardy (hear, hear)? Every member who has spoken upon this subject, when he has risen to vindicate the system of protection, has hardly been on his legs five minutes before he commences to discuss the horrors of Free Trade in food, and to depict the advantages of the sliding scale, which, it seems, is dignified by the term of Protection to agriculture. But there has not been the slightest discussion on the important question of protection to agriculture. Have we heard the slightest thing upon the subject—how the science of agriculture could be best promoted—how capital could be brought to the cultivation of the soil? Have we heard anything but the vaguest assertions as to what prices would be if there were a Free Trade in corn? Not one single syllable has been uttered to show that it will be of advantage to agriculture (cheers). "Not one single agricultural authority" has been quoted in the whole of this debate to show that the sliding scale, or what you term this system of protection to agriculture, is of the least advantage to agriculture. Not one single man engaged in agriculture—not an individual who would be an authority in any hundred or parish in this country have you quoted to back your statements upon this protection to agriculture (hear, hear, and cheers). Many have been quoted on the other side, who have said that agriculture depends on nothing of the kind, and that there is not the least necessity for an act of Parliament to secure high prices (hear, hear). Why there has been a gentleman, deeply interested in the business, who has sat for two nights in the gallery of this house, that I could quote. He is about the largest occupier of land in the country, and he was examined for three days before the agricultural committee of this house, when it sat last, having been called as a great authority amongst your agricultural gentlemen. Well, he has been within the last few nights in the gallery of this house, and he has been panting to be in the house that he might answer the silly things which he has heard from your side. He occupies 3,800 acres. He holds land in six counties. He is a receiver of rents in eight counties, and he states that he is for the total, and immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws as the best thing for the farmer (hear, hear). When we see such men as that in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws, it certainly is not wonderful that you are so averse to inquiry. You never would give any committee; you would not hear any one at the bar of this house on the subject, because you knew that these persons would come forward and give evidence directly in opposition to your views (cheers). You would not stand a committee. Those persons are ready to come, but you have none ready to call on your side (cries of "Oh, oh"). Oh, why you never name such persons in support of your case—you are surely on your trial before the country now, and you do not cite agriculturists in favour of your notions and views of protection. I venture to say now, what I said before, that if you go into a committee of inquiry, that I will call farmers from every county in England—that I will call land agents, and every man who is competent to give evidence from his capacity, and that they shall give evidence contrary to your views of the subject (hear, hear, and cries of "Oh, oh"). You say "Oh," why there is a club of land-agents in this city, and the majority of its members are of opinion that a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws will do no harm to the landed interest (cries of Name, name). That is their opinion, and the hon. gentlemen opposite should shew them to be wrong. One would have thought that the hon. member for Essex and the hon. member for Suffolk, who have both spoken—who plume themselves on being identified with the soil—who would be quite angry if they were not supposed to be so, would have given some answer. I listened with great interest to them, because I know how able they are upon this subject. The hon. member for Essex (Sir J. Tyrell), after cutting some very questionable jokes, in the first part of his speech, ended by reading a chapter from Dr. Arnold about men with one idea (a laugh). Then there is the hon. member for Suffolk. He was returned specially as the farmers' friend—as the man who knew more about the farmers than anybody else. I don't know whether anybody else did, but I confess I listened to what that hon. gentleman said (a laugh), and all I could collect was, that he was reading the Solicitor-General's speech at Cambridge. Those are two of the chief agricultural counties, and that is all we can collect from those two members (a laugh, and hear, hear). Those honourable gentlemen will go any length to turn out the Government, and to oppose the right honourable gentleman's measure, and yet we cannot obtain a single notion from them as to the way in which the sliding scale benefits agriculture. There is the member for Norfolk; I see him in his place there. There is a very intelligent man in the county of Norfolk who has written a pamphlet, and who says if the land lords will do (what they will not do), and if you will make the tenants do (what they are not able to do), that we shall have plenty of corn without free trade. That gentleman, I dare say, is a constituent of the hon. member for Norfolk; his name is Mr. Warnes. That gentleman has published a book, and the first thing he declares is, that the farmers of the present day must take for their text, for their rule of proceeding, that low price is quite compatible with good agriculture; that they must never look to high prices, but must produce a great quantity, and must depend for success on low prices and plentiful crops. That doctrine is, I think, directly opposed to that of the honourable member for Norfolk himself, who says, "Never mind the cultivation, never mind how you manage your farm, because we will get you an Act of Parliament, and we will secure you high prices, which is all you want." If that is the object he is seeking to serve at this moment (hear, hear), then I ask if the house has heard, on this occasion, any great results from this system which justify it? The hon. member for Norfolk tells us of none. Do you produce any farmers or labourers as authorities in favour of this protection? Why, we have scarcely heard a word said about the condition of the farmers during the discussion; but if you look at the speeches out of this house, you will collect from them that the farmer who has prospered during the last thirty years is so rare a bird, so strange an animal, that if you can catch him, you should stuff him and send him to the British Museum (a laugh). That really has been said at some of the agricultural meetings. It has actually been said that the farmer who has thriven under this system ought to be preserved in a Museum. Then, as to the labourers, have we had any evidence about them? We have been told that the Goatscote meeting was a thing got up by the Anti-Corn-Law League. That, however, is not the fact. The League had nothing whatever to do with that meeting. I know that that meeting was only one of a series of meetings which have been held for some years past by the labourers of Wiltshire, who have always declared the same thing, that they could not be worse off than they are, and that any change among them must be for the better (cheers). But look at the reports of every commission that has been appointed to inquire into the condition of the agricultural labourer, and you will see from 1824 down to 1843, the date of the last report, just exactly the same account of the agricultural labourers that their condition is as bad physically as it is possible to be, and that they live under all those circumstances so unfavorable to their morals and their happiness, the result of physical suffering; and that this is particularly the case in the most agricultural counties. I wonder that the honourable member for Suffolk did not allude to the agricultural labourers of his county, because they are specially mentioned in the report of the year 1824, and have been certainly referred to ever since. In Suffolk there are more of what are called gentlemen-farmers and of clergy than in any other county, and yet the people are described as being there as demoralised, and are subject to as much privation as in any other county in England (hear, hear). The honourable member for Shrewsbury asks if the people have not thriven under this system of protection? I say they decidedly have not; and I ask, why, if they have, we have had no account of that prosperity during the eleven days that this debate has been discussed; and why we have not been told how it could benefit the poor; and that no other definition of the system has been given than the one given by Lord Stanley in another place (hear, hear)? Lord Stanley was asked what he meant by this system, and he was obliged to avow that it was a system that raised the rent of land, that raised the price of food, but did not raise the wages of labour. Well, then, I believe that Lord Stanley is your leader, and that you are all proud to acknowledge him to be so. The principles therefore which he has avowed are those which you have been fighting for eleven days past, and in support of which you are going to a division; a system that raises the price of food, raises the rent of land, but does nothing to benefit the labourer—a system which accounts for a prosperous farmer being such a rare bird that he ought to be stuffed and put in a museum; and why the condition of the agricultural labourer is a by-word of demoralisation and distress? It is the condition that you would expect from Lord Stanley's definition of raising the rent of land and the price of food without also raising the wages of labour. That is the definition of your own system, given by your own leader. Now, we want to know what the effect of this system is. We are legislating for the public at large, and we want to know what the effect of this system is upon them. The right honourable baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department tells us that he has ascertained its effect. He has, in my opinion, most accurately stated it. The right hon. baronet said that he had evidence which had been forced upon him, to show that the purpose of the protective system was disastrous to the working classes and the community at large, if it succeeded, in consequence of high prices. The right hon. baronet states this as the necessary result of observation, and you have avoided dealing with that point altogether (hear). Yes; you have met it in one way; you have railed at the ministers for treachery; you have charged them with letting the cat out of the bag; we have had a great deal of talk about a system, but you have not answered this case, and you have left yourselves up to this moment exposed to the charge of promoting a system which produces the effects which the right honourable gentleman has told us, who has been in office during two periods—one, when food was dear through the operation of your law; and the other, when it was cheap, the result of the blessings of Providence. He says that he has found, in one case, that in consequence of high prices the poor were in distress; that they were miserable; that they were tempted into crime; that the rate of mortality among them had increased, and that these misfortunes had fallen upon them from the success of protection. But when, by the bounty of God, your system has failed; and when you come to this house to complain of its failures, and say, that when the price is low you cannot continue to cultivate the land, you thus, in effect, contend that high prices are necessary to your success. When you come and denounce the Minister, because you have not got a sufficient price for your food, he tells you that the price of labour is high, that crime is diminished, and that death, disease, and all the miseries that before befel them are less; and that therefore he has come to the conclusion that the success of your protective system is calculated to promote the misery of the people, and its failure ensured to them prosperity and happiness. To this moment there is not one of you who has given an answer on this point to the right hon. baronet: not one. When the right hon. baronet rose last summer, and stated all these results, there was not one of you who answered him. When he said that under a high price of provisions wages did not increase, but that much misery and destitution followed, you ought to have risen and said, that low prices of provisions do not promote the comforts of the people. You ought to have got up and said, what I have often heard in this house before, that high prices of provisions do improve wages. But you did not do that; because if you had you felt that nobody would have believed it. You submitted to his proposition then; you tacitly agreed with what he said; and who could believe that any man who intended to show his face in the country again would continue a system which he said was the source of such calamity whenever it succeeded success? I say, that when the right hon. gentleman made that speech last May, it was a subject of general remark that the Corn Laws were doomed. If he had said before that high prices of provision were good for the poor, and that none of these blessings had fallen to them from low price, then you would have a good right to charge him with inconsistency. I maintain that the right hon. gentleman did then overthrow the system of enhancing the price of food by law. He told you that misery and misfortune had been the result of it; but not one rose to contradict the statement which the right hon. gentleman had made; but, on the contrary, some gentlemen rose on the other side, and bore out his statement. Even in the agricultural districts it was seen that the effect of high prices of food was to produce misery and misfortune, but when the prices of food fell it brought the greatest advantage to the agricultural labourers. Well, now, I say that it is a very serious charge, which ought to be met before the close of this debate. I say that the charge involved in that statement ought to be met, otherwise the indication of your good fortune is that of the misery of others (loud cheers from the Opposition benches). You should not look to the prices current, but to the calendars and to the rate of mortality, and the misfortunes that befall man, in order to know whether you are well off under this law, or whether you should contend with the Minister for its maintenance (hear, hear). According to your system, a man should congratulate you if you were told that the people were miserable, and dying of disease, occasioned in the first instance by want of food and employment. I do not say that this is so, but if you do not answer the right hon. gentleman, you are open to the charge (hear). You have had now eleven days' debate without meeting that one fact. I say that the right hon. gentleman stated that to you; that the noble lord the member for London tells you, in his letter, that the intention of the law is to make food dear; and that the effect of that is what the Home Secretary has told you. You cannot escape from that purpose of the law; because there is no meaning in the law, if it is not to make food dear. It is very well for the honourable gentleman the member for North Devon to say, "God forbid that the price of corn should be high; he does not wish scarcity; that he knew it was a great misfortune"—and all that sort of thing. It is all very well to say so, but how is he going to vote, and how has he voted on previous occasions? I ask this because there has been talking about the Corn Law for twenty-five years, and there has been no other purpose ever in view but to maintain price? I refer him to the year 1822, from that time to the present, and to the fact that prices never have been low during that period, but that the country gentlemen have come here to complain; and, on the other hand, I say, they have never been high but that the people have come here to complain of distress. In 1822, the price of food was lower than ever it was before. The honourable gentleman, the member for North Devon, must remember all that took place then; that it was made a subject of positive grievance by the county members, that prices were so low. But these low prices were not the result of importation. We have heard to night that cheapness produced by importation and abundant harvests, are two very different things. I say that low prices are what you have always complained of. You never distinguish between low prices and the causes that produce low prices. I forget who it was—but I believe it was the hon. member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. B. Denison) who stated the difference between the cheapness produced by foreign importation and an abundant harvest. Ah, you will do well to look to the year 1822, 1835, and last year. I say there are three distinct periods when the prices have been low, not from importation, but from the care of God, of which you have come down here and complained (cheers). Why, it is of no use denying the fact; there are the records upstairs which will prove it. Lord Castlereagh came down and proposed a scheme for making food dear. He suggested a vote of money, in order to buy up all the "surplus food," as it was called. There was a vote of money proposed in the house to relieve the landed interest from the support of the poor. I say that in 1835, and 1836 there were low prices that proceeded from good harvests and nothing else, and yet the Marquis of Chandos came here and proposed a repeal of the malt tax, and that the house should go into committee upon the state of agriculture, and I believe there were committees appointed in both Houses of Parliament, to consider the unparalleled distress of the country gentlemen, although not from importation, but simply from an abundant harvest. I ask, what was the meaning of that two hours' speech which we heard last year from the honourable member for Somerset, flourishing the prices current in his hand, and complaining that the Government had not secured them a better price of beef, flour, bacon, veal, pork, &c. He did not complain of low prices occasioned by importation, because there was less imported during that year than for some time before; but he stated that there was distress owing to prices falling, and on account of a more abundant harvest than usual. I say, therefore, that what you complain of is low prices, and that the object of the Corn Law is high prices. I say, again, that after the statement of the right hon. gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, who says that he cannot resist the evidence that high prices produce distress, because wages are not increased in a corresponding ratio, you must say why you contend for the continuance of a system that is intended to raise price (hear, hear). But then it is contended that the Corn Laws are a protection to agriculture, and to domestic industry. What do you mean by "domestic industry"? It must mean something, I suppose, in which the working classes are concerned. But have you any evidence that the working classes agree with you in that view of the case—that the working classes are interested in the system that produces all that misery which the right hon. gentleman says takes place whenever this scheme succeeds? Have you any evidence, I say, of the working classes agreeing with you? Has any gentleman quoted the evidence of the working classes in support of the position that the Corn Laws are beneficial to domestic industry—that they are delighted with the idea that they shall benefit with the high price of food? I tell you there is not a single town in all England where the working men are not against you, and have not declared to the contrary of your doctrine. I believe the address published by the working men at Sheffield, agreed to in an open air meeting, and to their fellow workmen throughout the country, were assented to by them all (hear, hear, hear). They say, “These laws have deranged our monetary system, making numbers of our merchants and manufacturers bankrupts, checking the natural current of trade, and reducing thousands of families to misery and starvation; nor do they produce any real good to the great mass of our agricultural population, for those who till the earth, and make it lovely and fruitful by their labour, are only allowed the slave’s share of the many blessings they produce.” Again at Liverpool in 1843, some of the working classes undertook to inquire into the condition of their own class then residing in that town, and the result of the inquiry into the condition of 5,000 families in that town which was verified by some respectable merchants at the time, was the following:—“That the labouring classes are in a state of great distress. That their condition has been getting worse for the last four years. That we find that disease and crime bear a relation to the price of food. That high prices of provisions compel the people to live on coarser food, thus injuring their health and abridging their comforts. That manufacturers and dealers are fast sinking, from an inability in the bulk of the population to purchase from them those articles necessary to their existence. That we find that high wages and full employment are coincident with low prices of provisions, and that high prices of provisions are coincident with low wages and want of employment. 1052 families are supported by paupers, charity, or prostitution. 1017 families are supported by savings, credit, relations, and casual employment. Other families now on the parish: out of 5000 families, 3600 come from the agricultural districts, not being able to find employment in their own districts.” That is the way the Corn Law supports domestic industry. Why it is surely a mockery and an insult to tell the poor that you stop this measure to promote their industry in the town and in the country (hear, hear). There are some things that have been said certainly against the measure, and which, perhaps, I should not notice, but that the authority of the member for Sunderland, who has used them, may influence somebody. The honourable member for Sunderland is very much alarmed at this measure, and he has used all his authority to frighten the house and the country upon three grounds. In the first place he is afraid that the sum at which wheat can be brought into this country from abroad will be too low for agriculture here; he is afraid of the injury which may be done to our home trade, and he is afraid of the effect on the exchanges. The honourable gentleman has a singular position at present, and what falls from him is taken to be gospel by some. Now the hon. gentleman told us the other night that he had brought foreign corn into this country at 25s. a quarter. The hon. gentleman says in 1837 he was a party to a transaction himself, in which wheat, after paying the charges of freight and duty, was lodged here at 25s. It was impossible to doubt the truth of that which any gentleman says he did himself, and quite impossible to doubt anything which the member for Sunderland says; but when the honourable gentleman states a fact of that kind, he wants the country at large to draw a general conclusion from it. He wants people to suppose when food can be purchased and consumed at 25s. a quarter, and can be imported at that price from abroad, that the farmers of this country cannot compete with the foreign grower. That is the purpose for which the statement was used, or if not it was of no use at all (cries of No.). I think that the hon. gent. ought to have stated in the first place where it was that he imported his grain from, as during the last week his statement has been used in different papers, as if it was the general import price of foreign wheat. I believe that the hon. gent. opposite will admit that we must import a considerable quantity of grain from Poland and Russia, and that Dantzic must be one of the ports from which we must receive grain. We shall have to get a million, or two millions, or, as some people say, four millions; and we must depend on that port to a great extent. I happen to have here an authority which I defy any one to question, namely, the prices of grain at Dantzic during the whole of the year 1837, when the honourable gentleman imported his wheat at 25s. a quarter, and the price of freights from Dantzic to Liverpool or London (Mr. Hudson was here understood to say that the wheat which he had purchased came from Odessa). But as I understood the honourable gentleman’s statement, wheat could be bought for general consumption at 25s. the qr., and this fact is of little use if it has only reference to damaged wheat at Odessa, because I say that you must depend for a large portion of your wheat upon Dantzic. The hon. gent. says he brought grain here, good grain, capable of being consumed as human food, and brought into the market at 25s. I say that the finest quality, capable of being consumed there, never was sold at Dantzic during that year, under 29s. a quarter (cries of “Odessa”). But the hon. member is telling you the Free Trade price of wheat, and you all began triumphing on that account, because you believe that it will be inferred that wheat, which ought to be at 56s. here, as you say, will be 25s. Now the prices of wheat at Dantzic for the highest and lowest qualities, during the year 1837, were as follow: I find that in 1837 the prices in Dantzic were—

	Highest quality.		Lowest quality.
April.....	31s. 0d. per quarter.		23s. 5d. per quarter.
May.....	32 0 ” ” ” ”		24 0 ” ” ” ”
June.....	33 0 ” ” ” ”		25 0 ” ” ” ”
July.....	30 0 ” ” ” ”		20 0 ” ” ” ”
August.....	32 0 ” ” ” ”		20 0 ” ” ” ”
September 32 0 ” ” ” ”			24 0 ” ” ” ”
October.....	29 6 ” ” ” ”		23 5 ” ” ” ”
November 30 0 ” ” ” ”			25 5 ” ” ” ”
December 29 0 ” ” ” ”			25 0 ” ” ” ”

During the same period the prices of freights from Dantzic to London and Liverpool were never less than 4s. 9d., and sometimes were 6s., and the other charges 3s., and yet the honourable gentleman tells you that if the trade was open foreign grain would be imported here at 25s. a quarter; this he infers from what took place in the year 1837, after our ports had been closed for four years. There is another peculiarity in that year, namely, that a very large amount of Baltic wheat which was grown went from Dantzic to America—which makes him still more fortunate in having been able to land one cargo here from somewhere for 25s. (hear, hear, hear). But the hon. gentleman is one of that school which says there is no objection to an importation of foreign corn if it be not paid for in gold. Well, then, I will just tell the honourable gentleman what was the case when we were importing grain between the years 1840 and 1844. In 1839, there is no doubt that the bullion fell from upwards of nine millions to two in the course of six months, and owing to a large importation; but our importations for the three years were as large, but were regular; and the honourable gentleman will see that the bullion was regularly returned to this country, and the wheat was paid for by manufacturers. In 1840, the import of wheat was 2,600,000 quarters, but the bullion in the Bank had increased to three millions and a half from two millions. In 1841, the import of wheat was 2,300,000 quarters, but the bullion was in the Bank in that year 4,900,000l. And in 1842 we imported 4,206,000 quarters, and at that time the bullion in the Bank of England had increased to ten millions, our exports had also increased in a corresponding ratio, and these exports to the great grain countries took place when our exports to all other countries failed (cheers). But without reading all the particulars, I will just state what was the result of the exports before we began to import grain from the grain-growing countries down to the last year. In 1837, the export of manufactures was 12,800,000l.; in 1842, after we had had four years’ import of grain, the exports of our manufactures was 16,800,000l. This increase of trade with foreign countries took place when our exports to every country were falling off, showing that after the first year of demand for articles we had not before imported, there arose a regular trade (cries of hear, and loud cheers). Sir, the honourable member for Sunderland has referred to what has been alluded to by other members in this debate, the value of the home trade. It is a very common argument with agricultural gentlemen that the home trade is far better than the foreign trade, and that we ought to be careful how we deal with it. Sir, that is our case: it is because the home trade is so good that we ought to be careful not to injure it, and nothing injures it so much as high prices of corn (hear, hear). The hon. member is acquainted with the midland counties, and I therefore select the evidence of the Mayor of Leicester, a large manufacturer, given before the import duty committee of this house, for his information on this point. “In speaking of the consumption of Leicester, you say that the market has been falling off for two years. Are the committee to understand that has been from the increasing poverty of the industrious classes of the country?—I do imagine that to be the case. Have the artisans been obliged to give more labour and to do more work for the same wages in consequence of the pressure which has existed in Leicester?—Certainly, wages have been lower in consequence of it, and I never saw anything like the distress that there has been among the artisans employed in the town of Leicester. To what do you ascribe the decreased demand for their goods?—To the high prices of provisions, which have diminished the means of the labourer to purchase, because, if his food takes a large proportion of his wages, it leaves him less to lay out in clothing, furniture, and other articles. Have you any experience, with respect to the demand for your goods, when provisions have been low? Yes; it is the invariable rule in our trade that when provisions are low we have a good demand; it is a rule observed by the manufacturers, and established as a maxim in the trade. If the harvest is good, we may have a better home demand, but if we have a bad harvest, I do not know what will become of the population, for it will make corn high, and leave the workmen destitute of employment, and the distress will be very great. Ours is a home manufacture depending upon the home market; and upon the well-being of the working population generally the prosperity of the manufactures of Leicester entirely depends. Are you quite certain that the falling off in the demand for Leicester manufacture amongst the purely agricultural population has been as great as amongst the manufacturing population? The falling off has been as great. The hosiers who travel there tell me that the wages of agricultural labourers are so low, that it leaves them nothing to lay out in manufactures. They have first to obtain the necessities of life, and it leaves them nothing to lay out in stockings. Then although the price of food has increased, their wages have not increased in proportion? Certainly not in the agricultural districts; in the manufacturing districts wages are lower than they were two years ago when food was lower. Would you attach any importance to the protecting duties being removed which you are said to have yourself? The bulk of our manufacturers would be glad to see them removed. We passed a resolution to that effect at a large meeting held in the spring of the last year. We had a large town meeting, and resolutions were passed declaring their willingness to abandon all protective duties on manufactures, if all prohibitory and all protective duties on agricultural produce were also removed. Was that resolution the result of the opinion of the general aggregate of the manufacturers in Leicester and the neighbourhood? It was.” Facts of this kind have been elicited from nearly every manufacturer of articles of general consumption, and we urge them, in opposition to what has been stated against us (hear, hear). Now I ask your attention to what it is which has been said at the other side, in reply to these great economical considerations which have been brought before them by the Government, and to propositions which have been from time to time submitted for years past to the same effect, by honourable gentlemen at this side—I see hon. gentlemen are unwilling to listen to this matter, because it is conclusive against them. It has been stated, and stated truly by that right hon. gentleman that the population of this country is rapidly increasing—and the census shows that there is no chance of finding employment for them, except from commerce and manufacture (hear, hear). Now I ask the house to attend to the answer which the honourable member for Northamptonshire and the honourable member for Bristol make to that statement. The commissioners have declared that produce, equal to that of the county of Surrey, is annually required to feed the population of this country, and places as large as Birmingham and Manchester to find them room for shelter. The honourable member for Bristol says, that manufactures have been carried a great deal too far; that we ought rather to consider the propriety of restricting our manufacturing districts; and the hon. member for Northamptonshire, who is the leader of the body of protectionists, and who undertakes to speak for that party, and to tell them the views which they ought to take, and the opinions they ought to pronounce as opposed to this side of the house—he (the honourable member for Northamptonshire) says that we may talk as we please about the increase of our population, and about our want of food for that increased number, but that his policy is not to import more food from abroad, and that we ought to confine ourselves at home to a system under which we should produce three-quarters of corn, instead of five (hear, hear). Now let the country distinctly understand the political economy in fashion on the other side. They say the manufacturing districts are already increasing too much, and that their limits ought to be confined, whilst concurrently with that restriction they also say that we ought to produce less food at home instead of more, and that we ought to import less food from abroad notwithstanding the increase of population. That is the argument which is used by honourable gentlemen opposite, and deliberately stated in your organs, your Quarterly Review, Standard, and Herald. We see it stated that if the manufacturing districts were razed to the ground, if half the metropolis were razed to the ground, the country would be greater, happier, and more prosperous. And you go on consistently with these views, and say that we want no manufacturing towns, and that we require to produce less food, and to import less from abroad, for this rapidly increasing population. That is what you say are your economical principles (loud cheers). We say that we want to provide food for an increased population; and we find, by the census returns, that you give less employment to the population now than you did in 1831; and, in answer to that, you say that we ought to have fewer manufactures and less production of food (hear, and cheers). Now I ask if any save men not fit to be loose, would utter such statement, or if such men ought to be allowed to legislate for the country? And yet these are the persons who propose to form a Government; who say, “If you will only throw out this measure we will form a Government which will provide for the people;” who propose to diminish the manufacturing districts, and to produce less food in the country (hear, hear). That is your economical view (cheers). But how do you propose to carry it out? You depend upon your territorial influence, the county constituencies, and the House of Lords. You think that by your influence with the counties and some boroughs, and with the influence of the House of Lords, you will be able to throw out this measure of the Government and to uphold monopoly. This it is which has induced you to keep up the debate for eleven days, and it is with a hope of effecting that object that you will go to the division to-morrow night. You hope by these means, by your influence with dependent voters, and the support of the House of Lords, to throw out the Government measure. But let me ask, did you ever consider this question in all its bearings? The Corn Laws must be supported now by force or by opinion (ironical cheers from the Protectionists). Is there any other way? You have already tried by force to support it. You tried force when the law was introduced, and four years after it was carried you maintained it by force (hear). I say the people were cut down in this town for resisting that law, and at Manchester also, in 1819, four years after its enactment, they were cut down for resisting it (hear, hear). They were threatened in 1837. It was attempted, but you could not do it in 1839; yes, it was said that there was a way of putting down people if they ventured to express an opinion against this law. What you then had to resist the people was your rotten boroughs. After 1830 you could not put down the people by force. When the people were disappointed and discontented with the results of the Reform Bill, you were enabled to persuade them not to press for a repeal of the Corn Laws. That it was which gave rise to the Anti-Corn-Law League (cheers). Your protective societies were formed for the purpose of deluding and deceiving the people by every means which could lead them astray with respect to the subject of the Corn Laws. Everything which could distract the minds of the people on that subject was done by the protection societies. That gave rise to the Anti-Corn-Law League; that caused them to exert themselves as they had done; that it was which led them to do so much in circulating, not their own notions, but the deliberate opinions of the most enlightened men that ever the country produced, and induced them to make those extraordinary exertions which the country had witnessed to obtain the abolition of all restrictions on commerce, and in particular the total abolition of your Corn Laws (cheers) I have described the position in which the question is placed, and it is quite clear that you cannot at this moment support it by force or delusion or persuasion (cheers); so if you wish to support it, you must do it by other means (hear, hear). You are now quarrelling with a Minister who is conscientiously applying himself to the settlement of this question. If you do then desire to support it by other means, I ask you whether you have taken any security whatever against the recurrence of another period of scarcity (hear, hear)? If a season of scarcity should occur again, and that the people under the pressure of that scarcity should call upon you for universal suffrage, or if it should so happen that the people rise up in arms against this law, or your Government, what state would such a Government as you could form be placed in under such circumstances? I only ask you just to imagine such a Government as you have seen described—a Government with a noble duke at its head, and consisting of some honourable gentlemen whom I see opposite (great laughter),—what position would such a Government find itself in with a period of scarcity and tumult in the land, and the responsibility placed upon them of restoring and maintaining peace and order? Can we suppose a Government in a more horrible, I will not say despicable, situation (hear, and cheers)? What would you do? Would you not do exactly as you did in 1841? Would you not come to the right honourable baronet the member for Tamworth, and pray of him to take the reins of power and restore a state of peace and order (cheers)? The honourable member for Rutlandshire blamed the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government for not having stuck to his guns. What a comparison (a laugh). "Stick to his guns." What minister, let me ask, would have stuck to his guns under similar circumstances (hear, hear)? Would you stick to your guns if starvation was spreading throughout the country, and you were not able to put the people down by force, nor to persuade them that the starvation they suffered was not your fault, and was not the result of your legislation? Would you who blame the right hon. baronet stick to your guns under such circumstances (loud cheers)? Is it not clear that in your attempts to prevent the right hon. gentleman from abolishing this Corn Law, you are consulting your own interests solely? Is it not evident that the real protection which you require is protection for yourselves (cheers)? You have alluded to other countries; and I remember the honourable member for Dorsetshire, since the commencement of this session, said he was not afraid so much of agitation with respect to this question, or of high prices, but he was afraid of such men as Neckar, or Turgot getting into the Government (hear). There is some analogy, I admit, between the position of this country as regards this question and the state of France at a former period, when Turgot became Minister. The honourable member for Dorchester, who expressed his fear of a second Turgot in our Government, is, I am sure, acquainted with the character of that Minister and the views he entertained. He was a very sagacious man. I venture to say, notwithstanding the pretensions of the economists that there is no man possessing more comprehensive views than he possessed upon national policy. Turgot was called to power in 1775, and no man could have obtained office entertaining more enlightened views. He said that he undertook the government of the country without the slightest hope of being able to do good: he knew he should be calumniated, and that a confederacy would be formed against him because he represented to the King that a certain class ought not to live on the substance of the nation (cheers); but he accepted of office notwithstanding, because he wished to die with the character of desiring to do as much good as possible for his country. What was the first act he did when he obtained power? He repealed the Corn Laws (loud cheers). He said there were two things which should be taken care of by every country if it was desirous of escaping bankruptcy and revolution—and this he said, be it remembered, 15 years before the revolution took place in France. The two things which he said ought to be cared for were, that the revenue should be maintained, and that the occurrence of scarcity should be avoided, and he added, that above all things trade in corn should be kept free. Consistently with these views, the first act of Turgot in 1775 was to set free the internal corn trade of France, and to place on record his views with respect to the expediency of setting free the external corn trade. But what was his reason? It is really worth the while of hon. gentlemen opposite to observe it. He said there was a regular barrier when he came into power between each of the provinces, and that this was of such a nature as to form a regular interference with the trade in corn of every province, thus causing each province to depend upon the season for its supply of food, and to be of course exposed to the evils of scarcity, irrespective of the other provinces, in a season of scarcity (hear, hear). He then proceeded to put the financial department in a better and more secure position. And what was his fate? I mention it, because I think it may be the fate of the ministry that we have at present. If you look to Condorcet's "Life of Turgot," you will find that there was a combination formed against him of all those people in the country who lived on abuses, and who derived incomes from the public revenue, without giving any service to the public in return. The combination included foolish people about the state; young nobles; kept mistresses (laughter) and the farmers of the public revenue. That was the description of persons who combined against Turgot, and against every minister from 1775 to 1789, who foresaw the consequences of which Turgot complained, and wished to prevent them (cries of hear, hear). That was the minister whom the honourable member for Dorsetshire feared might be imitated by a minister of this country (hear, hear). Mr. Carlyle represents the privileged classes in France as saying, in 1787, "We cannot maintain our station, unless we have some exemptions and some privileges." Well, they would not listen to any minister who would not pander to them. In 1789 a scarcity of food took place; there was a bad harvest throughout France; and in 1789 it was recorded that considerable tumult and riot occurred which involved great change; a change which struck its roots deeply, but which was not the result of the particular cause which the hon. member for Shrewsbury suggested, but which was caused by the scarcity of food. Let honourable gentlemen carefully attend to that history, and take warning. I know nothing which could enable the Government to resist such scarcity and failure of revenue, and the effects which they produced on that occasion are worthy the attention of a just and prudent minister. When you consider the effects of scarcity, I will ask you whether the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government is not a real Conservative—whether he is not doing what is really promotive of true Conservatism—when he adopts the course which he recommends to you (cheers)? Remember, you have not taken a single measure of security against a year of scarcity (hear). You heard the right hon. baronet opposite say what he apprehended from it; that he dreads the very recollection of former periods of scarcity and insecurity and sedition, and that he is therefore desirous to prevent the recurrence of such periods, but you have offered no security against the recurrence of scarcity. You have taken no precaution, and recollect that, after all the discussions which have taken place on this question, the enlightenment of the people on this subject, it is impossible to deceive them again, and they will hereafter look for some responsibility from you (hear, hear). Recollect that the system you wish to maintain is to prevent the growth of food in other countries for the supply of the wants of our population. Consider the state of things at present. You are really not safe from this responsibility for two or three years to come. There is something like famine already existing in Ireland, and you are not sure that there may not be a bad harvest next year (hear, hear). What do you mean to do if there should be a bad harvest? If the people are distressed and without food, and call on you for supplies, what do you mean to do? You have undertaken to feed them, and they are not fed. What answer will you give in 1846, and 1847, and 1848, if distress should still continue? Surely there is sense in this. In a period of scarcity it would not be merely a question of Corn Law. The people are in a peculiar state of mind. Let us then prevent, by every means in our power, another period of scarcity—a period that the present ministers of the crown reflect upon and contemplate the recurrence of with horror and alarm (hear, hear, hear); let us remember that when men are made desperate by distress, and driven to madness by privation, that they accept any cause to account for their misfortune, and listen to any remedy suggested for their relief, and it is very much to the interest of the aristocracy that the people should not attribute it to them (hear, hear). Avert in time the public mind from reflecting upon the manner in which they have been governed by the aristocracy for the half-century past (hear, hear). My noble friend the member for London has referred to immortal services rendered by them to the country. I do not in the least deny what we have heard that they have rendered immortal service in some periods of our history. I am delighted to hear it. I do not dispute it, because I am not so well versed in ancient history as others are; but I think if there does come a period of distress, that the people, after all would be apt to review the period of which they have immediate cognisance, and I doubt if that is the period that my noble friend referred to; the period is within the last 40 or 50 years. I do honestly believe that they can come to no other conclusion than that during the last 50 years past have wielded the power of the legislature against the industry, energy, and intelligence of the people (hear, hear)—that they have been faithless to their trust in this place (hear)—that they have sought unhallowed gain, reckless of the means of obtaining it (hear, hear)—and that they have been ever blind to the destiny of this great nation (loud cheers). I therefore conjure them at this moment, and at the present opportunity, to become reconciled to their own true interests, and to sacrifice selfish prejudice to the cause of justice by a hearty concurrence in the measures proposed by the Government, and by the abolition in toto of this law; which, as long as a vestige of it remains, will only be an evidence of your shame (cheers). Lose the occasion and I venture to predict that you will surely follow the fate of every one who has ever sought, or for a while succeeded in trampling upon, or tyrannising over this race and nation, amongst whom it is your great fortune to be born, and over whom it ought to have been your pride to rule with justice and intelligence.—(The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst loud applause.)

On the question that the debate be adjourned, Colonel SIBTHORP called the attention of the house to the fact that the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General for Ireland, a Lord of the Admiralty, and the Clerk of the Ordnance—all officers with large salaries—had none of them seats in that house. He also wished to know who was now the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests—and who were to be the new Lords of the Treasury. Surely those appointments ought to be filled up.

Mr. SPOONER hoped that the debate would terminate to-morrow night, but would not consent to such a proposal, unless every member had an opportunity of delivering his opinion.

The debate was then adjourned.

We are happy to learn that the Earl of Glasgow has given in his adhesion to the ministerial proposals for abolishing the Corn Laws, and that he intends to take his place and support them in the House of Peers, when they come under the consideration of that branch of the legislature.—Glasgow Argus.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 28, 1846.

We regret the defeat of Lord Lincoln in South Nottinghamshire, for the sake of the young nobleman himself, whose spirit, candour, and ability have won for him a large share of public interest and sympathy. But apart from personal considerations, we see no reason to sorrow over the result of the several county elections which have occurred within the last fortnight. They prove that the protection really needed by farmers is the ballot, and that protectionists are not satisfied with possession of the soil unless they can also lord it over the conscience. No wonder that they protest against the registration movement of the League, and clamour against our efforts to create an independent body of freeholders. They do so on the same principle that the American planters resist the presence of free negroes in the vicinity of their estates, and that no object is more odious to a Russian boyar than an emancipated serf. The recent elections afford better arguments for the continuance of our exertions in the counties than all the eloquence and ingenuities of our leaders could have devised. The qualification for a county member has become, in sober earnest, that which George Seacole possessed for the office of constable; it is simply to be "the most senseless and unfit man for the purpose." The world revolted when Caligula raised his horse to the consulship; but our protectionist landlords have tried the experiment of investing far less respectable animals with the functions of legislation. We are to have "a country party," save the mark; and we are to take the noodles sent up to swell the bellowing herd "below the gangway" as specimens of its constituent elements. Be it so,—the sooner the experiment is tried the better it will be for the nation. Despotism, indulging in the vagaries of capricious absurdity must hasten its own fall. Already the farmers are soliciting the League to aid in rescuing them from thralldom. Another year may convert South Nottinghamshire into a constituency similar to the West Riding of Yorkshire. The dictation of the landlords has become so ostentatious and so insulting that it cannot be endured much longer. At the present crisis their conduct is as wanton, and as perverse as it is tyrannical. They know that they cannot delay the progress of the ministerial measure for one day, or impair its efficiency by the rejection of a single clause; their only object is to indulge their personal spite against Sir Robert Peel at all hazards. They feel that without him they are as sheep having lost their shepherd, and yet they exhibit themselves to the world a melancholy specimen of potent imbecility and domineering folly. We do not grieve at their rendering themselves thus ridiculous; we are not sorry to see them weeding the pocket-counties of every man who has a reputation for virtue or for talent; and we have no fear of the threatened experiment of trying how long this nation would endure to be governed by avowed selfishness, and sheer stupidity.

THE PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR SILVER.
The high estimate formed by the public during the ten years RIPPON and BURTON'S chemically purified material has been before it (made into every kind of ornamental article usually made in silver, possessing, as it does, the characteristic purity and durability of silver), has called into existence the deleterious compounds of "Albata Plate," "Berlin Silver," and other so-called substitutes; they are at best but bad imitations of the genuine articles manufactured, with the view of satisfying the purchaser, by Rippon and Burton, and sold only by them.

DAVISON & SYMINGTON'S PATENT PROCESS of Drying, Purifying, Seasoning, &c.—The prompt and successful introduction of this process into several of the largest breweries and manufacturing establishments in the kingdom, and the rapidly extending demand for its adoption, attest its superiority over every other hitherto in use. It accomplishes the drying, purifying, cleansing, and seasoning of all sorts of vegetable, animal, and mineral substances, and of casks, vats, and other vessels, with a certainty and speed altogether unattainable by means of steam or hot-water pipes, cokes, stoves, &c., and at the same time with much greater economy of fuel and entire freedom from danger. The purposes to which the invention is more particularly applicable are, the complete seasoning of wood for internal fittings of dwelling-houses, cabinet work, musical instruments (more especially such as are intended for hot climates), the drying of sugar, starch, leather, oil-cloth, and fabrics of all kinds, the disinfecting of hospital and prison clothing, the purifying of damaged grain, feathers, musty casks, &c., and the preparation of coffee (superceding entirely the present imperfect and injurious mode of roasting). Where, in short, a continuous, highly elevated, and perfectly constant temperature is required for purposes of desiccation or purification, this process will be found of unrivalled utility. Agent, W. BOWIE, 3, Lower East Smithfield.

THE TOILET.—No toilet can be considered complete without a careful attention to that department which so materially affects the entire contour—viz. the hair, which both in quantity and quality is susceptible of most material alteration. That which is weak can be strengthened, and be made to receive a most beautiful gloss, by artificial applications. It is its extraordinary and valuable properties in these respects that is due the character of

In addition to Carpets, they have at their West End Establishment, a large Stock of Chintzes, Damasks, Tabourets, &c., well worthy of attention. A splendid Carpet, of British manufacture, 20-3 by 18, with a centre and border, at less than cost price.

DEANE'S DOUBLY-REGISTERED STULOS
COFFEE-POT.—The strictly scientific construction of this article involves two simple processes, which, by their rapid and certain action, secure a run of rich, boiling, aromatic, and brilliant coffee within five minutes. The cylinder of the Stulus is first filled with boiling water, the latter drives out all the cold air from the body, into which the extract instantly follows. When the cylinder is filled the second time, and is raised to the top of the pot, the tall column of small diameter is, by a well-known law of pneumatics, instantly emptied into the pot below, and the coffee is at once ready for use.

All communications to be addressed to the Second British Building and Investment Company, 3, Ivy-lane, St. Paul's, London.

The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2800 Shares, and advanced about £2000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. At a Public Meeting, at which upwards of 1100 persons were present, held at the London Mechanics' Institution, on Tuesday, 17th Feb., 1846, Mr. W. Farmer, in the chair, the following Resolutions were carried unanimously: Moved by Mr. Best, seconded by Mr. Loveroy.—That this meeting highly approve of the plan on which the Second British Building and Investment Company is established; and cordially recommends it to the public as being based on equal justice to all, and providing for the members, desirous of purchasing property, the greatest advantages consistent with security to the whole body of members.

Moved by Mr. Alexander, seconded by Mr. Thomas.—That this meeting considers the conduct of the Directors, in waiving their right to receive or claim any advance from the Company during the first 12 months, as highly honorable, and deserving of the sincere thanks of the meeting. A Vote of Thanks was given for forming Building Societies to be a decided improvement.—Weekly Dispatch.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE—FRIDAY, FEB. 20.

The adjourned debate was resumed by Mr. C. BRUCE, who denied the assertion of Mr. B. Baring, that an end would be put to agitation if the house assented to the present proposition of her Majesty's Government. On the contrary, he believed if it were passed into law, discontent more dangerous, and agitation more difficult of repression, than that with which the house had to contend at present, would ensue. He was convinced that a more intense outcry would then be got up in favour of the extinction of tithes, against the Established Church, against the aristocracy, against the law of primogeniture, and against the necessary expenses of the monarchy. He could not agree with Lord Sandon or Mr. Baillie, that it was necessary to support this measure of the Ministers, because the country could not be governed without them. Like the king in the ballad of Chevy Chase, who, though he regretted the death of Earl Percy, thanked God that "he had within his realm 500 good as he," he would express his belief that, much as the retirement of Sir R. Peel and his colleagues might be deplored, it would not be difficult to find in England other ministers to form a cabinet quite as good as they. Declining to enter on this occasion into the policy of the Corn Laws, he proceeded to comment upon the celebrated letter of Lord John Russell, which he denounced as quite as remarkable for the boldness as for the extravagance of its assertions. He denied that the Corn Laws were the blight either of commerce or of agriculture, and insisted that without protection the country would never have reached its present height of greatness and prosperity. He wanted to know how Sir James Graham reconciled to his present course his most eloquent speech in favour of protection in 1839—a speech which he had cheered at the time till he was perfectly hoarse. He should also like to know what arguments the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to urge in favour of a measure which touched his department very nearly, and which at the same time was opposed to every principle on which he had hitherto acted. He had likewise some curiosity to hear what other officers of the Government had to say in defence of their sudden abandonment of all the opinions of their past lives. Passing them over without further remark, he proceeded to grapple with what he called the magnificent speech of Sir R. Peel on Monday night. It was his deliberate conviction that Sir R. Peel had in that speech made out one part of his case, but had signally failed in making out the other. He had proved that great advantage would be derived from the repeal of the duties on manufactured articles, but he had failed in proving that corn came under the same category with manufactured articles. He had not given his Corn Law a fair trial. A factious party, seeking its own interest in the reduction of wages, demanded the repeal of it; and, taking advantage of the failure of the potato crop in Ireland, he had yielded to the demand, in the face of a verdict given in favour of protection at the last general election by the constituencies of England. He (Mr. C. Bruce) could not sacrifice his past and present opinions on the subject of the Corn Laws for the reasons which Sir R. Peel had alleged; and therefore he must decline embarking with his right hon. friend on that boundless ocean of Free Trade, upon which the British navigator had not yet ventured, and from which no British pilot had yet returned.

Mr. P. SCROPE would not rest the defence of the Government measure on the favourable experience of the last three years, because, if the experience of the next three years should be unfavourable, it might be urged as a reason for reconsidering it. The arguments for the repeal of the Corn Laws were as strong in 1841—aye, and even 30 years ago—as they were at present. The Corn Laws either raised the price of corn or they did not. If they did not raise the price, then they were no benefit to agriculture or to any other interest, and were a gratuitous interference with industry, and therefore an unmitigated wrong. If they did raise the price, how did hon. gentlemen justify their result? Why, they said, we are a highly taxed country, and must have high prices to pay our taxation. Then came the consideration, "From whom did these high prices come?" They came from the consumers of corn, and what justification was there for that? You gave the consumers no compensation for the high taxes which they had to pay for themselves personally; and what right then had you to force high prices on them in order to make them pay the high taxes, which properly ought to fall upon yourself? He considered this to be a sufficient proof that the Corn Laws, if they did raise prices, were even a more unmitigated wrong than they were if they did not. Having stated that he had heard no satisfactory reasons from the other side in behalf of the policy of protection, he proceeded to comment on the speech of Mr. S. O'Brien, and more especially on that argument, in which he insisted on the hardship inflicted on native industry by our consumption of articles produced in foreign countries. Firing a passing shot at Mr. Ferrand for his efforts to prevent the importation of foreign corn and the exportation of British machinery, he concluded by calling on the house to abolish the Corn Laws, which were at once odious in character and suspicious in motive.

Mr. NEWDEGATE contended that Mr. Stafford O'Brien had not violated in his own person the principle of protection, for so long as he paid the protective duty he had a right to use any foreign article. He complained that all the advocates of Free Trade had assumed that the defenders of the Corn Laws were the advocates of prohibition, and not of protection. Mr. P. Scrope, in stating that the Corn Laws were an unmitigated wrong, whether they did or did not raise prices, seemed to think that he had disposed of the whole question; but he had utterly forgotten that they were not enacted either to raise or depress prices, but to secure at all times steady prices. There were many taxes which the landowner paid and the manufacturer did not pay, and for those taxes the landowner obtained some compensation in the protection given to native corn. The manufacturers were not the majority of the country, and the laws, which were for the benefit of the majority, he had a right to assume were for the benefit of the community at large. To buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market was a good maxim for trade, but not a good one for Government, inasmuch as Government had other objects to which it ought to look to besides the accumulation of capital. Turning to the measure immediately before the house, he observed that it had not come upon him by surprise. In the year 1844 he had foreseen, foretold, and lamented over its approach. When he saw Sir Robert Peel rendering this country dependent on foreign countries for its monetary exchanges, he expected that he would soon render it dependent on them for its supply of food also. The Corn Laws were the key-stone of protection; and if that key-stone were removed, the whole edifice of protective duties would fall with it to the ground. Universal distress would then ensue among all classes of society, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing; and if the country escaped a convulsion in consequence, it would only be by re-enacting these once applauded but now repudiated Corn Laws. After a disquisition upon the injurious connection of the present question with the currency of the country, he proceeded to grapple with the doctrine that agriculture was not exposed to any peculiar burdens. Mr. Ward had denied the existence of these burdens altogether. Lord John Russell had admitted their existence; but had contended that the landed interest had no right to any compensation for them, inasmuch as it had refused to go into Mr. Ward's committee to inquire into their extent. Mr. Newdegate then read a paper, by which he endeavoured to prove, that in the shape of tithe, malt-tax, property-tax, poor-rates, land-tax, highway rates, and some other charges, the agricultural interest was exposed to burdens amounting to 12,000,000*l.* annually. He believed that compensation for these burdens was impossible, and that if it were possible, it would not be advantageous. He censured the somewhat haughty and dictatorial tone which Sir Robert Peel had of late assumed towards the independent members of that house. His conduct in overbearing the opinions of his colleagues, and in appealing to their fears instead of to their dispassionate judgment, endangered the liberty and freedom of the subject; and until he submitted his change of opinion to the approval or disapproval of the public by a constitutional appeal to the people, he (Mr. Newdegate) should consider him, not the Minister of the Sovereign or the people's choice, but the Minister of their necessity. What right had he or Mr. S. Herbert to say to the country gentlemen, "If you don't yield now to reason, you will have to yield hereafter to force?" Surely such language ill became a Minister of the Crown, and was highly derogatory to the dignity of a deliberative assembly. In conclusion, he exhorted the independent party in the house to persevere in the career on which it had entered, as before long the country would appreciate and co-operate with its exertions.

Mr. BARCLAY observed, that on former occasions he had voted against the annual motion of Mr. Villiers, for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and that he should have given a similar vote this year had a similar proposition been made. The aspect of things was, however, changed in his eyes, when he saw Sir Robert Peel proposing, not a lopsided plan, like that of Mr. Villiers, for the mere repeal of the duties on corn, but a broad and comprehensive plan for the reduction of all protective duties whatsoever. He then proceeded to explain at considerable length, but in a tone of voice which rendered him very indistinctly heard, the reasons which induced him to give his support to the commercial policy now proposed by Sir R. Peel.

Mr. BENETT (of Suffolk) felt himself compelled to withdraw the confidence which he had once reposed in Sir R. Peel, partly by his recent desertion of all the principles of protection which he had formerly advocated, but principally by the grievous injuries which he had inflicted on the Protestant Church in Ireland. He should give his decided opposition to the Government measure, which took away all protection from agriculture and native industry, and he expected that the Solicitor-General would join him in that opposition, as he had expressed himself strongly at his late election at Cambridge against "the folly" of those who thought Free Trade advisable.

Mr. MUNTZ had done all he could to prevent Sir R. Peel from occupying the high position in which he then stood; but he was now very glad that Sir R. Peel had obtained it. He was very glad, too, that he had brought forward this measure; and he should certainly support it; for it would tear away a veil concealing all the miseries of the country, which were at present attributed, and very unfairly, to the Corn Laws. He had always said to Sir R. Peel, "You must reduce every thing to the Continental level, or else you must raise up every thing to another level." Sir R. Peel had taken the first course; he (Mr. Muntz) believed it to be a wrong course; but, as Sir R. Peel had taken it, he would do every thing in his power to support him in it; for anything was better than a system which led to nothing but uncertainty. He went the length of saying that the house ought to protect all native industry against the untaxed industry of foreign countries; but the protection of the house had not been extended to every branch of native industry, and that was the reason why he had always voted against it. He did not believe that the repeal of the Corn Law would produce all the advantages which had been stated in and out of the house, but he did believe that it must produce a reduction in the price of food—and it would then be the duty of the house to take care that that reduction did not produce a reduction in the rate of wages. Hitherto Sir R. Peel had been deemed infallible, but now that he had confessed that he had been in the wrong for 30 or 40 years on the subject of the Corn Law, people were beginning to suspect that he might be wrong on other questions also: he (Mr. Muntz) should not be surprised if Sir Robert should come down early in the next session and confess that he was convinced, by the experience which he had collected in the interval, that he had been wrong, too, on the subject of our currency and monetary system.

Mr. DISRAELI.—Sir, I leave the right hon. baronet, the first minister, to settle the question of the currency, with his new supporter, the hon. member who has just sat down, and to whom we are indebted for a protection speech almost as able as that delivered to us by the noble lord the member for Liverpool (hear and laughter). The honourable gentleman who has just addressed us seems to think that, after this declaration of the Government, all is doubtful. Sir, there is one point on which no doubt can any longer rest. Whatever may be the opinions that now have entered into this great controversy on the main question before us, however fervent may be our convictions of the advantage of protection, however sanguine may be the expectations of hon. gentlemen opposite of the benefits of competition, there is one point on which we are all agreed—there is one point on which there can be no misunderstanding, and it is this, that her Majesty's Ministers have changed their opinions (hear). Whether the opinions they formerly pursued, or those opinions which they are about to follow, are the right ones, are the most expedient, and the most calculated to benefit this country, that, I apprehend, is the real question before the house (hear, hear). Sir, that is the question which, with the indulgence of the house, I shall endeavour to consider, and on which I shall endeavour to offer some suggestions, which I hope may make honourable gentlemen hesitate before they accede to the great change which is proposed. I shall endeavour to show that this system which is called the system of protection is not that odious system which it has too long been assumed to be. I have pledged myself to meet the question on its merits, and though I may not be capable of the argument, I shall not shrink from it (hear and cheers). But before I presume to offer these considerations to the house in support of that system, it will be more convenient to notice the arguments that have been offered by her Majesty's Government in favour of the change that is proposed. I shall thus clear the course which I have to illustrate. It will lead me to the end which I aspire to reach, and facilitate the discussion very much. We have been addressed in support of the measures of the Government by three cabinet ministers. It is but due to the right hon. gentleman, the first minister—to the position which he occupies—to the more comprehensive statement that he made of the case of the Government, that I should perhaps, in the first instance, notice what he said. The right hon. gentleman assumed that a great part of this discussion has been wasted in arguments as to the conduct of parties. I have no wish myself to enter into that subject: nor should I have noticed it at all, had not the right honourable gentleman, by the use which he made then, as well as on a previous and subsequent occasion, of the word "party," seemed to entertain a very different feeling with regard to it from that which influences honourable members on this bench (hear, hear). Sir, we have indeed heard from these benches a great deal on the conduct of party, but we associate with that word very different ideas from those which the right honourable gentleman seems to entertain. We do not understand that party is anything but public opinion embodied (loud cries of "hear, hear"). We protest against the doctrine of the right hon. gentleman, that there is a distinction between political party and public opinion. We maintain that party is public opinion embodied, whether it represent the opinions of the majority or of the minority of the public. In either case it represents the opinions of a great section of the community. In this country, where the nation is divided into parties—where great results are brought about by public discussion—by the organisation also, no doubt, of material interests—by these two agencies of reason and of property, we arrive at the solution of controversies almost times the most fatal. Such are the beneficial consequences of those agencies, that, however fierce the controversial strife—however violent the agitation of the nation—still you will find always that when a question is settled by the agency of the legitimate exercise of what the right hon. gentleman calls "party," but which is in fact national organisation, the nation is content and satisfied with the appeal, and you seldom see a question so settled re-opened (hear). Now we do not complain of the right hon. gentleman having changed his opinions. Opinion is not always in the power of the human will; but we do complain, not that he has deferred too much to public opinion, but that he has outraged public opinion (loud cries of "hear")—that he has prevented that legitimate action of the public voice—that he has resisted the settlement of questions, by the aid of party, and the feelings of the community which are embodied in it. And if he achieves, as most probably he will achieve, the result which he has in view, the community will consequently be not satisfied, and they will say, and say with reason, "We represent a great mass of public opinion—by our aid the right hon. gentleman has been raised to power—by our aid the present Parliament has been elected to represent our section of the public, and yet our feelings have been disregarded. If the noble lord (Lord John Russell) who represents another section of public opinion had succeeded in being the minister—if his friends had succeeded in being the majority in this house, and if the noble lord, by their aid, had settled this question, we should have yielded to that decision, because we would have felt that the solution of the controversy had been carried out in a legitimate manner; but we complain that, under the course pursued, this question is not settled, and cannot be settled, in a constitutional manner. We have merely the sad spectacle of the right honourable gentleman surrounded by a majority who, while they give their votes, protest in their speeches against his policy (cries of "no, no," and "hear, hear, hear"). I had no idea there was any doubt on this point. The illustrious catalogue of converts that we have seen have been converts to the policy and not to the principles of the right honourable gentleman. But I say it is not merely of that alone that we complain, but it is also of the flagrant scandal of the minister, carrying, under these circumstances, a great question, when he has himself announced that there has been a majority of his cabinet against him upon it (hear). Well, then, the public opinion which we represent has not been fairly dealt with, and when we complain of the right honourable gentleman not treating his party fairly, we are not speaking of the three hundred gentlemen who may be sitting on these benches, but of the majority forming a great portion of the community at large, whose views they represent, and of that public opinion which is the result of their convictions (hear, hear). This is probably the only observation that I shall make on this subject, and I have offered it clearly in the legitimate spirit of the debate (hear, hear). The right honourable gentleman proceeded to indicate that which he considered to be the proper subject for discussion in this matter; and I conceived that the right honourable gentleman in his description of what should be the proper subject of discussion at once described and indicated the fallacy of his own position, and the fatal character of the policy which he is pursuing. He says, "I call upon you not to discuss a party question, but to meet an emergency, and to do what you can to construct a commercial system" (hear). Now, sir, can anything be more different—if there can be a contrast more complete than any other between two things, it must be that between a system which must be permanent, and an emergency which however managed must be to a certain degree precipitate. There, I think, is at once the fault of the position of the right honourable baronet. At the very first step he counsels us to a course which, if we consider his policy under other circumstances, if we regard it, for example, as the policy of the minister of a foreign country, and be thus able to regard it without any of the clamour or spirit that now animates us, we must at once pronounce a great mistake. If, for instance, this course were recommended by the noble lord opposite, we should call it a great mistake. We should consider it unwise in him to say, "I have measures to meet an emergency, but I call upon you to come forward and to reconstruct your commercial system, in deference to a system which you have always previously opposed." But what are we to say to a minister who asks us not only to do that, but who says you must do it, in total opposition to all that I have told you was right and proper heretofore (hear, hear)? Now, sir, as regards the emergency—namely, the state of Ireland—I must protest against the necessity of any one warning us in this house not to treat the subject lightly. It is a subject on which I have never spoken in a tone of levity, though I may have occasionally so treated the policy that has been adopted towards that country. But as regards the question which we have to discuss—namely, the adoption of a new system, a system which the right honourable gentleman himself described, only a few months ago, as a great social revolution (hear, hear),—as regards this question, there are one or two points which it may be as well if some member of the cabinet would enlighten us upon, though I believe there are no more Free Trade members of the cabinet to speak on this question (hear, hear, and laughter). But perhaps we may be favoured with the opinion of a protection member of the cabinet on these remarkable circumstances of the present anomalous state of affairs, namely, that we shall have at the same time a protectionist cabinet, and a Free Trade ministry (hear, hear, and cheers). Now, sir, with regard to the point to which I was calling the attention of the House, the right honourable gentleman feels strongly the difficulty under which he necessarily labours, in being himself the minister to propose these changes in our commercial system. The right honourable gentleman told us that he would have wished those changes should be proposed by others, but he at the same time informed us that he had proposed them in the cabinet long before he had meditated a rupture in that cabinet on these items. The question, then, arises, how does he reconcile these two statements, namely, his having proposed these measures to the cabinet, with the fact, which he has recently so often assured us of, that he would have wished that others should have brought these measures before Parliament (hear)? Now, sir, I would notice the commercial principle, if you can call it a principle, upon which the right honourable gentleman seems to have founded the measures which he proposes to us. We are, as regards the emergency, ready to do that which any minister entitled to the confidence of Parliament would recommend. We are prepared to do for Ireland—I will not say all that Ireland can require—but all that human judgment can devise (hear, hear, and laughter). But we do not understand the position of the right honourable gentleman with respect to this subject. That position has been involved in great obscurity. The right honourable gentleman says—"I was for opening the ports," and then, following up the cheer which he sometimes met with in alluding to this fact, he proceeded to take a rapid view of the economical system of the country in past times; he proved that the ports had been often before opened, and beneficially opened; but, as if alarmed at the cheer which this statement called forth from these benches, he turns round and says, "Yes, it is very well for you to agree with me in this; it is very good to cheer me when I allude to the opening of the ports; but I must tell you that I was not prepared to shut them again" (hear, hear). The providing for the emergency, therefore, was not the difficulty of the right hon. gentleman—the difficulty was at the bottom of the right hon. gentleman's policy (hear, hear). He was resolved that the present system of Corn Laws and other laws should cease (hear, hear). Now, compare these facts with the declaration that has been made by a member of the cabinet, not exactly on the hustings, but before a large body of the constituents, in a county town; what is the declaration of the Chief Secretary on a late occasion? He tells you, "We would have wished that these communications should have been made to another Parliament;" that is to say, the present Parliament might have gone on; there might have been a renewal of the seven years' lease of the Conservative majority, and probably, when the election would just have taken place, we would receive that announcement which, under peculiar circumstances, has perhaps been made too soon (hear, hear). Now, I am bringing no charge against her Majesty's Government. I am merely throwing out hints to the protection members of the cabinet who probably may rise in the course of this debate. I have mentioned the points on which I wish to have information; I came to no foregone conclusion. It is probable that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not authorised to state that the change was not wished to be made until the new Parliament would meet. But there is also the fact that the right honourable gentleman more than once deplored that the task should have been imposed upon him, and should not have fallen to others, of introducing these measures. Still it would appear that before the matter was conceived by any human being, the right honourable gentleman had actually proposed its adoption in council, and insisted on his colleagues approving of it. These are, I think, two points which require elucidation; and having alluded to them, I shall now proceed to the consideration of the commercial system that is proposed for our adoption. I am afraid that I may weary the house, but I assure honourable gentlemen that I will redeem my pledge if they will permit me (hear, hear). The right honourable gentleman, on first bringing these measures to the notice of the house, assumed that he had founded them on the observations of the last three years; but in his last speech, he seemed to find fault with the manner in which that former expression had been taken up by different members. As long as he denies the construction put upon his words, that denial is quite enough for me, and I will not, therefore, dwell upon this point. The right honourable gentleman says, "I do not exactly say that it was the observation of the last three years that absolutely induced me to adopt the measures which I now recommend, but I have been taking a general view of the commercial relations of the country for a long time, and of the effects of considerable relaxation of protective duties, and I have seen, especially under the influence of my tariff during the last three years, that there has been a great and simultaneous increase of exports and imports with these relaxations." That I believe is a fair statement of the argument of the right honourable baronet. If the right honourable gentleman were merely proposing an annual budget, I do not think there would be any great objection to his measures, but when a great change is proposed to us, and when that change is recommended on the data afforded by the amount of imports and exports in a recent period, it becomes the house to be very cautious in the policy which it adopted, and to analyse very closely the operation of those commercial results (hear, hear). Now there is one case, with which some hon. gentlemen opposite are very familiar, connected with this matter of exports and imports. I am throwing aside the allegations about magnificent railway works, and a superabundant employment, which the right hon. gentleman omitted altogether on the first occasion, but on which he afterwards dwelt so warmly (hear, hear). I believe that the data on which the right hon. gentleman rested the basis of his plans would be found fallacious in all cases. I believe, whatever our opinions may be, that is universally acknowledged; but I throw all these circumstances aside, and I put my finger on the important agency through which the right hon. gentleman brought forward his case. There is nothing, it must be admitted, which affects imports so much as the state of the seasons. Now, I shall show how this applies to what must be regarded as a commercial transaction, in respect both to exports and imports, and how beautifully it illustrates the fallacy of his arguments. If you look to the past year, you will find that there has been great increase both of exports and imports in the article of sugar. It is impossible to suppose that the operation of the tariff, introduced last year by the right hon. gentleman, could have influenced to any extent the cargoes of sugar which were received, especially from the more distant parts, such as the Mauritius and the East Indies. But there happened to have been an abundant crop, both in the Mauritius and in the East Indies; and owing to that circumstance, our imports of sugar from those parts of the world were much greater than usual, and will no doubt figure in the table to be brought forward by the right hon. gentleman on some future day in support of his commercial policy. Now it is a most curious circumstance, that while there was an abundant crop of sugar in the Mauritius and in the East Indies, there happened to have been a total deficiency in the crop of the Havannah, from which the whole of Russia is supplied. Accordingly an imperial decree was immediately issued in Russia, declaring that sugar might be imported from England. From this, you perceive that the influence of the seasons in these distant countries has tended immensely to increase the export of sugar from England. The bad season in the Havannah caused an increase in the export of sugar from England to Russia, and surely no one will pretend that that result is a consequence of the tariff. It is, I maintain, to be attributed to the influence of the seasons; and the same influence may probably be traced in all the exports and imports of the great raw commodities that enter into our colonial and other commercial transactions. I was bound to enter into that question, and I have done so. I wish to show the influence of the seasons on the imports and exports of which the right honourable gentleman boasts. I would ask him, suppose there were a deficiency of half a million of bales in the cotton market of the United States, would his paltry reduction of duty on cotton wool increase the imports into this country (hear, hear)? Again, if we look to the wool trade we find the same argument to apply; in fact, whether it be cotton, or sugar, or wool, in any case, it is an undoubted fact, that the seasons have a great effect on the amount both of imports and exports (hear). Now, sir, at the risk of wearying the House, I must venture to notice another statement of the right hon. gentleman—one of his high-flown statements which he makes with his figures always ready (a laugh). The right hon. gentleman has made a battle-horse of the unfortunate silk trade. I should really have thought that the memory of the hand-loom weavers alone would have prevented the minister of Free Trade from putting forward the case of the silk trade. The honourable gentleman, the member for Warwickshire, has referred to the subject already, and I will not go into those species of waste silk, the names of which I cannot call to mind. Honourable gentlemen opposite are perfectly familiar with them. I will give you the advantage of all that refuse as compared with real silk, which costs 14s. per pound, which may be purchased at rates varying from 2d. to 10d. But I beg the right hon. gentleman to contrast the importation of raw silk in the year 1844 with that of the last year of the protected trade. In the last year of the protected trade, if my memory serves me right, we imported 4,010,064 lbs. of raw silk. That is exactly twenty-two years ago; and in the year 1844, after twenty years of the blessings of this relaxed protection, we imported 4,020,063 lbs. But it appeared from the hon. gentleman—he may have been misreported, yet I had the satisfaction of hearing it—that the contrast he drew was between three millions under protection, and six millions under the relaxed system. But supposing that the increase had been such as the right hon. gentleman had stated—suppose it had arisen from three millions to six millions of pounds per annum, I cannot believe for a moment that you are to trace all the progress of a country like this, with the untiring energies of the English nation to the principles which regulate your commercial code. I know that if the country is prosperous, we on this side of the house are, of course, ready, as the advocates of protection, to attribute it to the system of protection, and gentlemen opposite attribute it to the application of a liberal commercial policy. But I believe that, whether you have one system or the other, the country will flourish (cheers from the protectionists). The country will thrive, though there may be much class suffering, and much individual misery which are the two things we wish to prevent (hear, hear). The most surprising thing connected with the silk trade is, that it has not thrived. It is the exception that proves the rule (oh, oh, from the Opposition). If hon. gentlemen doubt the statement, they will have ample opportunity of contradicting me.

I speak from authority, but I am open to contradiction. I have made these assertions because I thought they were deserving the attention of the house. But I may be permitted to refer to the principles which the right hon. gentleman put forward in his last speech. The right hon. gentleman says we have for 30 years terminated prohibition, we have relaxed protection, and the country has been more flourishing than ever. I believe that is the case; but I say the country is flourishing, because you have given it a judicious and a moderate amount of protection. But the right hon. gentleman having proved, not in his last speech, but in other speeches, and especially in some of his last expositions of the blessings of a Free Trade Government, that by a just, judicious, and moderate protection, England has flourished, very calmly turns round to us, and says, "I am bound to acknowledge I have changed my opinion on the subject of protection. I am no longer in favour of protection." But his whole speech, after all, only proves the advantage of it (hear, hear). It proved the advantage of the principle of moderate protection (no, no, from the Free Traders, and counter-cheers). I am sorry, sir, to excite that groan from Free Traders in distress (a laugh). But I want to ask the right hon. gentleman a calm, and, I think, a perfectly Parliamentary and proper question. Does the right hon. gentleman believe he can fight hostile tariffs with free imports? That is the question I wish to ask him (Protectionist cheers, and hear, hear). "Hear, hear!" from the disciples of the school of Manchester! A most consistent cheer. They have always maintained that cause. If their principles are right as they believe, and as I believe not, I can easily understand their conclusions are right. At any rate, they are consistent. They believe they could fight hostile tariffs with free imports, and they say, very justly, "Let us take care of our imports, and the rest will take care of themselves." But is that the opinion of the right honourable gentleman? If that is the conviction of the right honourable gentleman, why all these elegies over defunct diplomatic negotiations with reference to commercial tariffs? Why does the right honourable gentleman speak with so much pity, and also with so much pique, upon the question of diplomatic intercourse on the subject of relaxations in commerce? If he believes he can fight hostile tariffs with free imports—I say, if he really believes that, he need not trouble himself about commercial treaties (cheers); but if the right honourable gentleman does not believe it—if he has only the convictions of the school of Manchester, then he is not justified in this measure (cheers). But I believe he has a conviction, though he has never enunciated it. He tells you one of his reasons for proposing the measure is that he hopes great things from a good example. If he believed that great principle, a good example is of no effect whatever (cheers). We must have a protection minister speak upon this subject. We must have a clear declaration from the cabinet upon that important point, for it is a principle upon which all hinges (hear, hear). Now, sir, I conclude from the language of the right honourable gentleman, that he is not satisfied. How otherwise am I to explain his language? He tells you Russia already shakes. He reads to us the report of an American minister in favour of what is really Free Trade—an equal interchange of the peculiar products of the country. Prussia, he tells you, is already shaken. He delivers what I cannot but consider most extraordinary opinions upon the state of France, to which my noble friend the member for Newark (Lord J. Manners) has already referred. I cannot of course presume to offer an opinion upon this high subject of cabinet secrets after the declaration of the right honourable gentleman. It may be that the Americans, because all things are possible, are going to change their tariff; it may be possible that Russia is shaken; it may be possible that the French are in favour of Free Trade; but I think it my duty to the house to offer some facts to their consideration, from which I shall leave them to draw their own inference. We have, in the first place, a report from the Hon. Mr. Walker, secretary to the American Treasury. Mr. Walker is a very respectable man. He is not, I believe, interested in the protection of native industry; and, indeed, I am sorry to say, that in America, for the last few years, the question as to what is your material interest is the only line of demarcation between parties. But before you can calculate upon any modification of the tariff of America, it would be just as well that the house should clearly understand what is the power of the manufacturing interest, and protected interest of that country. I will not refer now to that enormous volume which has been already subjected to criticism in this house, but to the last census of the population of America, which has been sent to me by a gentleman residing in Liverpool. It is the census of the year 1840, and I believe it is the last published; but if it is not so, so much the more in my favour. What do you suppose is the number of manufacturing operatives in the United States? In 1840, and since 1840, under this tariff there has been the greatest development of manufacturing industry in America yet known (hear, hear, hear). In 1840 the number of manufacturing operatives in the United States was 800,000, a population exceeding, I believe, the manufacturing population of the four great staple manufactures in England. The honourable gentleman, the Secretary of the Treasury, says in his report, "The only interests concerned are the interests of 10,000 manufacturers." Now, the importance of any interest is to be calculated from the amount of population employed and the capital invested. What the number of manufacturers really is, is of trifling importance, but there are really 10,000 in the United States. I want to know how many there are in England? I know that in the population returns, which were drawn up by a pen not very favourable to the agricultural interest, it was not convenient, probably, to allow the number of manufacturers to appear; but I very much doubt whether there are 10,000. At any rate, conceive the importance of the interests you are to encounter. But that is not all. I am not going to dilate upon the number of individuals in America who are dependent upon those 800,000 persons; but there is not an agricultural community in the vicinity of those manufacturing establishments which is not in favour of protection; and for this reason, that the protected interest gives them the incalculable advantage of the home market (cheers from the protectionists). You have therefore, to encounter alone the best organised, and probably one of the most numerous interests of the United States, and unless you are aware of peculiar circumstances with regard to the industry of the United States, it is utterly impossible to comprehend what is going on in that country (hear, hear). I will give the house an illustration. The other day I met a noble lord, once a minister of the Crown, who has travelled much in America. Mr. Adams, he said, who was the last man he should have expected to find, had made a most warlike speech; and the noble lord remarked that ever since the Free Trade agitation in England, and especially since the English cabinet had become Free Traders, all the manufacturing interests of America had become extremely warlike. "They were a peaceable interest." I am quoting language which I read only last night; but the fact is, after all, that war will be the only protection for our manufactures (hear, hear). Let me press this upon the attention of the house (hear, hear, hear). Remember the arguments used in favour of free imports, in favour of altering our tariff to the American market. It has always been considered a peace measure; but remember what things may happen from that quarter if we relax our protection. In exact proportion as you consult, if you can consult, the western community, you will raise the disaffection of the great northern states, which are the states upon the coast, and the most powerful in the American union (hear, hear). I put these things to the consideration of the noble lord (Lord Morpeth) who has recently visited those countries, and who interested us the other night with an account of them (a laugh)—I mean the noble lord the member for the West Riding; and I am bound to say I rejoice in his return to us, even though he be member for the West Riding. Really, I listened to the noble lord's speech with very great interest. His descriptions of American life, and his pictures of American landscapes were admirable, and all I wished for was, that he could have entered a little more into social detail, and given us, for example, an affecting account of that celebrated melody which depicts the manner in which they jump from one side of the table to the other (laughter). I have endeavoured to condense my observations upon America; but I really think they are worthy the calm consideration of the house. Then we are told that "Russia is already shaken." We are to be knocked down at once by that statement; we must not speak a single word upon it. "Russia is already shaken," says the right honourable gentleman. I can only say I have been reading a book published within the last month, which seems to have been in anticipation of all these wonderful changes. It is written by a man who has great influence upon public opinion in that country. "I find," he says, "a most obstinate determination that this system (Free Trade) must be put an end to immediately. It is confessed (he says) that the Manchester people can export, and are ready to export"—and he quotes the language of Mr. Baines, and the speeches of the honourable member for Durham—"at a loss. This wonderful nation will go on (he says) exporting at a loss to swamp our markets, and this dangerous measure of English aggression will render it necessary we should, if possible, be far more stringent" (hear, hear). Until I hear more detailed accounts of "the shaking of Russia," I shall be extremely sceptical, I am sorry to say, upon the statements of the right honourable gentleman (cheers from the protectionists). But, sir, I have read a most mournful representation from the little state of Mecklenburg, and some of the other states in the vicinity, which had been asked to join the Zollverein over and over again. They say they have not joined it in consequence of the representations of the English Minister (hear, hear). They say, after all our sacrifices, the Zollverein are to have free exports from England. We are to have no advantage whatever; and having been misled by the representation of the English Minister, the best thing we can do is to join the Zollverein, and see what measures are most calculated to advance the cause of native industry" (hear, hear, and loud cheering). Now, sir, I come to France, and I must say that I never in my life listened to anything (even when the right honourable gentleman confessed he had given up the principle of protection) more astounding than the prospect he held out to you—held out by a powerful minister—to influence your judgment in the school of Manchester, because if we fight hostile tariffs with free imports, I fear for the men who once have agreed to support a minister who does not believe they can fight hostile tariffs with free imports. Now I say, without shrinking, and I declare most solemnly, it is my conviction, and I speak from as much knowledge of the public men of France as generally falls to the experience of any individual not a minister—that with the exception of an occasional minister, there is not any interest, of any individual in France, not in favour of a high restrictive policy (cheers from the protectionists). It is, indeed, a most curious circumstance in France, which the house should be well acquainted with. My noble friend the member for Newark has already alluded to it. There is no country in the world where parties are so various and so violent as in France. Changes of Government are looked for; there are national parties looking for revolution, and in common talk anticipating changes that would make an Englishman shudder. But you will always find this curious circumstance, that what is called the Conservative party, which now sways the Chambers—the commercial aristocracy—is entirely opposed to it. The republican party, the great object of whose struggle is to terminate the dynasty and to get rid of the sovereignty, and the men who are neutral to change, even they are more opposed to what is called Free Trade than the commercial body. To these great interests must be added the literary and philosophical classes, which enlist all the fashion of the country. You have these working together with the others—it may be from a higher motive, but of course from a conviction that it is their interest—against what they call the fatal principle of competition. Now, sir, there is but one way, though I fear it is now too late, to gain any relaxation in the commercial system of France. It is by diplomacy. It is a condition of the French cabinet to do nothing without diplomacy. With regard to isolated points, and especially with regard to the manufactures of Sheffield, something might be done without it; but every thing in France is a matter of diplomatic quid pro quo. If I bring you then to this point, and if the right honourable gentleman is not prepared to fight hostile tariffs with free imports, he has really no ground whatever for his measure (cheers). Now I come to the doctrine of Free Trade, and let us see what it is to fight hostile tariffs with free imports. I will take the Baltic trade. We have large importations of corn from the Baltic, and if in addition we import five millions from Russia, how will you meet that claim? An honourable friend says they will take nothing but gold. Another honourable gentleman says we shall buy bills and sell those bills to them. That is all very well as far as it goes. You have then got to pay Russia five millions, and you are to buy bills from Brazil and New York to pay those five millions; but you have already supplied the Brazilians and the Americans with as many of your goods as they can take, and if you want to sell them more you must sell at a great sacrifice ("oh, oh," from the Free Traders). If you do that you must reduce profits, and if you reduce profits you must reduce wages (cheers from the protectionists). The system of the right hon. gentleman is a "comprehensive" system. It is not confined to one market. Its action will be going on in six or seven markets at the same time; and if in six or seven markets you have these forced sales, I want to know how are you prepared to meet the effect they will have upon the general distribution of the precious metals (hear)? If you reduce your produce, if you reduce your wages; if prices are lower, as they are to be in this country; if you find no longer around the high prices and efficient labour of this country, and that in every other market an immense mass of bullion is distributed—I want to know how you can prevent the distribution of the precious metals, which is our strength? I confess I cannot think that in the banking bill of the right hon. gentleman we should find a remedy. It is a measure rather characterised by caution than security (hear, hear). How can you meet your fixed charges? How can you meet your taxation? How can you meet everything which is fixed in this country, if you have this general fall of prices? For example, if you get those cargoes of Manchester goods which would otherwise take a million and a half or two millions, for one million, the labour of England receives only one million, instead of a million and a half. Every year the labour of England receives less. The inevitable effect must be, that you will have a less demand for all foreign articles, and how can you then fulfil your public contracts (hear, hear)? Now, I ought to notice, before I address myself to the principle of protection, and I have to apologise to the house for having so long delayed to do so, two speeches which have been made in the course of this debate, and which, as a matter of courtesy, I am bound to notice. The first is that of the right honourable gentleman the Secretary at War (Mr. S. Herbert). This was a speech which excited, I think, a great deal of surprise (hear). It was, I do not say it offensively, but it was a League speech (cheers, and counter cheers)—a speech which, made at the right time, by the proper person, and, under the proper circumstances, would have been received, I dare say, with much applause. Now, I can easily understand some gentlemen opposite, who entered life with a deep conviction of the truth of great economical principles, who viewed, perhaps, in an extravagant manner, many of the evils of this country, as resulting from the fallacy of the system to which they were opposed—I can conceive them, acting under a deep, profound, and rational conviction of the truth which animates them, as I dare say it does many of the Anti-Corn Law League—I can conceive them using language of a very ardent character; but I must say, that the right honourable gentleman is not the person who should address us as a master when he is only a convert (a laugh)—I was going to say only a recent convert; but I beg his pardon, he was a disciple of Free Trade in 1841, but the principles of Free Trade were then to be applied from the side of the table opposite, and that of course makes a great difference (a laugh). But the right honourable gentleman said the other evening that the fallacy of cheap bread was entirely discarded by all parties. So said the right honourable gentleman the Secretary at War; but the right honourable gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, on the following night, in answer to a very proper appeal from the honourable member for Stamford, said, unless the question before the house was one of cheap and abundant food for the people, there was really no question at all (cheers from the Protectionists). Then, how reconcile that with what the right honourable gentleman the Secretary at War said? You may not reconcile them; but I draw a moral, and I say that I am not surprised at their distracted counsels when their arguments are so discordant. But was that the only discordance? No, for the right hon. gentleman the Secretary at War says, "In the first place, as regards the most important interest in this comprehensive scheme" (which I don't wish particularly to advert to, but which is the most important interest), the agricultural interest—"What," he says, "do you fear from free imports? where is your corn to come from?" Now I want to avoid as much as possible making a Corn Law speech, of which, no doubt, I shall have many opportunities. I wish to deal in a comprehensive manner with a comprehensive question; but I do not like to allow such statements to pass, because I observe that there is a coolness of assertion very prevalent upon this subject (loud cheers and counter cheers). I read a speech the other day from one whom all respect, and whom I may call, I believe, a noble parliamentary victim. The noble lord said, "What do you care for imports; you may get some, but of every million of quarters there is a rise of 10s. in the price." Now, I would say to the right hon. gentleman the Secretary at War, and I speak from as much investigation as I could give the subject, and from more experience, perhaps, than many possess, that there is not the slightest doubt but you may have, when this system is established in this country, any quantity of corn you like (loud cheers from the opposition). It is ridiculous to tell me that those people have no capital. The gentlemen of Manchester have plenty (cheers). But this I will say, that there is no fallacy so great as to suppose that the price will rise when you have once established a market here in proportion to your demand (cheers, and cries of "oh, oh"). Certainly, now, when we have a very limited supply, a sudden demand will immediately affect the price; but when we have a settled market, exactly in proportion to your demand, prices will fall (ironical cheers from the opposition). It is the invariable result (renewed ironical cheers from the opposition). Nothing pleases me more than that chorus of sneers from the school of Manchester. But now I will prove it to you. Take the article of tea. You get tea from one country only. Your demand has increased every year, and year after year the price has fallen (cheers). Take again cotton; there is a greater analogy between cotton and corn, perhaps, than between tea and corn; for there were nearly the same discussions with regard to cotton as have taken place relative to corn. It was said, the more Manchester demanded cotton, the greater would be the price in the United States, and it was proved, in a pamphlet written by a late distinguished member of Congress, that under no circumstances could the price of cotton be less than 12 cents. per lb. Now, ever since you have established your trade, with scarcely any interval, the price of cotton has diminished, diminished, diminished, and it has been as low as three cents. per lb. (hear). You may object to my reasoning with respect to corn; but first rebut my evidence as to tea and cotton, and then you will have the right to do so (cheers). Now, I refer again to the right hon. gentleman the Secretary at War, who says to you, "What is all this agitation—what is this question of importance?—it is only a repeal of the duty," forgetting that last year he called it a "social revolution" (a laugh). Then I come to the consistent Secretary of State for the Home Department, who says, "Refuse to pass these measures, and bring on England anarchy, misery, and ruin." The right hon. gentleman was very much alarmed at the end of last year in consequence of the deficiency of potatoes in Ireland, and he was also alarmed, he said, in consequence of the expected deficiency of the wheat harvest in England. He also tells us, that he was particularly alarmed about that, because he thought it possible that it might bring about a state of affairs similar to that in 1843, in which he assured the house he was more alarmed than he could possibly have anticipated at the time (hear, hear). I have observed ever since the right honourable baronet has been a Minister of a Conservative Cabinet, that he has gradually brought forward a very extensive measure, which has as regularly produced great alarm, and excited great odium in the country. Then the right honourable gentleman has been alarmed, and has withdrawn that measure (cheers). Though in opposition not over scrupulous, it seems a characteristic trait of the right hon. gentleman that the responsibilities of office bring to him not prudence but panic (loud cheers and laughter)—and these are the ministers who turn round to us and say, "You are alarmed at our measures, but you only suffer from your own panic" (hear, hear). Why, it is an alarmist cabinet. I know not what is the cause, but you may see fright stamped on every forehead. Whether it arise from the deficiency of food in Ireland, or the superabundance of suffrage in Lancashire, so it is (a laugh). And, now, if I may be permitted, I will meet the question of protection as I engaged to do. I was bound first, however, to answer those main arguments which have been offered by the Government in favour of the new system; now I venture to offer mine in favour of the old (cheers). Sir, the noble lord the member for London, in his address the other night, the tone of which I am sure every one must have felt was equal to the occasion and to himself (cheers), touched upon the question of protection in the abstract. He explained in very classic language the usual economical theories on the subject, very valuable, I have no doubt, in themselves, but never having influenced human conduct, and being totally incapable of ever influencing human conduct, all that I can admire in the communication of the noble lord is the evidence of his well-read mind (cheers and laughter). I do not understand what the honourable gentlemen opposite mean, dealing as we are with England and with practical and existing circumstances, by the protective system of this country. I do not think that in England the protective system, as defined by the noble lord, namely, protection to every branch of native industry, ever existed (hear, hear). There has been in England once a commercial system, founded on principle, definite in all its details, and extremely beneficial in its practice. It was called the colonial system. The colonial system was a system, and as far as that system could effect what you call "protection of native industry" it did so. In order to develop its grand point, no doubt there was protection of native industry in England, but always auxiliary to the full development of the colonial system. Now, we have always had in England in those good old days a very liberal system of commerce in cotton. We have had also a proposal, which, unfortunately, was not carried into practice, for a general system of commercial communication with the whole world at the moderate duty of ten per cent. That is the true principle of Free Trade (hear, hear). During the whole of those years, our foreign trade was sacrificed to our colonial system. There was a falling off in the average of our commodities. Cotton was very much curtailed; but the merchants of England were compensated by larger profits and securer markets. But you lost your principal colonies, and you were obliged to lay down some principles for your future commercial interests. It fell to the lot of Mr. Pitt, whose speeches you all have, or ought to have, read, to adjust those principles. He adopted a system of commercial intercourse upon principles of reciprocal advantage. He told the gentlemen of this house that they must no longer adhere to those old ideas which belonged to the colonial system, because they had no longer a colonial world to support that system. Mr. Pitt gave them a new tariff, as the right honourable gentleman has given us. He said, "Here is my new tariff; these are the terms of interchange with all Europe. They are most liberal terms. I want to have Free Trade; and I have entered into commercial treaties with the great powers, and I have commenced with France." Then came the revolutionary war, which unsettled all; but the moment that was over you returned to the old system. Lord Liverpool, Mr. Huskisson, and others, all adopted the same system. I gave a most conscientious vote for the tariff of the right hon. gentleman and for his former corn-bill, which was founded on a just and moderate system, and which was in complete harmony with what I conceive to be the true commercial principles which ought to influence this country. We know very well what a contrary policy would have done; we know what absolute prohibition would have done, for we have the example of Spain always before us; but we knew also that there is another country where there has been a trial of what you call Free Trade. The spirit of competition has in Turkey gradually destroyed the finest manufactures in the world. As recently as the year 1812 there were very considerable manufactures carried on in Turkey, but they are now destroyed. The consequences of Free Trade in Turkey have, I say, been altogether as pernicious and as fatal as the consequences of Free Trade have been in Spain (hear, hear). To return to England, however. The right honourable gentleman had two things to do. First, to employ the people, and then to study what should be the surest means of employing them, not giving a preponderance to one branch of industry, so that in case of its failure, great distress should not ensue. I think the right hon. gent. said, that there were difficulties in arguing against the principles of Free Trade, because they had a prima facie case with them. But that is saying nothing, and I think nothing at all of prima facie cases; because it is just as well for me to say it is very difficult to argue against protection, because there is a prima facie case in favour of protection (hear, hear, and cheers). Well, now the right honourable gentleman has announced officially that this principle of protection is for ever relinquished by his Cabinet. We think it is beneficial—I do not say that I am proving it beneficial—but I call on you to prove that Free Trade would be beneficial (loud cries of hear, hear). On you rests the onus probandi; and now, gentlemen of the League, I will meet you on that point as I promised. I have listened to the speech of the honourable member for Manchester with great attention. Unfortunately I did not hear the speech of the honourable member for Rochdale, but, of course, I read it, as I always take care to read the speeches of one whose part in debate is so prominent (cheers); and I cannot extract from the speech of either honourable gentleman one single principle which can guide me in this maze—not a single reason for alteration; but then I admit that it is not fair to judge of their case from those two speeches, when they have made so many upon the same subject (a laugh). I want to meet their case, I declare, in the fairest possible manner. I have great difficulty, I confess, in doing so, and it is because the case of the Anti-Corn-Law League has perpetually changed (loud cheers from the Protectionists). It is a very curious thing, but it must be remembered, that though they have been working now seven years, they com-menaced their agitation by promising cheap bread to the labourer, and they finished by promising high rents to the landlord (cheers). I do not impute those as changes. I can easily understand, if I took one great principle to work out, and if I viewed it in every light, and turned it over and over in my mind every day, that I should often see very contrary effects arising from the same principle: and I believe that all the Anti-Corn-Law League all this time, while they thought that they were instructing the people, were only educating themselves (cheers from the Protectionists, and laughter). I will give the gentlemen of the League another reason why I can trace this ingenious development of their minds. I happen to have in my possession a circular—a kind of manifesto of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester. I think it is dated 1839, and it gives a most melancholy picture of the commercial system of England. Turning the first leaf, I find that the great panacea for all the difficulty was, not at all the abolition of the Corn Law, but only a change in the currency (cheers). You say, "but what is the Chamber of Commerce to the Anti-Corn-Law League?" It happens that the gentlemen who drew up that circular are the principal members of the Anti-Corn-Law League. If you doubt it, send up stairs for the book which contains the evidence taken before the committee on joint stock banks in 1840 and 1841, and just read the evidence of the most distinguished members of the Anti-Corn-Law League—some of them members of this house—and you will find that they have not an idea against protection, but that many of them are sworn brothers of the honourable member for Birmingham (cheers, and "no, no," from Mr. Muntz). Do you mean to say that Richard Cobden, the same gentleman, I believe, who sits here as the member for Stockport, does not trace all the evils of the country to the currency?

Mr. MUNTZ: I don't know what he did. I mean to say I never did (hear, and a laugh).

Mr. D'ISRAELI continued: I may be wrong. They may not be the same gentlemen; but I certainly took him for one of the school of Gemini (a laugh). However, I do not impute that as any fault to them. But it is extremely important to see how they have changed their minds. Having exhausted the currency, they turn round to attack the landlords. Continue the agitation, and they may next attack the fundholder. They want a new victim. We are only a link in the great chain. Our case is not entirely hopeless. I think, therefore, we should promote the agitation: because, if we promote the agitation, they may attack a new interest (cheers and great laughter). I take their case from their own speeches, and I am anxious to quote them fairly and properly. The case of the League against protection may be stated thus:—"Protection aims at two objects, to feed the people and to employ them. It has failed to feed the people, because you are obliged to import some corn from abroad to make up the deficiency in the home supply, and it does not employ them, because you are compelled to send a portion of the agricultural population to other trades. Now, we say, that we can both feed and employ the people." I may answer to this argument, that it is a great assumption. You may contend that we, the advocates of protection, have failed in what we undertook to do; but, at any rate, you are untrue (hear, hear, from the agricultural members). But the first question which arises is, have we failed in feeding the people? We have no agricultural statistics, which I deplore, but we have what are called "great facts" to guide us. We all know that, 50 years ago, the population did not reach half its present amount, and we also know that we then had not corn enough to feed the people. We know also that, at the present day, we do, on the average of years, succeed in feeding the people, although the population has since been doubled. That is a prima facie case in our favour. But then it is said that protection is the bane of agriculture (hear, hear, hear). Now, I do not see how protection can be the bane of agriculture, unless you mean to say that the agriculture of England is inferior to that of other countries. You say that it is inferior, but the assertion is not enough. You are bound to prove it. Now, I want to know where a superior system of agriculture is to be found. You will not tell me that there is a superior system of agriculture in Russia? This system has been described by a very graceful and graphic pen, and as the description must be fresh in the recollection of the House, I will not do more than allude to it. I believe the system of agriculture in Russia remains in much the same state as that in which it was carried on at the time of that description. But, will you say that the agriculture of Germany is better than that of England? I admit that you may go over the world, and pick out one district in Styria, or another in Tuscany, where a superior system of agriculture may be pursued, but I believe that there are districts in England which may rival them (cheers from the agricultural benches). I believe, however, that there is no country with that breadth of land which England possesses, which can sustain the reputation of a first-rate system of agriculture (hear, hear). Take the north of Germany, for instance. Take a rural town in the north of Germany, where you find merely a straggling street, with one shop, probably the apothecary's, who sells everything (cheers and laughter). Take such a town, and compare with the rural towns—the smallest rural towns—in England, where you find many large shops abounding with goods, and goods from Manchester too (hear, hear, hear). There you can see and understand what the home market is. I will take another country—France. There is a country blessed with the most abundant natural advantages. They have an exuberant soil, and a fertile climate, nor have they to contend against any of those disadvantages to which the gentlemen of the League are constantly reminding us that agriculture in this country is exposed. They have no law of primogeniture (hear, hear), they have no hereditary peerage, they have no law of entail, they have no game (loud cheers, and laughter on both sides of the house). Then, also, you have the equal partition of landed property; yet what is the condition of the agricultural population in France? It is notoriously inferior to the condition of the same class of people in our own country. It seems, then, that the condition of the agricultural portion of the population of England is not so very bad after all. But, again, you say that there is a want of the application of capital to land. I say that it is impossible to travel over England and foreign countries, and then to doubt that there is a greater application of capital to land here than elsewhere (cheers). There is not a man in our colonies, or in our Indian possessions, whose aim and object is not to return with the wealth which he has accumulated in England, and become a justice of the peace or a deputy lieutenant (cries of hear, hear, and laughter). Riding on elephants, or surrounded by slaves, he is always dreaming of the quarter sessions (cheers and laughter). But you say that there is no application of capital to the land in England. Why, in a very short time, no less than a million and a quarter sterling has been expended upon guano alone. There is no doubt that if you give a good profit upon cultivation, you may have a more organised system of the application of capital to agricultural purposes; but the extraordinary part of the case is, that land in England gives, on the average, less than $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. as a return for the investment of capital. Foreigners cannot understand this, and they have often asked for an explanation of the causes which lead to this result. It is your territorial constitution which has invested the possession of land with honours (hear, hear), which forms the principal inducement to the investment of capital in land in this country. There are two circumstances which I am afraid will alter this state of things. I will assume, in the first place, that after a number of years we may be involved in a foreign war. Now I wish honourable members would consider what was the position of England after the rupture of the treaty of Amiens. We had then what you call Free Trade. We had no less than one-fifth of our supply of corn from abroad. What was the consequence of war at that time? You tell me that although we cannot be independent of a foreign supply, yet that we can be supplied by France even in time of war. Now, I do not deny that in 1812 we did receive some corn from Holland and France: but if from that isolated fact you draw a complete theory, you will fall into a great error. You had a great difficulty in obtaining what corn you did get; and it was only by acquiring the dominion of the seas that you did, under any circumstances, obtain a supply. At that time, in consequence of the want of food in England, you had the greatest possible inducements to investments in land (hear, hear). You had that variety of Enclosure Acts of which we have heard so much, and you had wheat at 110s. the quarter. You raised loans upon the land when wheat was at 110s. or 112s. the quarter, and you paid on those loans with wheat at 55s. (hear, hear). Now, I want to know whether it can be said that in the dreadful struggle in which we were afterwards engaged, the agriculture of this country did not supply the nation with food. Recollecting, as I do, that though there were two seasons when famine was impending over England, and that in 1812 the quarter loaf was selling at 1s. 11d.—still, with all this immense increase of population going on, England has mainly supported herself, it cannot be urged against the system of protection that it failed to supply the people with food (hear, hear). I now meet the gentlemen of the League on the second point which they have urged—namely, that this system has failed to employ the people. The right honourable gentleman the Secretary at War has touched upon this delicate subject. "Only cultivate the hills of Wiltshire," he says, "and there is sufficient employment for the whole population" (hear, hear). I ask the right honourable gentleman why the hills of Wiltshire are not cultivated? It is a legitimate question to ask one whose proud, though not his proudest boast it is, that he is the representative of that county. On him and his, amongst others, rests the moral responsibility for the condition of the people in that county. You tell me of Goatcare and Bremhill, and of the wretched condition of the Wiltshire labourer. I do not attempt—I never did attempt—to deny the existence of much misery among the agricultural population. I have myself, not here alone, but by other means, attempted to draw the attention of the public to the condition of the people. But when you tell me of the more prosperous condition of the population in former times, I call upon you to look to facts and cases. I say, that even with this accumulated population, the condition of the people was formerly worse than it is at present. I have read descriptions of the sufferings of the people during the revolutionary war, and they more than equalled the distress which has been felt occasionally since. But you bring forward the Goatcare and the Bremhill meetings, and point to them as examples of the condition to which the agricultural labourer is reduced. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) compared a gentleman who spoke on his side of the house (Mr. F. Scott) to Anacharsis Clootz. That reminds me of a story which I recollect having read. Anacharsis Clootz announced one fine morning to the French convention that there was a deputation of all the nations of Europe, who wished to express to them their gratitude for the efforts which they had made in behalf of the human race. The French Convention allowed the deputation from all the courts of Europe to attend. They appeared at the bar, introduced by Anacharsis Clootz, in appropriate costume, each in the dress of his own country. It made a great sensation in Paris, and I believe the deputation from all the nations of Europe afterwards dined at the Café de Paris, and probably danced at the carnival ball in the evening in the same dresses in which they presented themselves to the convention (a laugh). I think the Goatcare meeting was got up pretty much in the same way. But let the agricultural labourer be as miserable as you say he is, does it follow that protection is the cause? I might turn to the honourable members near me and say, "I will go to Manchester or Stockport and show you what misery is there. I know what human suffering is. I will take you to Stockport or Manchester, and show you the worker in the factory where the exhausted slave curses the life which he cannot quit" (cheers from the agricultural members). But I will not do so, because I am too well acquainted with the noble industry of Lancashire and Cheshire to make such a representation. I know that the manufacturers of Lancashire are aware of their responsibility, and I cannot condescend to such vile acts of faction as to say that the condition of the manufacturing labourer is attributable to the manufacturers. We, however, who are the advocates of protection, cannot assent to your assumption, that we shall give the people more employment by admitting the productions of foreign labour, or elevate their condition by diminishing their wages. I will admit that the wages of labour are not dependent on the price of corn, but that the price of corn acts rather in an inverse ratio. Then how does that act affect your argument? The higher the price of corn the cheaper your articles ought to be, because wages will be lower (hear, hear, and a laugh from the agricultural members). If, however, the position of the right honourable gentleman—which is yours also, for he borrowed it from you—be true, then, with an importation from the Baltic of 4,000,000 of quarters, and with the wages of labour not increased, how will you make consumption greater? Suppose wheat at 50s. in England, and the price of the Baltic wheat 80s., you must have a proportionate displacement of labour, because you know the great modern principle is that the wages of labour do not depend on the price of corn. That is a dilemma for your consideration. There is another point to which I must refer, namely, the effect of this sudden importation on our monetary system. We, the advocates of protection, say at once that all those evils which you attribute to the system of Corn Laws, so far as our monetary system is concerned, are owing to the admission of foreign corn. You rejoin, if we had a regular trade we should then have a regular supply. I admit that; but suppose that you have a sudden deficiency in England, you must still have two or three millions of quarters more than the regular supply of foreign grain, and you must pay for these additional millions of quarters with English gold. Now, Sir, I have nearly concluded my observations. I have omitted much of what I should have wished to urge, and I have only applied myself in detail to the question of corn, taking it as an illustration of the more general principle which I have advanced. I have never been one of those who have advocated the cause of agricultural protection, upon the ground of agricultural burdens. I maintain—and I wish those who think with me, to bear this in mind—that it is by means of great principles they must defend their cause. Sir, I have ventured to vindicate those great principles—principles of high policy—on which I believe that the protective system should be continued. First, without particular reference to agriculture, looking at all countries, it is the first duty of a minister, and the first interest of a State to maintain an equal balance between the great branches of national industry. That duty has been recognised by our greatest ministers for the last two hundred years, as one of the most important which a statesman can undertake, and the reasons why it is so are so obvious that I need scarce recount them. These reasons, sir, involve the healthy state of our political condition—of our social condition; they affect the happiness of the people, the rights of the population, and above all, they affect the stability of the State (cheers). But I go further than that. I say we are bound in practice to do more than that. I repeat now what I have said before, and what I will never shrink from—I repeat that there are special reasons which I will give, why you should not only maintain the even balance to which I have referred, but why you should give the preponderance to the landed interest (hear, hear, and cheers). Mind, I don't say predominance—the word, by the way, wrongly quoted by the honourable member for Manchester as having been used by the noble lord the member for the city of London. He never employed it. He said preponderance—a perfectly constitutional and proper expression (hear, hear). I repeat it. I say the preponderance ought to be given to the land because you have a territorial constitution (hear, hear). You have thrown on the land the revenue of the church—the administration of justice—the estate of the poor (hear), and you value this territorial constitution, not to gratify the pride, or pamper the luxury of proprietors, but because in a territorial constitution you, and those who preceded you, have found the only security for self-government—for that Government which stands in proud opposition to the centralised system which has taken root in other countries (loud cheers). This is why I have ever supported the claims of agriculture. My constituents are not landlords nor great capitalists—they are, in fact, children of industry and toil. They believe, first, that their material interests are involved in the maintenance of that system which would favour the native industry of the country—they believe that their social and political interests are involved in that system. They believe that that system has guaranteed our rights and liberties; and I agree with them (protectionist cheers). I may be told that these are worn-out sentiments—exploded fallacies (hear, hear, from the Opposition). I know that we are told that the meaning of this great movement—this Free Trade movement—is not merely the repeal of the Corn Laws, but the transference of power from one class to another (loud cheers)—another distinguished for its intelligence and its wealth—that of the manufacturers of England (cheers). Sir, my conscience assures me that I am not one who have been slow in doing justice to the intelligence of that class—who have ever envied them their deserved prosperity (hear, hear). But I confess my deep astonishment, that in this age of political legislation, when we trace all our evils to class interests, I am told that we are to be rescued from the alleged power of one class only to sink under the avowed power of another (loud cheers). I for one—if this be the end of all our struggles—if this be the great result arrived at by this enlightened age—I for one protest against the ignominious catastrophe (cheers). I believe the monarchy of England—that sovereignty mitigated by the acknowledged authority of the States of the realm—has a root in the hearts of Englishmen, and moreover, that it is capable of securing the happiness of the people and the power of the state (cheers). But if these be worn-out terms—if it be true that we have discarded these doctrines, I for one—am anxious as I am to maintain our present polity—am ready for that end to make as many sacrifices as any man. If, sir, we are to have this change, then I hope that the foundations may be deep and the scheme be comprehensive, and instead of falling into such thralldom—the thralldom of capital—of those who when they boast of their intelligence are proud of their wealth (cheers)—I for one say, if we must find a new force to maintain the ancient throne and immemorial monarchy of England, that I would prefer to find it—to find these invigorating energies—in an educated and enfranchised people. (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid vociferous cheering.)

The adjournment of the debate was then moved by Mr. E. BULLER, and agreed to.

ADJOURNED DEBATE—MONDAY.

Mr. EDWARD BULLER was very imperfectly heard at the commencement of his speech: when he became audible, he was remarking upon what had fallen from the honourable member for Shrewsbury (Mr. D'Israeli) on Friday, whom he charged with using stale arguments, often employed, and as often refuted. That honourable member, among other things had contended for three points—1. That import, without reciprocity, drained the country of its specie. 2. That it lowered prices. 3. That it reduced wages. He had asked, too, whether the ministers of this country were prepared to fight hostile tariffs by free imports? He (Mr. E. Buller) was strongly inclined to think that by means of commercial treaties, Great Britain might enjoy the double advantage of buying in the cheapest, and selling in the dearest markets. The hon. member for Shrewsbury had urged that all the manufacturers, and all the principal public men in the United States, and indeed in France, were protectionists; but if any expectations could be indulged that foreign nations would be induced to see their true interests in carrying out the principles of Free Trade, it could only be produced by showing our own sincerity in adopting and adhering to such principles. If the principle of high protection were the right footing, how did it happen that foreign nations had gained nothing by such a course, while in Great Britain our exports had been annually and rapidly augmenting. The honourable member here entered into some calculations founded upon a comparison of the exports and imports of Great Britain with those of France, but he stated his figures in a tone of voice which prevented us from catching several of the items. The general result was, that while our imports had only doubled, our exports had trebled, within the last few years. Great Britain has been pursuing the course of gradual diminution of protection since 1825, when Mr. Huskisson introduced his great measure of commercial reform. The French had met it by a contrary system, and what had been the result? In the twelve years before 1825 our average exports to France were in value 326,888*l.*, and our average imports 939,000*l.*. Our average exports to France, from 1833 to 1844, were in value 3,340,000, and our imports 3,035,000*l.*. Hence it was evident that although France had not profited by the example of Great Britain, the success of the latter had been triumphant. The honourable member for Shrewsbury had adverted to Turkey, and had contended that the trade of that country had been ruined by free importation. The truth, however, was, that the honourable member had not at all noticed the many disadvantages with which trade and manufactures had to contend in Turkey; and independently of free importations, there were many circumstances calculated to check enterprise and fetter industry in Turkey. In proof of this position, the honourable member (Mr. E. Buller) read a hatti scheriff, not long since issued by the minister of Turkey, relating to three points; first, the security of property; secondly, the mode of taxing and levying imposts; thirdly, the mode of raising soldiers, and fixing the duration of their services. On the whole, he contended that if the commerce of Turkey had declined, it was not to be attributed to free importation. The honourable member for Shrewsbury had next adduced the old argument that it was dangerous for Great Britain to depend upon a supply from foreign countries, especially a supply of corn. He (Mr. E. Buller) denied in the first place that this country was ever completely independent of a foreign supply of corn: in years of scarcity, grain for two months' consumption was derived from abroad. In the next place he insisted that there was no danger in this dependence as long as we maintained the mastery of the ocean; if we once lost that supremacy there must be an end to the greatness of the empire. The honourable member had insisted that importations of corn had a tendency to lower wages, but he (Mr. E. Buller) would endeavour to point out in what way his position was destitute of foundation. The honourable member for Shrewsbury said if four millions of quarters of foreign wheat were introduced, it must be displaced by four millions of quarters of home grown corn. But what would be really the effect of such an importation? Why that 6,000,000*l.* instead of 10,000,000*l.* would be laid out by people in food, and that they would have the remaining 4,000,000 to spend in manufactures or in colonial produce (hear, hear). Thus would the people be raised in a social, and consequently in their moral, position. Thus would they be enabled to support churches and chapels, and send their children to school. "But yours," said the hon. member for Shrewsbury, "is a territorial Government. You bestow great honours on the possessors of land, but you do so on great principles." He looked on the hon. gentleman as one who embodied "a great idea," and he looked most anxiously for the enunciation of those great principles to which he referred. He expected some great truth which was to guide the new generation, and let in light and happiness on our present social system. And what was this great principle? To give preponderance to the landed interest. That was all very well for those who belonged to the favoured class; but how would those who were excluded regard such a principle of Government? If this principle of governing only through and for one section of the community was once sanctioned, her Majesty would no longer be Queen of a nation, but sovereign of a faction (hear, hear). Protection seemed to him to be either a delusion or a fraud. If it meant merely putting into one pocket for manufactures what it took out of the other for food, it was a roundabout system of doing nothing. But the real intention of these laws he believed to be, to benefit one class at the expense of another; for it was impossible effectually to protect our export trade and the monied interest. Though there might be points to cavil at in the measure of the right hon. gentleman, he should give it a cordial and earnest support, while he bore his testimony to the readiness and humanity with which the Government took a step equally called for by their duty to the Sovereign and the interests of the people (hear, hear).

Captain BATESON avowed, that as an Irish member, he should give his decided opposition to the hazardous and revolutionary scheme of the government. He availed himself of the opportunity to accuse Mr. Bright, on the authority of Mr. Leonard Horner's Factory Report for 1845, of dealing in professions of humanity, which were not genuine, and in declarations of liberality and philanthropy towards the poor, which were at once spurious and hypocritical. Returning, however, to the measure more immediately before the house, he contended that it would destroy the export trade of Ireland, shut out from Great Britain its agricultural produce, and annihilate its linen trade. It would likewise give a premium to agitation, by enabling the Peelers to state, and unfortunately with truth, that Irishmen were treated in England no better than other foreigners. He treated as perfectly ridiculous the compensation which Government proposed to give to the landlords of Ireland for this most injurious measure. Four millions of waste lands in Ireland would have been brought into cultivation under the fostering influence of protection; but the heath would still continue to flourish on one part, and the bog to encroach upon the remaining part of them, under the system now proposed. For such a loss, what pecuniary grant could be a compensation?

Mr. M. GORE said, the opinions he was about to express, and the vote he intended to give, were opinions, and would be a vote, at variance with those of a large body within that house, for whom he entertained the highest esteem and the sincerest regard; it would also be a vote at variance with the sentiments of many without the house, for whom also, as for the others, he felt the highest regard; moreover, the opinions he then entertained on this subject were at variance with the opinions he formerly held (hear, hear, hear); and, in justice to himself and the public, he felt bound to come forward manfully and openly, and state the reasons that influenced him on the present occasion. In so doing he agreed with the hon. member who had last spoken, that the consistency which scorned to yield to popular agitation, or be lured from the path of duty, was indeed to be prized; but the consistency which, when convinced that its course was erroneous, still adhered to it—that did so in spite of the evils that would be caused by so doing—that was a consistency which he could neither admire nor follow (hear, hear). What subject or question could be named on which there had not been change, both in that house and the country? Take the Catholic question—the slavery question—take the present question of the Corn Laws—and what great discrepancies of opinion would not be found to have existed upon them? In 1811 or 1815 the advocates of the Corn Laws thought 8*l.* or 9*l.* a quarter only a fair price for corn; yet the same gentlemen afterwards allowed that they had been in error on this subject, and that 50*l.* or between 50*l.* and 60*l.* was a fair price (hear, hear). Mr. Huskisson himself, one of the greatest names of that house, was, both in 1815, and afterwards, a strong advocate of the protection measures of that day; yet, it was well known, that before his death, he was of opinion that the Corn Laws could not be maintained. If it was an error, therefore, though he could not allow it to be an error to admit the force of reasoning, it was one of which that house, and men on both sides of it, had been repeatedly guilty. He declared, on his own part, that he should think himself unworthy of a seat in that house—unworthy to take a part in any public debate or public discussion, if, when convinced of an error, he did not come forward and manfully and firmly avow it. And in allusion to the debates of 1811 and 1815, perhaps he might be allowed to say, that to one venerable member of that house—one nearly related to himself—the charge of inconsistency would certainly not apply, since he, in 1811 and in 1815, opposed the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, in order to go into committee on the motion of Mr. Robinson (the Earl of Ripon); to those opinions his relative had always adhered; and notwithstanding his advanced age and infirmities, he would come down and give his vote in favour of the Government. He (Mr. Gore), on his own part, would at once say, that he would rather have seen this measure brought forward by the noble lord opposite (hear, hear, and cheers); and had it been brought forward by him, he should have had his cordial, strenuous, and decided support (hear, hear). He did not think that the mere desire for a settlement of the question relative to the Corn Laws, would alone justify him in giving his vote; but he was of opinion, that there existed an absolute and pressing necessity for such a settlement; and that, taking into consideration the effect which a distraction in the councils of the nation would have upon the many great interests involved in the security of our vast colonial possessions and Indian empire, they were called upon to set aside all slighter differences; and if they feared no evil result, to give their fullest support to the Government (hear, hear). He considered it of the highest importance that the Minister of this country, whatever be his party, should be enabled to carry on the Government without dissension, and without trammels; and in addition to the reasons, furnished by that belief, guiding him in the course he (Mr. Gore) was pursuing, it was his most decided conviction that the repeal of the Corn Laws, in the manner proposed, would be attended with no detriment to the public (cries of hear, hear). The right hon. gentleman, the Secretary at War, in the remarks which, on a previous night he had made, had said that hon. members, representatives of agricultural interests, were labouring under a delusion. Gentlemen might quarrel with a term; it might, perhaps, have been said, that those gentlemen were mistaken; and certainly he (Mr. Gore) coincided in that opinion; and he did think that in the opposition offered by hon. gentlemen to the measure, they had been led away by a very mistaken view of the facts. He considered that it was altogether impossible that, as some had supposed, any commercial regulations could ever expose England to a deluge of foreign corn; and on examination, such would be found to be the inevitable inference. He had made inquiries, extensively, among merchants and others engaged in the American and European corn-trade, and the results he would as briefly as possible lay before the house. As concerned Dantzic, the prices of wheat at that port, according to the statement of Mr. Jacobs, who put ordinary priced corn on board for 40*l.* a quarter, were as follows: Price per quarter, 50*l.*; freight to London, 4*l.* 8*l.*; insurance, 1*l.* 4*l.*; charges, 6*l.* 9*l.*; duty, 3*l.* 6*l.*; making 66*l.* 3*l.*. Another gentleman, also in a Dantzic house, had assured him that the charges for freightage, insurance, landing, and lading, amounted to 10*l.* per quarter. At Odessa, for the three years ending in 1840, the price of wheat was 34*l.* 6*l.* when sold on the spot; the charges for freightage, amounting to 10*l.* 10*l.*, and being, as he knew from a competent authority, never below 15*l.* per quarter. He had also been informed, by merchants largely connected with Odessa, that they were unable to import corn under 48*l.* to 50*l.* a quarter; and a considerable quantity of Odessa corn is always carried to the shores of the Mediterranean. It might be said that an inducement being held out, the agricultural industry of these countries would undergo, and were capable of undergoing, great improvements; but it was forgotten that, to effect that end, there was a want of the necessary capital, labour, and facilities of conveyance. The estates on which the corn was grown were held in such a manner that there were great impediments, even if there was the inclination, to any material accession of that capital employed in the cultivation of land. The existence of feudal tenures would also be an effectual bar to the concentration of labour; the labourers were serfs; and, in the great majority of instances could not be removed from one estate to another. And then, with respect to the modes of conveyance, it was known that corn was conveyed to Dantzic by water carriage, and on arriving there, the boats, valued at 80*l.* each, carrying 250 quarters, were broken up, and sold for a mere trifle when compared with the original cost. To Odessa, the corn was brought overland, 400 or 500 miles, by means of carts, few in number, and in other respects altogether unequal to giving any facility to a great trade. Would not the knowledge of these circumstances fully justify this conclusion, that, as far as the Continent of Europe is concerned, no great increase for a number of years could be anticipated in the quantity of provisions to be imported into Great Britain? The hon. member for Somersetshire had alluded to America, and had contended that it was out of the question for the English agriculturists to expect any successful, any but a ruinous, competition with the corn growers on the other side of the Atlantic. It should, however, be borne in mind that in America capital was absent, labour was excessively high, and that the yield per acre was very small in comparison with what was found to be the case in England and in other countries in Europe. It was perfectly true, as has been said by the honourable member, that the extent of land under, or about to be under, cultivation was prodigious; but was that a circumstance favourable to the hon. member's argument? What did they deduce from the reports of the Agricultural Societies in America? Why, they would see that the great subject of complaint with those desirous of beholding improvements was, that the very extent of land under cultivation, causes a careless and unsystematic cultivation (hear, hear). At an agricultural meeting in Albany, in the winter of 1844, Mr. O'Reilly said—"Such has been the depreciation of the wheat crops, owing to the exhaustion of the soil, consequent on ill-judged farming, that the product of the wheat lands between the Seneca lake and Virginia river, has not, for the last three or four years, exceeded the low average of 11 or 12 bushels per acre. Indeed, he had authority for declaring that, in reference to a single county (Seneca), the average yield is now not over 10 bushels per acre." Dr. Bukman, addressing the County Agricultural Society, said—"Where is the farm that will now upon the average yield 40 bushels of wheat to the acre? If in this assemblage there is an individual who owns that farm, and realises that result, I will stop. No one speaks. If not 40, then 30; if not 30, then 20." Mr. Van Ranselaer, president of the Agricultural Society of Ranselaer county, said—"One reason why our land has not advanced more rapidly, and grows out of the wide circle in which it is expanded: New lands yield with but comparatively little labour; and to produce a certain amount, many acres are put into cultivation; when these fail to make a profitable return, the farmer, instead of repairing the exhaustion of the soil, often adopts, as he supposes, an easier method of obtaining his purpose, by moving to one of the new states, where a rich harvest may be reaped with little trouble of sowing. To cultivate less land, and in a superior manner, is the point to be ascertained." Mr. Kirby, president of the Jefferson County Society, speaking of the repeal of our Corn Laws, said—"It appears, by an official report made to the British Parliament, in 1841, that the average price of wheat, for the seven previous years, at the principal ports of the Baltic and the Black Sea, was 77 cents per bushel; while, during the same years, the average price at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, was 1 dollar, 40 cents. The cost of freight to England, from the European ports referred to, was 13 cents per bushel. The freight from our ports to England was 17 to 18 cents per bushel. Thus it is apparent that our most favoured wheat region cannot compete, even-handed, with the Continent of Europe, for the wheat trade with England, unless we consent to a general reduction of wages to the European standard—a thing quite out of the question." Tooke says,—"Barring any extraordinary difference in the seasons, I should expect that the price here, with the ports always open at a duty of 22*l.*, would, in a series of years of some length, average about 45*l.*. This country, but more especially the port of London, will be the emporium of the trade in corn between Europe and America. Thus there will be a great increase of trade, and we shall be sure of supply if our crops are deficient." Allusions had been made in the course of the debate to the calculation as to what would be the remunerating price to the English farmer; and the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government had been asked to say what he thought a fair price. But he (Mr. Gore) must say, that of all the difficult questions to be solved, the present seemed to him the most difficult (hear, hear). It was a subject on which a great diversity of opinion had prevailed, and still did prevail, and it was also a subject concerning which an agreement would perhaps never be come to. In 1814 and 1815, men of great experience and of high authority endeavoured to show, and very generally convinced the public, that the agriculturist could never leave the market with profit, if he failed in obtaining the price of 80*l.* a quarter (hear, hear). In 1818 similar statements had been made by individuals whose opinions were entitled to the same respect, and yet prices had declined, and what had been the consequence? It was a consequence in which the nation had rejoiced—a great increase in the profits of agricultural industry (hear, hear, hear). On this point Mr. Tooke said:—"The average of the six years following, when there was no foreign wheat, or no proportion worth mentioning in the market, were 1832, 58*l.* 6*l.*; 1833, 52*l.* 11*l.*; 1834, 46*l.* 2*l.*; 1835, 39*l.* 4*l.*; 1836, 48*l.* 6*l.*; 1837, 55*l.* 10*l.*; average, 50*l.* 3*l.*. But if it be considered that by far the largest quantities sold were in the three years of the lowest prices, viz.—1834, 46*l.* 2*l.*; 1835, 39*l.* 4*l.*; 1836, 48*l.* 6*l.*; average, 41*l.* 8*l.*; and that, during that period, although, as usual, on the occurrence of low prices, there were loud complaints of agricultural distress, the country never exhibited a greater extent, nor a higher degree of cultivation; it is perfectly fair to presume, that, at a price of 45*l.*, there would be no reason to apprehend that much, if any, land would be thrown out of cultivation. The general fact is, in point, by results beyond controversy, that the agricultural productions of the kingdom were never, as far as the seasons permitted, on a larger scale than in 1836 and 1837, notwithstanding the alleged discouragement of the low prices of 1834 and 1835." For his (Mr. Gore's) part, he was inclined to believe, that the principal aids to a rapid progress in agricultural science, and to an increase in the profits of those engaged in agriculture, were to be found in the development of our manufacturing interest (hear, hear, hear). If they looked to the periods when the greatest improvements had taken place in agriculture, they would discover that those improvements were coincident with an extension of the capital, and an addition to the amount of labour engaged in manufactures (cheers). If they took the history of this country at the period immediately previous to the accession of George III. to the throne, and when manufactures in Great Britain were in their infancy, they would perceive that agriculture at the same time was stationary, and had undergone, for a considerable number of years, scarcely any improvement. When, in 1760, attention was being drawn to manufactures, and when their value as an ingredient of a nation's wealth was recognised, agriculture, it would be remarked, had made a corresponding advance, and since then the progress of the two interests, fostered by capital and skill, had been in conjunction (cheers). And judging, therefore, from the past, he felt perfectly assured that the measure, the adoption of which was now recommended, would, if carried, make the further progress, both of agriculture and in manufactures, more certain and more rapid (cheers). He had said before that he was not advocating the proposition merely because he concurred in thinking it was necessary the Government should be kept in office; if he considered that end would be obtained, at any material sacrifice of the agricultural interests, he would give his most strenuous opposition to the scheme of the right honourable baronet; but from an increase in population there must result great increase in demand, for agricultural produce (loud cries of hear, and cheers). All experience and all reason went to prove that a benefit to the manufacturing would be a benefit to the agricultural interest; and among the many authorities who had dealt with the subject, none had spoken more plainly or more convincingly on that point than Hume:—"When manufactures and mechanical arts are not cultivated, the bulk of the people must apply themselves to agriculture; and if their skill and industry increase, there must arise a great superfluity from their labour beyond what suffices to maintain them. They have no temptation, therefore, to increase their skill and industry, since they cannot exchange that superfluity for any commodities which may serve either to their pleasure or vanity. An habit of indolence naturally prevails. The greater part of the land lies uncultivated. What is cultivated yields not its utmost for want of skill and assiduity in the farmers. Were our narrow and malignant politics to meet with success, we should reduce all our neighbouring nations to the same state of sloth and ignorance that prevails in Morocco and the coast of Barbary. But what would be the consequence? They could send us no commodities; they could take none from us; our domestic commerce itself would languish for want of emulation, example, and instruction; and we, ourselves, should soon fall into the same abject condition to which we had reduced them. I shall, therefore, venture to acknowledge, that not only as a man, but as a British subject, I pray for the flourishing commerce of Germany, Spain, Italy, and even France itself. I am, at least, certain that Great Britain, and all these nations would flourish more, did their Sovereigns and Ministers adopt such enlarged and benevolent sentiments towards each other" (hear, hear, hear). A great change like that proposed would naturally create great apprehension; and in the remarks he (Mr. Gore) had to make, he would carefully guard against saying one word that could convey anything but his respect for those gentlemen with whom—it was his misfortune—he differed. Similar changes in the history of every country had been attended with similar expressions of doubt, dismay, and dissatisfaction. A remarkable instance of that kind occurred at the time when Spain, in 1765, having at last been convinced of the ill effects of her past policy, proposed a total alteration in the fiscal laws relating to the intercourse between the mother country and the colonies. All cried out against it, and loudly predicted ruin and disaster. In a short time the new system was found to work advantageously, and in the end the merchants of Cadiz, who had been the most strenuous in their opposition, were the most prominent in their mutual congratulations on the new state of affairs. A train of events, identical in their character, marked the introduction in England, in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, of turnpike roads; the possessors of property round London declared they would be ruined; but when their entreaties were neglected and the roads were made, the benefits of the alteration were experienced, and since had been fully acknowledged (hear, hear). It was, none would deny, a most important point to be mentioned as to the way in which the new bill would affect the poor (hear), and as to the proportion likely to exist between prices and wages. In reference to that portion of the inquiry the honourable gentleman read the following documents:—"Harvest of 1795 very deficient, price of wheat six guineas per quarter. Season of 1799 favourable, price fell to 56s. at end of year. In 1797 quality was bad quantity deficient. Harvest of 1798 only moderately abundant, consequently no store of grain to bring in in aid of deficient harvest of 1797; immediately after which the price rose to 92s. 7d. per quarter. In 1800 the quality was injured by excessive rains, and the quantity was so short that the average price of wheat, on the 1st of January, 1801, had advanced to 139s. per quarter. Before the harvest of 1801 was secured, the price of wheat in the London market reached 180s. per quarter, and the quarter loaf was, for four weeks, as high as 1s. 10½d." It was curious (continued Mr. Gore) to observe how intimate a relation existed between the prices of food and the number of marriages (cries of hear, hear). "The falling off in the numbers, observable in 1794, 1800, and 1801, was in each year very marked in its character. The harvest of 1801 was moderately abundant, and as, in addition to the home produce, the importation of wheat, under the stimulus of a bounty, had been very large, the price fell, in the latter part of this year, to less than half what it had been before the harvest. In 1802 the crops, although not very abundant, yielded enough, with a small importation, for our wants, and prices became still more moderate. The number of marriages in these two years, according to the registers, was 90,396 in 1802, and 94,379 in 1804. In March, 1804, the average price of wheat was as low as 49s. 6d. per quarter; but the harvest in that year was far from being good, and towards Christmas the price was double what it had been nine months before; the price continued high until the result of the harvest of 1805 could be known. This proving more favourable, and a considerable quantity of foreign grain having been imported, prices again receded, but not extensively. The number of marriages in 1804 and 1805 again showed the restraining effect in this respect of high prices, having been 85,738 and 79,586 respectively." All these facts and statistics went to show that the country flourished in the greatest degree when there was the greatest abundance, combined with cheapness, of food. He had supported the Corn Law as it then existed, because he had looked upon it as the law best suited to the circumstances; but he had since seen reason to doubt, and even deny that it had been productive of the good which, in adopting it, was contemplated; and he could not see how such a good could be better secured than by the measure for which he now intended to give his vote (hear, hear). It had been said of the right honourable gentleman, the member for South Wilts (Mr. Sidney Herbert), by the honourable member for Shrewsbury (Mr. D'Israeli), that he was responsible for the state of the labouring population in that county. He (Mr. Gore) was bound to say that he did not believe the agricultural interest or the agricultural labourers had a better friend than the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary-at-War; and he spoke from a knowledge of the past as to the kind feeling shown by him to all on his property (loud cries of Hear, hear). With regard to the assertion that the Corn Law had worked well, it was for the advocates of the law to reconcile this assertion with the fact, that under its operation the farmer had to sustain a progressive fall in the price throughout not less than five successive years, from 75s. till it got down to 36s. On the occurrence of the first season following, of marked deficiency, the public obtained no relief till the aggregate averages of the six weeks had attained in September 73s. 2d., when suddenly, in a single week, 1,513,113 quarters of wheat and wheat-meal were liberated, at the low duty of 1s. per quarter. The price declined in four weeks from 77s. to 61s. 10d., so that whereas the previous rise was for the benefit of the wealthier farmers, who had been enabled to hold their stocks of the crop of 1837 to the last, the subsequent fall was to the detriment of the numerous class of small farmers, who, having by that time got in their crops in all the divisions of the land south of the Humber, were threshing out, and, as usual, bringing the earliest supplies to market. Therefore, he thought it was an error to suppose that the Corn Law had worked to the advantage of any class of farmers but the wealthier farmers. What had been the effect of the Corn Law upon other interests? There was a sudden demand for shipping; freights rose; the ship-owners got large profits: but in a moment prices fell, and down fell the profits of the shipowners. The effect of the law, and of a sudden demand for corn, was mischievous upon capital, as well as upon the interests of shipowners. He was inclined to agree with a remark of the honourable and learned member for Bath, that there would not be any sudden influx of corn into this country. He thought that the hopes on one side and the fears on the other were equally exaggerated (hear, hear, hear). This was a question which affected not only agriculture, but commerce and national industry. He had the authority not only of Bishop Watson, Mr. Horner, Lord Wallace, but of a statesman, second to none in experience, knowledge, and attachment to the constitution; he alluded to Lord Grenville, who in the debate upon the East India Charter, in 1813, said—"Those who understand, as your lordships do, the real nature of commerce, and the true principles of its wise administration, will know that all its interests are interwoven; all its branches inseparably connected. It is the union, not of commerce with Government, but of commerce with commerce, that a provident legislation will respect. Numerous are the commercial enterprises which would be of small benefit if limited to the direct intercourse of one country with another, but which, by intermediate or subsequent transactions, in other markets and in distant regions, became highly advantageous both to private and national interests. For the encouragement of such hopes no moment was ever yet more favourable. The barrier of prejudices shaken, the spirit of monopoly is rapidly giving way to juster principles of commercial legislation, and the change of public opinion in this country is seconded by the great revolutions of the world." These were the opinions of Lord Grenville, than whom no man was more sincerely attached to the constitution of this land; so that, if this question is to be decided by authority—though he gave no weight to authorities, as the question must be determined by experience; but if authority were required, there could be none of greater weight. For the reason he had stated he should give his decided and cordial support to the measure of her Majesty's Government. He believed that the measure was framed upon sound principles; he thought it calculated to promote all the great interests of this great empire. It did not swell any one interest into unnatural proportions, but it preserved the symmetry of the whole. He thought that the prosperity of the country rested not upon the enactments of the statute-book, but the energy and enterprise of the people, inspired by free institutions and guarded by equal laws. Looking to these considerations, he had no fear of competition with other countries; and, under the present measure, he believed that all the great interests of the country would receive benefit; and looking beyond the interests of this island, and to the distant shores to which our commerce extends, he thought that this measure, to which he gave his cordial support, would benefit the whole human race (hear, hear, hear). He would not support the measure if he thought it had been yielded to agitation or anything like fear. Such a motive he considered to be unworthy of him and of the house. Whilst dissenting from other members upon this question, he honoured and admired their firmness; and if they thought it for the welfare of the country that the Corn Laws should be maintained, they were bound to support it; and whilst he differed from them, he honoured and admired their conduct. He rested the question upon higher ground—upon its intrinsic merits; for if it could not bear investigation, let it be rejected. He hoped that the house, in conformity with the prayer with which it auspicated their proceedings, would come to a conclusion upon this question divested of all party feeling and private affection, and would decide according to what they thought would best promote the welfare, the greatness, the glory, and the prosperity of this great empire, and the happiness of the millions subject to our sway (hear, hear).

Mr. FITZGERALD was prepared to support the measure proposed by her Majesty's Government. Wishing to secure the weal of his unfortunate country, and to avert the awful consequences that might arise from the deficiency of food in Ireland, he felt bound to take an early opportunity of urging on the attention of her Majesty's Government the expediency of carrying into speedy execution whatever measures they might deem necessary for its safety. The danger of famine and pestilence in that country was imminent, but he hoped it was not yet too late to prevent the horrors that might desolate that important portion of the empire. He had heard with no small gratification the speech of the right hon. baronet at the head of the government, delivered the other evening; and he must also express his gratification at the conduct announced by the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department, in taking measures to encourage employment in Ireland, and give to the poor the means of buying food, of which they stood in so much need. At the same time he must declare his conviction that measures of a far more comprehensive nature were required to remedy the evils afflicting the social state of Ireland. With respect to the great question before them, his ideas until he entered the house had been always on the side of perfect Free Trade, but now he was inclined to say that the measures brought forward by her Majesty's Government were the best that could be thought of at the present moment. It was but just that the agriculturists should have time to make those changes in the modes of cultivation which might become necessary; for this purpose three years would be required; and if sudden changes were made, it might be feared that they would produce injury rather than benefit. But he looked forward with pleasure and hope to the results of a system of perfect Free Trade, when established at the proper time. He must say that on the first announcement of the measures of Government, no small alarm had been created in Ireland; but having felt it his duty, as representing a large agricultural constituency, to consult the opinions and wishes of those whom he represented, he had found that on further deliberation the disposition to alarm was considerably diminished. He was enabled to state that, though apprehensions were entertained in different quarters that some temporary loss might ensue, there was a general inclination to support her Majesty's Government on a view of the whole case, bearing in mind that not the Corn Laws only must be altered, but a very extensive change must take place in the whole commercial policy of the British empire, from which a large increase of our commerce might reasonably be anticipated (hear, hear). Considering the great alterations which had been effected within the last few years, and the results that had followed them, it was impossible to avoid seeing that the principles on which those measures had proceeded must be carried further. In his opinion, the right hon. baronet deserved well of his country for the moral courage he had shown on this question, and had sufficiently proved that as minister of the empire he would have regard to the welfare of the whole community, rather than to the interests of any particular class.

Mr. LOCKHART expressed the deep regret which he felt at being compelled to vote against Sir R. Peel on this measure; but he had no choice, as he was convinced that it would sweep away all the small farmers of the country, and would throw out of cultivation all the inferior land in the country.

Sir G. CLERK was very unwilling to intrude himself on the attention of the house, but from the situation he had the honour to hold, he did not like to allow the discussion to close without offering some observations. The honourable member for Shrewsbury had said that the object of the measure proposed by ministers was twofold—to provide for emergency, and to construct a system. As to the existence of an emergency, he believed there was not a single member of that house who doubted it; nor did he think there was the least inclination to oppose the Government in carrying any measure for its relief. He denied altogether that there was anything like the construction of a new system of commercial policy in the measures now submitted to the house; they were nothing more than the carrying out of those principles on which the measures of 1842 were founded, as well as the measures proposed in 1824 by Mr. Huskisson, and supported by the right honourable baronet at an earlier period of his political career. At that time they had been told, as he supposed they would be told on the present occasion, that Government and Parliament had run wild on the subject of Free Trade. Some honourable members might suppose that Government was now proceeding more rapidly than they could approve of; but, reflecting on the course of policy followed by the various administrations of this country for the last twenty years, it could not be supposed that the measures now proposed constituted anything like an ovel system of commercial policy. With respect to the emergency spoken of, he wished it could be considered as one merely of a temporary nature; but hon. members looked too exclusively to the misery that might be experienced in Ireland in the course of the ensuing summer. We must look forward some distance, and ask ourselves how (the potato crop having failed) a substitute for this food was to be found in the years 1847 and 1848. We must bear in mind that not only was the crop of the present season destroyed, but it would be absolutely impossible to find a sufficient quantity of potatoes for the seed required in the cultivation of the soil (oh). Some hon. members seemed to doubt that; but perhaps they had not been in the house the other evening when a question was put to his right hon. friend at the head of the Government by the hon. member for Cocker-mouth (Mr. Aglionby). Now he (Sir G. Clerk) had made inquiries in his own neighbourhood, and he had received information that last spring the germs of the disease had been perceived; it had been admitted that sufficient care had not been taken in the selection of the seed, and it was to be feared that in some degree the infection had been communicated to the plants last year. Looking to the facts which had been ascertained, and to the report communicated to his right hon. friend by Professor Lindley, there was great reason to fear that the disease would not be confined to the present season, but that it might prevail next year to a great extent (hear, hear). But was it only for Ireland that an additional supply of food was to be provided? The potato formed an important portion of the food of the people both in England and Scotland, and the disease prevailed to a great extent in every part of the United Kingdom (hear, hear). He knew the difficulty of getting persons to agree as to the extent of this disease, but there was one test to which it might be brought which would afford evidence of that extent. The potato formed a great portion of the food of the poorer classes in London, and it became important to ascertain what had been and what now was the amount of the supply. He found that between the 1st of October, 1844, and the 14th of February, 1845, the supply of potatoes amounted, during the four months and a half, to 770,000 sacks. The supply from the 1st October last year to the 14th February in the present year was only 540,000 sacks, showing a falling off of nearly one-third in the supply of the metropolis alone (hear, hear). He believed that that might be taken as a fair index of the amount of deficiency in general, and if he had the means of ascertaining the supply of potatoes to Manchester, Birmingham, and other of our great manufacturing towns during the same period, he had no doubt that the deficiency would be found as great. Now what had been the effect of that deficiency of supply in London upon the price of the article? He found that in January, 1845, the price of potatoes in Covent Garden market had been from 50s. to 80s. per ton, and that in the January of the present year the price ranged from 80s. to 160s. per ton (hear, hear), showing that the lowest price now was equal to the highest in a former year, and the highest just double (hear, hear). Some prices might be found lower than these, but there were still cargoes of diseased potatoes brought in, which of course sold at an inferior rate; and indeed it often depended upon the state of the wind, so that a quick passage could be had from the Humber, whether the potatoes arrived in the market in sound condition or not. He had also been informed that the price of potatoes having placed them beyond the reach of the poorer classes, they were in many instances obliged to purchase bread; and that in districts chiefly inhabited by the poorer classes, those bakers who used to bake ten sacks of flour, now consumed eleven, being an increase of 10 per cent. on the consumption of flour. Looking, then, to the fact that the food of four millions of the inhabitants of Ireland was likely to be cut off for six months—that the supply in hand would not hold out until May, it was the duty of Government to take care that no impediment was thrown in the way of a supply of food (hear, hear). He must now advert to another remarkable feature. It was well known that although the harvest of last year had not been deficient in bulk upon an average, it had been deficient in weight, and an additional quantity of wheat was now required to produce a given quantity of flour (hear). Now at the same time that the potato disease had not been confined to Great Britain and Ireland, but had extended itself to the whole of the Continent, it was also known the harvest in Germany and other parts of Europe had failed to a great extent likewise. Holland and Belgium had then at once removed all impediments to the admission of food in their ports (hear, hear). At that time, when corn was so admitted into the ports of those countries free, it had been found that though the price of corn in the London markets was exceedingly high—though the best wheat was remaining stationary, or rather rising—the averages were moving in the opposite direction. That was in the month of November. The attention of the Government had been most anxiously directed to this difficulty. From week to week the accounts of the quantity of corn coming in were compared with the accounts of the quantities which week to week were re-exported. The amount so re-exported continued trifling; but had it increased, it would have been the bounden duty of Government to open the ports, as a means of preventing the corn from being taken away from this country to those which had removed the impediments upon its importation (hear, hear). Under such circumstances he thought he might assume that there would have been but one feeling in the house, that the government would have been justified in taking upon themselves the heavy and delicate responsibility of opening the ports and admitting corn (cheers). Then that took away from him (Sir G. Clerk) the main and chief article upon which he had ever been prepared to defend the sliding scale, because the great argument in favour of that scale had been that it contained within itself a self-adjusting principle, that the duty should fall with a rise in price, until it vanished altogether. If hon. gentlemen would refer to the arguments used in favour of the sliding scale in 1837, and having regard to the circumstances of the autumn of 1826, they would find we were now somewhat in a similar position in the autumn of 1845. The government of that day had been obliged to open the ports and suspend the law. They had come to Parliament and had asked for a bill of indemnity, and having made out a sufficient case the Parliament had passed their bill. Lord Liverpool had then remarked that this power of opening the ports was of so delicate a nature, that it required to be exercised with the greatest caution and care; that it might occasion loss and ruin to many unoffending and innocent persons; that it was a power which ought not to remain with the government; and that some alteration should be made to render it unnecessary. Mr. Canning had also shown most forcibly that the objection was not only applicable to the law of 1815, but to a fixed duty, however small. That had been the great argument in favour of a sliding scale, for in a commercial point of view it was liable to many palpable objections. Now here was a case in 1845, when the sliding scale had failed in this respect of adjusting the duty in proportion to the price (hear). The law not answering its purpose in this respect, it would have been the duty of Government, had they opened the ports, to do as Lord Liverpool had done in 1827, when he asked for indemnity, namely, be prepared to show how the existing law might be modified and altered, so as to prevent the recurrence of the evil. An honourable member had said that all that was required was an alteration in the mode of taking the averages; but upon this point he (Sir George Clerk) would rather take the opinion of a representative of the agricultural interest, the hon. member for Somersetshire, who had said that there was no middle course, and that he would rather have that proposed by the Government, if the Corn Laws were to be touched (no, no). The honourable member for Somersetshire was not now in his place, and it was possible he (Sir George Clerk) might be mistaken, but he had a distinct recollection of the hon. member saying that there was no middle course. The hon. member had followed shortly after the hon. member for Huntingdon, who thought there was a middle course open, but received so little encouragement from gentlemen who had cheered other parts of his speech, that he had not been induced to state to the house what that middle term was. But the hon. member for Somerset had stated his opinion that there was no middle course, but that if the existing Corn Law was to be disturbed, it was better that the measure of the Government should be adopted. Very few of the agricultural members had entered into details to show the nature and extent of the injury they apprehended; but the honourable member for Somersetshire had been an exception, for he had quoted some statistics, and had expressed his alarm at the quantity of corn likely to be brought from various parts of the world, and he particularised Russia; but it would be seen that in reality a very small portion of the crops in the southern provinces of that empire consisted of wheat, but were principally rye, hemp, and tobacco. During 10 years of deficient supply of corn at home we had been obliged to ransack the whole world, and even then wheat could only be had at a great price. If hon. members would look at the accounts on the table they would see that 120,000 quarters only was the average importation from the eastern provinces of Russia, and even in 1840, 317,000 quarters were all that could be had from that country. The Government availed themselves of the best information on this subject from our consular agents abroad; and it was a very remarkable fact, that nearly all of them concurred in the general result (hear, hear). From that information it appeared that the utmost quantity of wheat to be expected from Russia was 670,000 quarters, which was supposing that Great Britain obtained the whole surplus of the country; for some gentlemen argued as if Great Britain was the only country wanting wheat, whereas they would find that in reality a very small portion of the surplus of these corn-growing countries came into England, and that if we went into the market, other countries would compete with us, a consequence of which would be, that the price would be raised to the English level by such competition, instead of the English price being reduced to the Continental level. With respect to America, there was no greater mistake than to suppose that we were likely to receive very large supplies of corn from that country. By a reference to the papers, it would be seen that the United States exported in 1790 and 1796, when the population was four millions, a larger quantity of corn than she had ever done since, except in 1840, when the preceding harvest of 1839 had been remarkably abundant. But of the corn exported by America in that year a very small part found its way into the English markets. The population of America in 1840 was calculated at upwards of 17,000,000; the crop of wheat in that year was estimated at ten million quarters. Of those ten millions America exported 215,000 quarters in the shape of wheat, and 1,897,000 barrels of flour, which, subtracted from the total quantity, left only about four bushels per head for the consumption of their own population. Now, of that quantity exported from America only 620,000 barrels of flour came into England in 1840, the year in which there was the greatest importation. In the next year, 1841, America only exported 108,000 quarters of wheat and 1,500,000 barrels of flour; and in 1842 her exports were 140,000 quarters of wheat and 1,100,000 barrels of flour. The population of America was now about 20,000,000, and it was supposed that she could export little more than half the wheat she had sent out in the year 1840, still leaving a supply for her own people not greater than four bushels per head. With regard to the Western States of America, the fact of the matter was, they scarcely produced a sufficient supply of corn for their own population, and this being true—and that it was true was notorious to all who knew anything of the matter—it was clear that there could be nothing more absurd or untenable than the apprehension that from that quarter of the world, at all events, a supply of grain was to come in such exorbitant profusion as to glut the home-market (hear, hear). Indeed, he believed that the apprehension would be found to be totally without foundation as regarded the United States generally, for circumstanced as those States were at present, and as they were likely to continue, with respect to their commercial relations, and the vast calls which their own population made upon their home market, it was in the last degree improbable that they would ever be in a position to export corn in sufficient quantities to injure the growers of any other country whatsoever (hear, hear). The United States already supplied Brazil and the West India islands with flour; and as the demand for the article had enormously increased, and was still increasing in the latter countries since the emancipation of the slave population—which, by the way, was a most gratifying fact (hear, hear)—the possibility of our receiving any very considerable supply of corn from the other side of the Atlantic was rendered more and more unlikely (hear, hear). In fact, he regarded it as a contingency so extremely improbable, that it might fairly be considered as almost entirely out of the question (hear, hear). Nay, he viewed the matter in another aspect altogether—in an aspect which he must say he considered as a much more alarming one than that in which it was viewed by the hon. member for Somersetshire; for he could not help thinking that the actual state of things being such as he had described it to be, hon. gentlemen, instead of indulging in an apprehension that our home market would be inundated with foreign corn, ought to apply themselves to the consideration of this question, whether, if our population were to continue to progress at the ratio in which it had of late years been advancing, we should be enabled, even though the resources of Russia and some other countries were to be developed to the very utmost, to procure a sufficient supply of corn for our own people (hear)? Within the last five years there had been imported into this country nearly 10 millions of corn, being an average of two millions per annum, and surely there was no one who would be so venturesome as to allege that the people of this country had in that period been over-fed (hear, hear, and a laugh). Let the resources of Russia be developed to what extent they might, even though it were to that extent the prospect of which caused so much pain and alarm to the honourable member for Somersetshire, and let it be taken for granted, that during the 10 years preceding 1856, the importation of foreign corn was to average 3,000,000 quarters per annum, instead of 2,000,000 as heretofore—it would still be found that a larger supply had not been brought in than was absolutely necessary for the support of the people; and furthermore, it would be found (he ventured confidently to predict it) that notwithstanding all this vast importation, not one single acre of land would be thrown out of cultivation, but that on the contrary, agriculture would receive a fresh impetus, for that the demand upon the home market would still be very much greater than the supply. This was his deliberate predication, and he had not the slightest question but that the result would show that he was a true prophet. He could not understand how honourable members could hold a different opinion, if they would take the trouble of studying this question with attention. The experience of the last 30 years proved that the rate of population advanced more rapidly than the rate of production, and that this was true was attested by the fact that for a long series of years we had every year been compelled to increase our importations of foreign corn in proportion as we approached more closely to the present time; and bearing in mind this fact, the truth of which was not to be contested, he could not help thinking—no matter how vigorously, no matter how scientifically, the arts of agriculture might be applied to the enrichment of the soil—for the next ten years we would be compelled to import 3,000,000 of quarters of corn annually instead of two (hear, hear). It was a favourite argument with honourable gentlemen who were averse to the repeal of the Corn Laws, that the sliding scale had this merit at least, that it prevented, or at all events materially checked, the fluctuation of the market; but he denied that there were the slightest grounds for attributing any such virtue to the system (hear). The fact was, it had never had any such merit (hear). The fluctuation of the market had been considerably greater under the sliding scale than it was in the period intervening between the years 1786 and 1792—the period when the corn trade was not trammelled by any restrictions whatsoever (hear, hear). This, he considered, a very valuable fact, and one highly interesting for the purposes of this discussion. The honourable member for Sunderland, when expatiating on the probability of our being subjected to an inundation of foreign corn, had spoken of the facilities for speculating in that article, and had alluded to the circumstance of his having himself in the year 1837 imported into this country a quantity of foreign corn at so small a cost as 25s. per quarter. He (Sir G. Clerk) had no doubt that the fact was just as the hon. member had stated it, but it was capable of a very easy and natural explanation. Look at the state of the corn trade at home and abroad in the year '37 (hear, hear). During the years '34, '35, and '36 we had a succession of good harvests, and consequently imported little or nothing. In the month of August '37, it was ascertained that the crop on the Continent was an excellent one, and the crop in England was likewise very abundant, for the summer had everywhere been warm and genial. The consequence was that all the markets here and on the Continent were well stocked. He held in his hand an authentic document, prepared at the period to which he alluded (August, 1837), and by a reference to it he found that at that time the Hamburg market was so low that corn had fallen to a price varying from 22s. 4d. to 29s. 4d. Now he could very well conceive that the honourable member, if inclined to speculate at all, might have done so in this manner. He might have purchased a small parcel of corn, of a very inferior description indeed, at 22s. 4d. or thereabouts, and after paying 2s. 6d. for freight, nothing was more natural than that he might have had the article for the cost he specified; but would the honourable member tell the house that this was a thing that could be done every, or indeed to a very great extent, in any year (hear, hear)? Mark what a revolution took place in the corn market the very next year. The crop on the Continent, in 1838, was an average one, but it was the reverse of abundant in England, the summer having been cold and moist. The fact that the English people had not been blessed with a very rich harvest soon became widely circulated, and the consequence was that in the month of August, 1838, wheat rose at Hamburg from 22s. 4d. to 63s. 9d., and freight from 2s. 6d. to 6s. 9d. (hear, hear). The honourable member for Sunderland had not given the house to understand that in the year 1838 he imported any corn at 25s. per quarter (hear). He would have found it rather a difficult matter for his speculative mind. The honourable member for Shrewsbury had argued that the rule of commerce was that in proportion as the demand for an article increased the price fell, but he (Sir G. Clerk) contended that the history of commerce proved that the contrary fact was usually realised, and in attestation of the truth of this assertion he would beg to call the honourable member's attention to this fact—that at Canton the price of tea had, at no very remote period, been higher than in the year 1834, notwithstanding that the demand was considerably greater. The price had since been reduced to the consumer, but the fact was not to be attributed to the increase in the demand. The honourable member for Shrewsbury had referred to the cotton trade as also affording an illustration of the truth of his doctrine, that, according as the demand for an article increased, the price fell; and he had instanced the fact that, in certain parts of the United States, cotton might now be had for three cents a pound. This statement, however, should be received with caution. He (Sir G. Clerk) believed that cotton of a very inferior quality, and designed for the purposes of seed, might be sold for that sum. He was given to understand that in New Orleans cotton of that description might be had for three cents per pound; but the latest commercial advices that we had received from New Orleans showed that good cotton, so far from being sold there for that sum, fetched so high a price as from 6½ to 9 cents per pound (hear, hear). This was the actual price of the article at the present time in New Orleans. It was very possible that owing to a stagnation of trade, or some other of those unfortunate casualties to which all branches of commerce were subject, a fall in the price in the article might have taken place in 1837, but that fall was only of a temporary character, and the indisputable fact was that so far from our manufacturers being able to purchase cotton at three cents per pound, they were obliged to pay a price for it ranging from 6½ to 9 cents per pound. And there was no knowing what price it might yet attain; for there could be no doubt but that the merchants at New Orleans were narrowly watching the policy England was now about to adopt, and would model their own policy accordingly (hear, hear). The doctrines of the honourable member for Shrewsbury, he had no hesitation in saying, were totally untenable, and would not endure one moment's investigation. The mind of the honourable member appeared to be tortured by the most dreadful apprehension of coming evil; but the event would prove there was no ground whatever for such apprehensions. Alarm would always be excited whenever it was proposed to make any change, even the most trivial, in the commercial policy of this country (hear, hear, hear). In the year 1787, when Mr. Pitt first brought forward his proposition to regulate the importation of corn from Ireland, the Scotch agriculturists were in an agony of alarm, and predicted that the corn trade and the agricultural interests generally of Scotland would be irretrievably ruined; but he was proud and happy to say that, notwithstanding this gloomy prophecy, in no part of the United Kingdom had the science of agriculture been prosecuted with more signal success than in Scotland, nor did he know of any portion of the empire in which there had been a greater increase of rents to landlords since 1787. He ventured to predict that results equally happy would follow from the adoption of the measures now in contemplation; but let not the house be surprised at finding that apprehension and alarm existed in certain parts. As far back as the year 1820 a petition was presented to that house from some of the most eminent merchants in London, praying for the removal of those protective restrictions which cramped the energies of trade and commerce. The Government of Lord Liverpool, in the year 1824, acted on these recommendations, and brought in various measures with a view to the mitigation of the prohibitory system; but it was a notorious fact that, with respect to every one of these mitigatory measures, the same alarm was manifested, and the same gloomy forebodings were indulged in. At that time the amount of the protective duty on linen was not very great; but when it was proposed to reduce it, the Irish members rose with the utmost indignation, and declared that the reduction would be the absolute destruction of the Irish manufactures. He well remembered that the hon. member for Londonderry expressly declared that if the contemplated reduction were to be carried into effect, the linen and cambric trade of Ireland would be irretrievably ruined. Such was the prediction of the member for Londonderry; but had the house forgotten the statement made by the right hon. baronet at the head of the government, in the course of his masterly speech of that day week (hear, hear), by which he showed, on the authority of some of the most eminent linen manufacturers residing in the neighbourhood of Belfast, that their prosperity dated from the year 1826, and that notwithstanding the removal of protection, they had been able not only to compete with France, but to send their fabrics in enormous quantities to the remotest countries of the world, and especially to the United States (hear, hear)? So much for the linen trade (hear). His (Sir G. Clerk's) right hon. friend (Sir R. Peel), in the course of his speech, had summed all up in this way—"We reduced a great number of these things; we made further deductions in 1842; and now I call upon any member (hear, hear, from the Opposition)—I call upon any person, who is connected with trade, to show us where it had suffered injury by the reduction" (cheers from the Opposition). That challenge then remained unanswered (renewed cheers). At last the hon. member for Birmingham took the field, and he referred to the article of spelter or zinc. He (Sir G. Clerk) had heard with great astonishment the declaration of the hon. member, that the zinc trade had suffered from the change that had taken place, but he confessed he could not find that out from his statement. He said when the price of zinc was 75*l.* a ton, the duty was 45*l.* a ton.

Mr. MUNTZ: Oh, no; I beg your pardon.

Sir GEORGE CLERK would take it at 50*l.* a ton; the duty was as high as 50*l.* a ton, and the price of the article was 75*l.* That duty was gradually reduced, and last year they took off the duty. He appealed to the knowledge of every member of the house whether the manufacture of zinc was not one of the most recent origin, and it was only within a few years the means were discovered of rendering zinc malleable and readily converting it to any useful purpose. Formerly they were depending on that zinc that was used for the mixing of copper as an alloy for making brass. The description of spelter or zinc found in the country was so brittle that it could not be converted into those articles into which zinc was now manufactured. It was the foreign zinc that was susceptible of being made malleable. Large mines were discovered in the Prussian provinces, and large quantities of that zinc had been brought here, and by the admission of that zinc, an entirely new branch of manufactures was established (hear, hear, hear, from the opposition). By that means employment was given to many hundreds of persons, whereas if the prohibitory duties had been maintained, the proprietors of those inconsiderable mines from which the inferior quality of zinc was procured might have retained the price of 75*l.* per ton, and that zinc might have been used for the manufacture of brass, but then the country would have been deprived of the means of manufacturing those zinc articles (hear, hear). The honourable member wound up his statement by this assertion:—He said zinc was now 50*l.* per ton, and that it was not worth any man's while to work up that zinc, for every article of it, with trifling exceptions, was brought from abroad. Now what was the fact? they had last year a statement of the duties on every article, the duty on manufactured spelter was 10 per cent., and the whole value of the article brought in was 5*l.*, and the duty was 10*s.* 6*d.* (hear). Now what had been the profits of the zinc manufacture in this country? He need go back only a few years, for the manufacture of zinc was but recently introduced. In the years 1843 and 1844 the quantity of zinc imported was 10,000 tons, and of that between five and six thousand tons were exported to India and China, and 4,000 tons were retained to be worked up in manufactures in this country. In the last year 12,000 tons were imported, and of that 2,000 only were exported and 10,000 tons were worked up into manufactures (loud cheers). By means of that manufacture, a very useful and valuable article could be obtained at a moderate price, and employment was given to a great number of persons (hear, hear). The hon. member for Birmingham ought from his position to be well acquainted with this subject, but yet he said that the measures of the Government were productive of injury (hear, hear). He (Sir G. Clerk) would next refer to the observations of the honourable member for Shrewsbury. His right honourable friend (Sir Robert Peel) had said, that so far from the silk trade being injured by the reduction of duty, the quantity of raw silk imported had more than doubled since the restriction was taken off. No, said the hon. member for Shrewsbury, for the right honourable baronet has taken into his calculation waste silk and thrown silk. The honourable member for Shrewsbury said that they had nothing to do with them, and he then stated, that 20 years ago, in the last year of protection, the quantity of raw silk introduced was 4,010,000 lbs. Now, he (Sir G. Clerk) found that the silk imported in that year stood thus:—raw silk imported, 3,414,520; waste silk, 133,257; thrown silk, 462,731; making about 4,011,000, the quantity of silk which was stated by him to have been imported in 1824 included waste and thrown silks (hear, hear). That was the quantity imported in 1824, and in 1844 the raw silk imported was 4,021,000; waste silk, 707,850; thrown silk, 410,358; making about 6,000,000 (hear, hear). The hon. member, when he made a statement of figures, was bound in both cases to take the same items, for he came down there to make a business speech, throwing aside all those sallies with which he amused the house on former occasions (hear, hear, and a laugh). The hon. member said he would take the year 1824, the last year of protection. In the month of February in that year the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced to the house certain plans, including a proposition for the reduction of duty on raw silk, and the removal of the prohibition on the manufacture. An objection was taken to the introduction of the silk manufacture, but there was only one feeling in the house as to the propriety of immediately taking the duty off raw silk. On the 7th of March the house agreed to the resolution, and on the 25th of March, in that year, the duty was taken off. Therefore, it was perfectly clear that the subject had engrossed the attention of the house in former years. The only true criterion to be taken in a thing of that sort was to take an average, and to see what was the effect of Free Trade, and what was the effect of protection and high duty. Let them compare the import of raw silk prior to 1824 with what it was subsequent to that period. For ten years previous to 1824 the average was 1,524,000. For ten years, from 1825 to 1834 inclusive, the average was three million pounds per annum, instead of one million five hundred thousand as before; and taking ten years from 1836 to 1845 inclusive, gave him an average of 3,865,000 as compared with 1,500,000, presenting an increase of 150 per cent. The result, therefore, was, to increase the silk manufactures of this country to the extent he had mentioned, and, instead of throwing any persons out of employment, they had given employment to a great number of silk weavers and other persons engaged in the silk trade by the removal of that duty (cheers from the Opposition). The honourable member said he was for Free Trade, as he understood Free Trade. He was for a free interchange of the commodities of different countries. He desired, he said, that they should interchange their commodities on the same terms with France and America as they were willing to interchange with them, but, said he, there are hostile tariffs against us. With reference to this observation, he (Sir G. Clerk) would remind him that this change was proposed to be made, not with reference to its effect upon foreign countries, but for the benefit of the community of England. If they required those articles which were produced in other countries, were they to deprive the people of this country of the use of them, because some foreign nations said they would not have their articles (hear, hear)? Russia, he said, had a prohibitory tariff, and would not take our articles while facilities were given for the introduction of Russian tallow into this country. But the fact was, that the people of this country would not buy the Russian tallow except they wanted it (hear). It certainly must be a matter of regret that the countries from which they imported so largely so many articles necessary for the interests of this country should persevere in having prohibitory tariffs (hear, hear). They should hope, however, that those other countries, not only from their example, but also from experience, would see that the most efficient means of increasing the revenue would be by having a moderate duty substituted for prohibition (cheers). The honourable member had said that without diplomacy they would get nothing from France; that they might reduce their duties as much as they pleased, but that it would not produce any advantage for the manufacturers of this country. Let them see what was the experience of the last twenty years, during which they had reduced the duties on articles the produce of France as well as other countries. They had within that period reduced the duty on French silk and gloves, on French wines and cambrics, clover seed, kid skins, &c.; and the exports from this country to France greatly exceeded what they were when the prohibitory duties were in force (hear). In 1830 they amounted to 475,000; in 1831, 602,000; in 1832, 674,000; in 1833, 848,000; in 1834, 1,116,000; in 1835, 1,450,000; in 1836, 1,591,000; in 1837, 1,643,000; in 1838, 2,214,000; in 1839, 2,298,000; in 1840, 2,378,000; in 1841, 2,902,000; in 1842, 3,193,000; in 1843, 2,534,000 (hear, hear). It was not confined to any description of article, but included nearly all the manufactured articles the produce of this country. He had endeavoured by reference to past experience to show that they had no reason to think that the changes which were now proposed would be attended with calamitous consequences. He had endeavoured to deal with the statement of the hon. member for Shrewsbury, and he trusted that by simply stating those figures, he had shown that he was in every particular mistaken (hear, hear, hear). The honourable member said that he was in favour of Free Trade, provided that it could be got by diplomacy. He said it was the duty of the Minister of this country to see that he did not give any advantage to a foreign country without an equivalent, and, above all, that nothing should be done which would, in the slightest degree, lessen the preponderance of the landed interest. He (Sir G. Clerk) was as anxious as any one that the proper influence of the landlords and the landed interest should be upheld; but if the hon. member meant by this, that it was to depend on the maintenance and continuance of the present Corn Laws, he would only say, that he could not agree to such a principle; and he did not believe that such an argument was for the advantage of the landed interest (hear, hear). He believed that it would be a most dangerous argument to put forward, that the Corn Laws must be kept up for the purpose of keeping up the influence of the landed interest (hear, hear). A statement had often been made to this effect on the other side, and it had been said that the Corn Laws had been adhered to for the purpose of benefiting the landlords. This was an argument or assertion which he had always hitherto indignantly repudiated; and he certainly conceived the assumption of the honourable member for Shrewsbury as objectionable, and the argument which he had used, if adopted, would lead to the most dangerous consequences (hear, hear). This was the only meaning which he could attach to the language of the honourable member, and he as a landed proprietor disclaimed it altogether. He thought that the only just argument that could be used by the landed interest in favour of the Corn Laws, was that the maintenance of these laws was not exclusively for their interest, but for the interests of all classes of the community (hear, hear, hear). He felt that he had already trespassed too long on the attention of the house (hear, hear). In conclusion, he was ready to admit that he did not entertain the same opinions as to the effect of the repeal of these laws which he formerly did (cheers from the protectionists). He would only ask honourable members to bestow the same pains to make themselves masters of the subject as he had done, and that they would disabuse their minds as to the effect of these laws (hear, hear). Honourable gentlemen opposed to this measure were in the habit of saying that the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government gave his opinion in 1839 and 1840 in favour of these laws, and had given the best argument that could be used for their maintenance, and that they intended to rely upon such arguments; experience, however, had since convinced his right honourable friend that he could not depend upon these arguments. He therefore thought honourable gentlemen should seek for some new arguments (hear, hear). He hoped that those honourable gentlemen who had formed opinions on the subject would state them, and give reasons for the conduct which they intended to pursue (cheers from the protectionists). He put it to honourable gentlemen whether they would not best consult the interest of the parties they represented in that house, by at once assenting to the settlement of this question (hear, hear); the settlement of which, it was admitted on all hands, could not be long postponed (hear, hear, and no). He put it to them to agree to accept a measure which was best adapted to promote the social, commercial, and political relations of the country, and calculated to promote the permanent well-being and best interests of all classes of the community (loud cheers).

Mr. MUNTZ entered into an explanation of his arguments respecting the zinc and spelter trade, which was at last cut short by the interference of the Speaker.

Mr. LIDDELL said that Sir G. Clerk had made one or two of the boldest assertions in his speech which it had ever been his fortune to hear, even from the Treasury benches. If there had been no change in the policy of Government, why was Lord J. Russell on the Opposition and not on the Ministerial benches? and why, from a sensitive sense of honour, had Lord Lincoln gone before his constituents to run the risk of being rejected by them? Sir G. Clerk had then told the opponents of the present measure that they ought to look out for some arguments against it. They had not occasion to look far; for they had only to turn to Sir George's own past speeches against the Corn Laws to find plenty of arguments against it. Passing without further comment from Sir G. Clerk's speech, which he considered as a mere rechauffé of Sir R. Peel's, he proceeded to discuss that of Sir R. Peel himself, and controverted the statements of Sir R. Peel with respect to the silk trade, and to show that he had not ventured to withdraw protection altogether from it, although he proposed to withdraw it entirely from the corn trade. He next reviewed Sir Robert's observations on the timber trade, denounced the proposed reductions on the timber duties as most injurious to the shipping interest, and then stated at considerable length the claim of the shipowners to protection. He passed from that topic to a consideration of the effects which the policy of the Government would produce upon our colonial trade, arguing that the great exertions made to foster a trade in corn between this country and our colonies in Canada and in South Australia were now completely thrown away. He approved the proposed change in the law of settlement as a great boon to the agricultural interest, and an act of justice to the labouring artisan; but concluded by claiming for the shipowner and the agriculturist the protection which they had long enjoyed, and by declaring that so long as he had a seat in the House of Commons, he would endeavour to maintain that protection, and would oppose all such hazardous experiments as the present.

Mr. HUTT, who was heard very imperfectly at the commencement of his speech, in consequence of a great number of members leaving the house, was understood to say that he remembered with particular satisfaction having had to present a petition from a number of shipowners, in which they advanced opinions counter to those stated in the petition which his honourable friend had presented, and approving of the policy which had been enunciated by the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government. He begged the house to notice the way in which his hon. friend proposed to place the British shipowners on an equal footing with the Prussian shipowner. His hon. friend said that we were to maintain the shipping interest by making the materials for ship-building dear. The consequence of our protection of British colonial timber had been that the colonist selected the worst species of timber, which was known as American timber, to send to England, while they sent their best timber to the United States. We were only able, therefore, to get good timber from the Baltic. He trusted that the house would take a more liberal view of this question, and that they would cordially estimate the views of the right hon. gentleman for diminishing the duty on good ship-building timber. Upon the general subject he might be permitted to say that he did not wish to enter into any discussion as to the political consistency of the right honourable gentleman and his Government, but he must observe, that if the hon. gentlemen opposite thought that the conduct of the right honourable gentleman was deserving of censure, they would do right to adopt the recommendation of the honourable member for Finsbury, and bring the question before the house in the shape of a motion of want of confidence. He (Mr. Hutt) certainly should not support them in that motion; but it would be a far more regular proceeding than to introduce personal grievances and party animosities into the discussion of a great commercial question. He confessed he could not understand the conduct of honourable gentlemen opposite. They agreed to the Canada Corn Bill, they assented to the tariff of 1842, yet when the larger measure of 1845 was brought forward, which was a legitimate consequence of the tariff of 1842, they talked of their own virtue and of the treachery of the right honourable baronet. For his (Mr. Hutt's) own part, he thought that the right hon. baronet had greater reason to complain of them. It had been maintained that we should be obliged to pay gold for the additional grain which we should import from foreign countries when this measure had passed. Now, he asserted on the other hand, that foreigners would not require that we should give them gold for their corn. But even if they did, we might still carry on a trade with them advantageously. The only trade that we carried on with China for years was a trade of this description. We took our dollars to Canton, and exchanged them for teas and silks. As to the fear of taking bullion away from this country, his firm belief was, that we had only to repeal the Corn Laws, and the operation of distributing the precious metals over the world would become as regular as the trade in any other commodity. Hon. gentlemen opposite prided themselves on being Conservatives. Now they might depend on it nothing was so dangerous and revolutionary as grievances that came home to the bosoms of all men of intelligence. The measure of the Government was, in the best meaning of the word, a Conservative measure; and if they meant to vindicate their character for Conservatism, honourable gentlemen opposite would gladly support it (hear, hear).

Captain FITZHARRIS repeated the trite invectives of his party against Sir R. Peel's inconsistency on the subject of the Corn Laws. He condemned the present proposition of the Government, and regretted that we were about to lose our place among the nations of Europe, in order to become a great shop for the benefit of the whole world.

Mr. M. MILNES was not inclined to take the harsh view of Sir R. Peel's conduct which had been taken by many of his friends, when he recollected how many great men had modified their opinions upon the subject (Mr. D'Israeli and Mr. Colquhoun for instance) of the Corn Laws. Looking, however, at the past commercial measures of Sir R. Peel and his Government, he could not consider the present project as a legitimate deduction from them. It was not, therefore, from any feeling of confidence either in Sir R. Peel or his government that he gave his support to it, but because he felt that it was the only course which he could pursue consistently with the opinions which he had formerly held, and which he still continued to hold on the subject of the Corn Laws. The question then before the house was, not whether it would be satisfied with a modified protection, but whether it would adhere to the principle of protection in all the force of the Central Association in Bond-street. To that principle he could not assent, and therefore he must vote for the original motion.

On the motion of Lord INGESTRE the debate was again adjourned.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE.—TUESDAY.

The debate was resumed by

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL, who after briefly noticing some discrepancies among the opponents of the measure, proceeded to discuss the merits of the question before the house, and to explain the course he intended to pursue. He was not ashamed to acknowledge that his opinions had undergone a considerable change within the last few months. On several occasions he had supported propositions brought forward by the hon. member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. Villiers) with a view to the adoption of a moderate fixed duty, which then seemed to him the best mode of settling the question, at least for many years. He now frankly avowed that in his opinion the best course for the agricultural and all other interests was to enact the speedy and total abolition of duties on the import of food. His individual opinions were of little importance, but as he represented a large constituency he might perhaps be allowed to state his reasons for the change his opinions had undergone. He would first advert to the origin of the recent and prevailing alarm in Ireland. In the middle of October the disease in the potato crop showed itself extensively, and in the latter end of that month an expectation was general that an opening of the ports and a perfectly free importation of grain would be ordered by the Queen in council. It was not, however, until ministers met, and the proposition of the right hon. baronet was unfortunately rejected, that a cry was got up—a cry of a most strange character. That cry was that the threatened danger had been exaggerated for party purposes, that the alarm of famine was, in fact, a party alarm, in order to bring into office the noble lord the member for London and his adherents. Even the high character and moderate views of the Duke of Leinster did not secure him and others of the Mansion-house committee from the imputation that they were anxious and unscrupulous partisans of the Whigs. The effect was most disastrous, for many men who until then were ready to press upon Government the necessity of taking steps, to join in subscriptions for the importation of foreign food, began honestly to doubt as to the reality and extent of the evil. He must make one honourable exception—the Protestant clergy; they never doubted—they never joined in the cry; on the contrary, they gave statements of the disease in their districts which were unbiased and unexaggerated, acting from that pure motive of charity and benevolence which had raised their characters so high, even among those who were opposed to them in faith (cheers). What was the state of Ireland now? Descriptions had been given on former nights by the first Minister of the Crown, confirmed by facts adduced by the hon. and learned member for Cork, but the Recorder of Dublin had, nevertheless, maintained that a system of gross exaggeration on the subject prevailed. If such were the truth, why had he not, as his duty required, pointed out the exaggerations. He had not brought forward a particle of evidence, he had shrunk from the proof; and he (Mr. J. O'Connell) begged to tell him and the house, that boldness of assertion would not pass for proof (cheers from Col. Conolly). He hoped that the hon. and gallant member who cheered the observation would also bear it in mind (hear). The truth was, that the danger in Ireland was most imminent. Some had contended that it was only a temporary emergency, and that a temporary emergency ought to be met by a temporary remedy (hear, hear, hear). But there was every reason to fear that the emergency was not temporary, that the crop of next year would be infected, and that the disease might be permanent. If, however, it were certain that the crop and harvest next year would be abundant, still it ought to be remembered that there was no security against the return of the disorder (hear, hear). That consideration had much tended to produce the change that had taken place in his opinions; for he had asked himself this question:—Why are the people of Ireland to be dependent on an article of food so peculiarly liable to disorder and failure? It was peculiarly liable, first, because it was a root, and it was often impossible to know that it was infected; and next, because the disease was a new one, and little, if at all, understood. The conclusion to which he came was that the sooner all laws restricting the importation of the food of the people were repealed, the better for all classes of the community. He wished, therefore, that the proposal of the right hon. baronet had been to do away with the Corn Laws at once; and if he (Mr. M. J. O'Connell) supported the motion as it stood, it was only because it seemed under all circumstances the most effectual and speedy means of putting an end to an evil. Why, he would ask, had potatoes become the almost universal food of the peasantry in Ireland, and the general food of the lower orders in the south of England? The great, he did not say the sole, cause was, the high price of bread-corn. Fifty or sixty years ago, the use of potatoes was by no means so common in Ireland: in some of the more remote districts, oatmeal was nearly as much employed for food as in Scotland. The high price of bread-corn had constantly tended to make the great body of his fellow countrymen dependent for subsistence on this most precarious article. He felt it his duty to do all in his power to render a supply of more nutritious food accessible to the working classes. The house had, however, been told that the repeal of the Corn Laws would be injurious to the lower orders, especially in Ireland; and it was urged that the present system was mainly valuable to labourers and tenant farmers. That they were so valuable might, in his opinion, be answered in a single word; and that word was—Ireland. Had the Corn Laws been of service to the tenant farmers there? Look at the destitution among the working classes of Ireland. The truth was that the Corn Laws were of no value to the labouring classes. It was admitted that improvements must be made in agriculture to meet the change, and he defied any man to show that such improvements would not necessarily give additional employment to the working classes; and the consequence of additional employment would be increased comfort and amelioration of condition. As to the tenant farmers, he begged honourable members to bear in mind that profit did not always depend upon price; that the profits of the tenant farmer might be higher even if the price of corn were lower. Comparing the last three years with the three years preceding 1842, it was obvious that a comparatively low price was more profitable. The tenant farmers had been in a better condition during the last three years, when corn was cheap, than in the previous three years, when corn was dear. Much, of course, depended upon the prosperity of the consumers—the prosperity of the home market—the manufacturers. The very circumstance of the increase of population in the empire, which was most likely to continue, would of itself afford security against any considerable fall of price. The experience of the past had taught him to distrust the predictions of ruin in which the alarmists dealt whenever a change of system was proposed; and the Vice-President of the Board of Trade (Sir G. Clerk) had alluded to some of those predictions last night. One of them respected the introduction of swine when the tariff was introduced in 1842. It had been calculated by some of the alarmists that no fewer than three millions and a half of swine would be imported, but the number really brought into the country had been ridiculously small. The prophecies of these gentlemen reminded him of the prophecies of a certain lady of old; it was decreed that she should prophesy truly, and not be believed; but of the Corn Law alarmists it seemed to be determined that they should prophesy falsely, but find people foolish enough to trust them (cheers and laughter). The hon. member went on to read an extract from a recent copy of the Dublin Evening Mail respecting the number of sheep sold and remaining unsold at Ballynasloe fair in 1842, 1843, and 1844, showing a regular increase both in number and price. He hoped, therefore, that farmers would be governed by experience, and not allow themselves to become the victim of a panic. The right hon. member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere), when in office in 1840, had brought in a bill to allow the introduction into Ireland of foreign flour upon the same terms as into England. It was opposed by some members of the present Government; and Sir J. E. Tennant, in a speech crammed with statistics, proved to demonstration, as was thought and said by some, that the millers of Ireland would be ruined if the measure passed. In 1842 the right hon. baronet altered the Corn Laws, and among his alterations was one by which foreign flour might be introduced into Ireland exactly on the terms proposed two years before by the right hon. member for Taunton. It was, of course, supported by the opposition side of the house, though not without some taunts against ministers for silently adopting in office a scheme they had resisted in opposition, and what had been the result? The result was, that in spite of this bill, which was to ruin the millers of Ireland, the importations of flour into this country from Ireland had constantly and most importantly augmented.

In 1843	773,463 "
In 1844	839,567 "
In 1845	1,422,370 "

Thus this ruined interest in the course of four years had quadrupled the amount of its importations of flour into England (cheers). How had the arguments on this subject been met? Scraps from newspapers and centos from Hansard afforded no grounds for debating a great national question. The Recorder for Dublin, quoting Lord Mansfield, had said that the worst of precedents were established from the best motives; but the agricultural interest, if they could learn anything, must have learnt since 1829 that the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government would never consent to sacrifice national objects to party consistency (cheers). They were, therefore, forewarned of the present crisis; but, nevertheless, they had placed him again at their head, knowing that, under like circumstances, he would not act in the like way. They had thus set a bad precedent from the best motives, and they must now expect to find it used against themselves. What had happened only last year on the subject of the grant to Maynooth? Hon. members on the other side of the house supported the proposition, because it was introduced by the right hon. baronet, though they would have opposed it had it been brought forward by the noble lord the member for London. After that, what right had they to attack the right hon. baronet for his conduct upon this question? Did they wish to set the precedent again? There was no doubt that when this debate was over, they would again become the humble servants of the right honourable baronet (cries of "no, no," answered by cheers). In 1829, musquam tuta fides was the exclamation; yet they had restored to him all their confidence: again musquam tuta fides would be the cry, and again they would submit themselves to his mercy (cheers and laughter). What could they do without him (hear, hear)? Whom could they put in his place (hear, hear)? Lists of new sets of ministers had been circulated, but they only seemed worthy of the satirical pages of the admirable Punch. On this point he might quote to the House a passage from the posthumous pamphlet of the Rev. Sidney Smith:—"And let me beg of my dear Ultras not to imagine that they can survive for a single minute without Sir Robert—that they could form an Ultra-Tory Administration. Is there a Chartist in Great Britain who would not, upon the first intimation of such an attempt, order a new suit of clothes, and call upon the milkman and baker for an extended credit? Is there a political reasoner who would not come out of his hole with a new constitution?" After reading the words of so eminent a man, he was unwilling to add anything of his own, since it must appear to vast disadvantage; but he would ask whether there was a bear on the Stock Exchange who would not realise large profits under such a minister, or a stockholder who would not be a sufferer? If he (Mr. M. J. O'Connell) wished to see great changes accomplished, his earnest desire would be that the right honourable baronet should be thwarted, and that his present adversaries should be compelled to form a ministry of their own (laughter and cheers). In his speech a few nights ago, the honourable member for Northampton (Mr. S. O'Brien) had had recourse to a fallacy which ran through all he said: it was when he talked of protection as valuable to the working classes. He assumed that the existing laws afforded them real protection; but he (Mr. M. J. O'Connell) supported the present measure because he felt convinced that that, and that only, would afford them real and effectual protection. It would protect them against extravagantly high prices—against scarcity of food—against a reduction of wages—against want of employment—against, in short, all the evils incident to the present system. It was very well for agriculturists to talk of their anxiety for the welfare of the lower orders, but true philanthropists were those who by unshackling commerce gave industry employment (hear, hear). It was far better that the industry and energy of our own country should walk forth in its own strength, than that they should be supported by legislation in an enfeebled and rickety existence (cheers). He did not believe that the labouring classes would ever again call for such protection as they had enjoyed under the Corn Laws—not even the stentorian voice of the honourable member for Knaresborough (Mr. Ferrand) would be able to raise that cry among them. If they did, it could only be in the same spirit that the graphic wit of a former age described the ignorant crowd as exclaiming, "Give us back our eleven days!" If any man had eloquence to reverse in the nineteenth the folly of the eighteenth century, it must be some such overpowering orator as the individual to whom he had alluded (cheers and laughter). For these reasons he supported Free Trade and free imports, which he believed essentially the same: he believed the cause he advocated just and righteous, and that formed not the least of the reasons which would induce him to give the measure before the house, not a lukewarm and a grudging, but a zealous and a cordial support (cheers).

Colonel CONOLLY agreed with Mr. Shaw that the failure of the potato crop in Ireland had been greatly exaggerated. Admitting, however, the accuracy of those representations, still the measure before the house would be of little service, inasmuch as for a present calamity it offered nothing but at best a dilatory relief. He predicted that the greatest misery would follow the adoption of the proposal, and he should, therefore, give it his opposition.

Lord INGESTRE called upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain why he retained his seat for the University of Cambridge, after a change of opinion as complete as that which, in 1829, induced Sir Robert Peel to vacate the representation of the sister university. He condemned the measure before the house as likely to prejudice every interest of the country, and as inconsistent with the former policy of Government, and should therefore offer it his opposition.

Mr. TRELAWNY was surprised at the extraordinary contrast between the letter of the noble lord the member for Newark and his recent speech. Why, from reading that letter, he concluded the noble lord would of course support the Government, or that, if he did not, his only reason for opposing the Government would seem to be because he agreed with it (a laugh). He believed the noble lord to be a most benevolent person—he believed him possessed of considerable ability; and yet his conduct was difficult to reconcile with these qualities. He admitted the frightful state of famine and disease expected to prevail in Ireland. He admitted the necessity of taking measures to diminish these dreadful visitations. He went even so far as to agree that the right hon. baronet ought to have opened the ports, even in the autumn, when the danger was far less imminent; and yet now he was coolly going to vote that the consideration of these pressing matters should be put off till this day six months (hear). And why? Because he had some objections to the political morality of a particular individual, whose fault, if it were one, was to be the cause of the suffering of millions of men (hear, hear). Why, the true course for the noble lord to pursue, and the protectionists with whom he acts, though he does not agree with them, would be to move an amendment that the operation of the Corn Law be immediately suspended. The honourable member for Shrewsbury had certainly made a clever speech. He made an observation which the members of the Free Trade party must candidly admit to be just; viz., that while the League had been for years professing to educate the masses, it had really been educating itself (hear, hear). Yes, but it was educated at last. The honourable member had said that they had constantly been shifting their grounds. True; but so had the protectionists. Feeling that it would not do any longer to fight under so exclusive a banner as that of protection to agriculture, they had chosen a new one in protection to native industry. But how could native industry be protected in the case of articles already competing, spite of heavy duties, with foreign goods in foreign markets? A bounty on exports would be necessary if protectionists would be consistent. Were they prepared for that? And if all were protected, what good was protection? The fact is, the honourable member's argument fails, as he would do as a commercial minister. Having so thoroughly and so enviably succeeded in a different line, it was a pity to see him frittering away his reputation in aspiring to the office of a statesman (a laugh). The protectionist party had argued this question throughout as if it was simply a Corn Law question, and as if it was certain agriculture would be injured. Now he demurred to that. Supposing the agriculturists lost something by the removal of duty on corn, would they gain nothing by reductions on other articles? The right hon. baronet's proposal was not a corn measure, but a new tariff. Of what use was the duty on maize to farmers? How did they benefit from the duty on brandy—on manufactured goods—on sugar? Again, different classes of farmers were protected, to each other's injury. Of what use was the wheat duty to the grass farmer? Of what use was protection on cheese, butter, and cattle to the wheat farmer? He (Mr. Trevelyan) said that honourable members on the protectionist side of the house were a little unfair towards the Government on the subject of their change of opinion. They wholly forgot the tremendous responsibility which any body of men must be under who assumed to feed twenty-four millions of men (hear, hear). It was easy for those who were out of office, who had none of its cares and anxieties, who were not responsible for the preservation of internal peace, to talk loudly about principle, and the obligation of a rigid adherence to it (hear, hear). Then, besides being a little unfair, they were rather more illogical, because, after all, what did the quotations from Hansard and taunts of inconsistency mean? What was their real force and virtue? Why, simply this, that when a man had taken up an opinion, he was bound to be fanatical in maintaining it, although he conscientiously believed it to be unsound. Hon. members seemed to be indignant that Government no longer assisted them in finding plausible defences of an untenable position; or was it that they could not forgive the implied reproach to themselves of the earlier conformity of others to rational opinions (hear, hear)? If Government were supposed to have been guilty of deliberate falsehood in respect to the time of their asserted change of opinion, why did not some protectionist manfully say what he really meant? Was it like the characteristic courage of the English gentleman to rest content with insinuations? If, when a man at the head of a party deliberately announced an opinion and subsequently changed it, he was bound, according to what hon. members seemed to imply, to affect adherence to it for party purposes, then the moral of all this was, that he who commenced by error should end in dissimulation—the very thing with which protectionists reproached Government. For his part, he thought there had been very adequate cause for the recent changes of opinion. In the abstract, the question had long been settled, and a very narrow induction was necessary, by way of experimental confirmation, when the abstract conclusion was in accordance with the practical (hear, hear). Besides, if government were not convinced by any other evidence of the soundness of Free Trade principles when applied in practice, could they have higher grounds of conviction than were to be found in the speeches of Protectionists during the last few months—speeches which the Times had been malicious enough to report in full (a laugh)? Could any sane man have remained Protectionist who had carefully waded through the heavy dig of the speeches of England's dukes? Why, had they not been by fortune raised far above want, their speeches could not but have raised the opinion that they were retained by the League! Indeed, so effectively had the dukes argued in favour of Free Trade in their sneeringly-ironical defence of protection, that when he saw them, inflated and floating about in the public gaze, over the agricultural districts, he concluded as a matter of course that they were the pilot-balloons which were testing the current of popular opinion in favour of Free Trade (a laugh). But seriously, some friend to aristocrats should warn those who stand highest among the peers of the ultimate effects of their recent conduct. There was more involved in this question than a mere duty on a commodity. The successful maintenance of a one-sided law by a one-sided Parliament would involve a great constitutional question, and new agitation would commence, even amongst the middle classes, for further measures of organic change. If the existing form of Government could be made permanently subservient to the purposes of a class, a practical demonstration would be afforded of an inherent vice in the constitution itself. And no great grievance in this country would long want its League or Repeal Association; and, in fact, such bodies seemed necessary as indications of symptoms not otherwise easily detected in time (hear, hear). It was a pity to see an ancient aristocracy putting its power, its usefulness, its very existence on an issue of rent. If it were to fall, one would have wished to give it credit for a Roman wish, to fall with decency. Could the country afford to place all its intellect on the shelf?—at the present time especially. Were they so sure of peace abroad? Were their Oregon negotiations in so satisfactory a state? Was there no war in India? Could the country afford to trust itself to “all the talents” of all the dukes (hear, hear)? If Government had all along deceived their party, how very innocent must the party have been to be so easily and so long taken in?—or was it that they were compelled to put up with the arch deceiver, because they had no men fit to form a cabinet? Was it that they could not pardon the head of the Government that he had so long been a standing reproach to their incapacity? They might depend upon it, even now, that something more was required to make a statesman besides successful vituperation (hear, hear). He could have wished the change in the Corn Laws had been immediate and final. He thought it a pity that for three long years the duty should remain a monument reminding the people of the melancholy infatuation of an agricultural Parliament. His constituents held the same opinion, as they indicated in a petition presented a few days since. Much had been said of unconstitutional practices. Was it constitutional for a body of men to come into this house as the avowed delegates of one interest? Agricultural gentlemen always talked (ay, and acted—witness their resignations) as if representation were particular, not general—as if they were returned to carry out a great agricultural job, instead of benefiting the nation as a whole. They fell into this error particularly when they accused Government of betraying the landed interest. For his part, he could only say that if the Government ever pledged itself to support, exclusively, the landed interest, such a pledge was void for its immorality (hear, hear). But it was said the League was unconstitutional. He flatly denied it, though he was not a member. In what respect did it differ from other associations for bringing about elections, and which Conservatives in most countries belonged to, except in superior wealth, strength, numbers—and even, perhaps, intellect? and to what cause were its power and wealth due but to the existence of a grievance of such magnitude as to produce such results? The League did not buy votes. It merely indicated in what way the unrepresented intelligence of the country (unrepresented, because county members seemed awfully delegates of a class) might constitutionally influence opinion at future elections. Was it immoral to buy small estates in order to obtain a stake in the country? Immoral to indicate how the desire might be gratified? Besides, did it not raise the price of land and benefit landlords? A learned judge was reported to have pronounced the desire legitimate and commendable (hear). He (Mr. Trevelyan) believed he was correct in stating that some of the leaders of the Protectionists had talked of fighting the League with its own weapons. A noble individual was reported to have talked of opposing the Government factiously if necessary. Let peers take counsel, before they set such examples. It were wise in those, whose hereditary duty it was jealously to watch over the constitution, to beware how they impotently bragged of their power to prostitute its functions to purposes which could not but seem suspicious to the uninstructed (hear, hear). He knew it was denied that rents were the objects of the Corn Law. But if it were said that food for the people was its real end, then how could men be induced to believe that the best method of keeping corn in was to pass a law to keep it out? This kind of argument would no longer do in towns, however it might go down with farmers' clubs and labourers' friend societies. In conclusion, he should only add that he should support the Government, only protesting against the incompleteness and want of finality of the measure they proposed (cheers).

Mr. PACKE was sorry to differ from an administration to which, during the time he had been in Parliament, he had given his warmest support; but he felt bound to vote against a measure which he believed would in its consequences be ruinous to the country. He did not mean to impute to the right hon. bart. any impure motives in bringing it forward. He gave the right hon. baronet credit for the sincerest conviction of its necessity. It was said that the policy of Government was based on public opinion; but he believed there had never yet been a Parliament in England that was not in favour of protection. He recollected that upon one occasion, during the tenure of the power by the late administration, the honourable member for Montrose made a proposal more revolutionary in its tendencies than that of the noble lord the member for London, and his adherents. The honourable member then requested the Conservative members to walk out of the house, and allow him and his friends to settle the question with the noble lord. If honourable members opposite would now act on that suggestion, and walking out of the house, leave them (the Protectionists) to settle the question with the right honourable baronet, he believed the conclusion to which they would arrive would be much more satisfactory to the public (hear, hear, hear, and a laugh). The honourable member concluded by expressing his general disapprobation of the Government measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I fear, sir, I must begin the few observations I have to address to the house with that opening sentence which has marked other speeches already—that at this period of the debate, and after the discussion this subject has undergone, I cannot expect to offer anything to this house worthy of claiming much attention; and I can only assure the house, that under these circumstances I shall confine my observations within the narrowest limits which are possibly consistent with the discharge of the duty I have undertaken. As to the question itself, it might almost be unnecessary to enter into any argument upon it, after the ability with which the case has been met by my right honourable friend at the head of the Government, and by the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, in the course of this debate, who have left no part of the subject untouched, and no argument unrefuted (oh, oh, and cheers), and who established, beyond the power of contradiction (oh, oh), that the progress which had been made in the removal of restriction and the gradual relaxation in protective duties had in every instance been attended with benefit, and had in every instance produced permanent results on the comforts and happiness of the country. Before, however, I enter upon the question, I think it my duty to respond to a call which has been made upon me in the course of this debate by many honourable gentlemen (hear, hear), and distinctly to state the ground upon which I have acted in those transactions which have led to the situation in which we at present are placed (hear, hear). Some hon. gentlemen have supposed I differed from my colleagues on the question before the house—that I am prepared to support measures in the justice and propriety of which I do not concur; and it has been stated that upon the authority of conduct of mine, which has been alleged to have come to the information of some honourable members by means beyond the ordinary channels of information, they have grounded this opinion. I believe, however, that this opinion on their parts will, after the statement I am about to make, be pronounced as utterly delusive as the arguments they have adduced against the measure itself (oh, oh, and cheers). The course I have taken on this question I will simply and plainly state. In October a general apprehension prevailed as to the disease in the potato crop, which then generally extended through many parts of the country, and, therefore, on the 1st of November the Government assembled for the purpose of considering what measures it was proper to adopt under the circumstances in which the country was then placed. The house has already been informed by my right honourable friend that on that occasion he proposed to his colleagues two separate measures—either to open the ports by order in council, or to assemble Parliament immediately for the purpose of effecting that object by legislative enactment. Now, certainly, on both of these questions I differed from my right honourable friend. In the first place, I think in all cases that direct interposition of the Government, by an act of its own, with the execution of the law, is a hazardous and dangerous experiment, and one only to be justified by immediate, and urgent, and evident necessity. I could not then conceive that the state of Ireland required that immediate urgency of action, but might well remain to be dealt with by legislative enactment at a future period. I did express the opinion, therefore, that it was expedient by order in council to open the ports for the admission of foreign corn. In considering this question there was one point impossible to be put out of consideration—that we were not called only to decide on the suspension of the Corn Law, or on the occasion which rendered that step necessary, but it was also obvious that in dealing with that proposition

we look to the ultimate consequences of the course we were about to pursue; and I could not conceal from myself that the step we were taking must be viewed in connection with the abolition or abrogation of the Corn Law, which must be the necessary consequence of the suspension of the law (cheers). I know it has been stated by some honourable gentlemen that the suspension of the law did not entail any consequence whatever; but it was impossible for me to view the subject in that light. I know that in an antecedent period of history the ports have been opened, but the effects of this measure were always represented as injurious to trade and disadvantageous in itself, although such a course might be justified by the necessity of the case; and I always understood the benefit of the sliding scale, as argued in 1838, was this, that by self-operation it was adapted alike to periods of plenty and periods of scarcity, without the necessity for this Continental interference of the Government, which, on former occasions, had been found so inconvenient. And also I could not put out of my consideration, that on all the occasions we had to argue the benefits of the sliding scale in opposition to those of a fixed duty, the great point brought against the application of the fixed duty was, that when periods of difficulty and trial arose, it would be necessary to depart from the usual operation of the law, and to suspend it for the purpose of admitting foreign corn (hear, hear). The consideration therefore, that the consequence of a suspension of the law must necessarily be the abrogation of the law, was to my mind an additional argument, and a strong one, why that object should not be affected by an Order in Council. I did not consider that it would be fair, on a question of great public interest, involving great public consequences, and exciting strong feelings among a great body of the community, to pre-judge, by an act of the Government, the decision of Parliament as to what might be the ultimate measure necessary to be adopted (hear, hear). For these reasons, therefore, I gave my opinion against the admission of foreign corn into this country through the medium of an Order in Council (hear, hear, hear). But my right hon. friend at the head of the Government proposed an alternative (hear, hear). He suggested the immediate assembling of Parliament for the purpose of effecting the object of opening the ports by means of a legislative enactment. To that proposition I also offered an objection, but that objection rested on different grounds altogether. The proposition was submitted on the 1st of November. At that period no doubt the members of the Cabinet had, from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and other persons in high station, accounts of widely spread and serious apprehensions as to an extensive failure in the potato crop of Ireland (hear, hear). On the other hand, however, we had opinions resting on what was considered highly respectable authority, that the failure of the crop had not reached to that extent which was calculated to give any colour of truth to the alarm which appeared to be entertained in certain quarters (hear, hear). At that period, moreover, the potato crop in Ireland had not been generally dug, and there were as yet no means for ascertaining by actual experiment whether the apprehensions by which the public mind was disquieted were likely to lead to the extensive results which some persons were inclined to believe would be realised. I felt, therefore, that with this defective information as to the extent of the calamity which appeared to be coming upon Ireland, it was highly probable that there might be prevalent a doubt on the minds of a very large class, both inside and outside of this house with respect to the actual measure and extent of the disaster as might render it exceedingly unlikely that that general concurrence in the proposed measure of acting on the Corn Laws by the means of a legislative enactment would be obtained which was so essentially necessary to the securing successful results. I believed that it was highly desirable that time should be afforded for further investigation with a view to ascertain whether there were sufficient grounds for the apprehensions by which the country was beginning to be so seriously alarmed. I was anxious that it should be distinctly ascertained whether it was likely that these apprehensions would be realised, for I felt that in the event of our being able to show that the extent of the misfortune which impended over Ireland was anything like what we have now ascertained it to be, by authority which I regret to say admits not of a shadow of doubt—I say I felt that, in the event of our being able to lay the true state of affairs before the public, there could be little doubt of our being able to secure a more general concurrence in support of some measure for the immediate suspension and subsequent alteration of the Corn Laws than we could hope to command if we proceeded at once to the discussion of the subject while we were provided with information which, though unquestionably of an alarming character, was, notwithstanding, in many respects defective and incomplete. For these reasons I gave my voice against the assembling of Parliament. I may have been wrong, I may have committed an error of judgment, but I have no hesitation in asserting that I acted throughout in conformity with the dictates of my conscience. It appeared to me that the danger with which we had to deal was one the results of which could not be experienced at all events until an early period of the spring, and I confess I felt great anxiety that as large a number of honourable gentlemen as possible should be induced to concur in acknowledging the necessity of the case; for I felt that it was in the last degree desirable that the measures which we might deem to be necessary for the preservation of the country should be sanctioned by a very large proportion, indeed, of the members of this house, and supported unequivocally by public opinion out of doors. I, therefore, preferred delay in the commencement of our operations, that, when they were commenced, they might be carried with a weight and an authority which would put an end at once to cavil and opposition. I may be told that, in opposing the Order in Council, I displayed a want of that boldness which a minister ought to exhibit in dealing with great public emergencies (hear, hear). I may be told that I was wanting in that sagacity which ought to have enabled me to comprehend the actual extent of the calamity so long before it had approached (loud cries of hear, hear, from the Protectionist members). I may be told, also, that I was yet more deficient in a proper knowledge of the friends who sit at the same side of the house with me, for that I should have known that they would at once and unobtrusively have consented to the suspension of the Corn Laws if the question had been only put to them. I may, I say, have been in error in all these respects, but the error was only one of judgment. To my own conscience I stand acquitted of any higher offence; and I hesitate not to assert, that after the lapse of the period which has since intervened, and after calmly reflecting on the course I have taken, and the advice I have given, I cannot, on review of the entire transaction, bring myself to believe, that if the case were again to be presented to me in the shape in which it then stood, I would be justified in pursuing a different course of proceeding from that which I then adopted. After these differences in the Government, it was agreed to postpone the further consideration of the subject for a limited period, in order that more extensive information might be obtained. That further period did most unquestionably bring with it the strongest possible arguments to induce me to a change of opinion (hear). Many days did not elapse before we were in possession of the report of the commissioners who had been sent to Ireland, detailing with accuracy their views of what was the extent of the potato disease, and what the amount of the crop on which it was fairly possible to calculate with reference to next year. The statement contained in the report of these commissioners was confirmed by actual experience when the crop came to be dug out, and it was then put beyond all question that to such an extent had the potato plague spread, that in some districts of the country one-half of the crop was lost, in others one-third, in others three-fourths (hear, hear). Nor was this the entire extent of the calamity; for there was a general feeling, and one which I believe was completely warranted by the fact, that in some portions of Ireland the preservation of any part of the crop, however minute, depended altogether upon the wetness or fairness of the weather. When these facts were known, the case was relieved from its difficulties (hear, hear), and although I was well aware, and felt most deeply that the adoption by us of the course which my right hon. friend has now proposed to you would be attended by the dissolution of party connections, and that it would cause our separation from many of those with whom for many years it has been my pride to act, and whom, I trust, I may be still permitted to call my hon. friends—I say, although I felt that this must be the inevitable consequence of the measure, I also felt that there were imposed upon me, by my position as minister, other and higher duties which went beyond the feelings of party attachment; and being convinced that the alteration of the Corn Laws had now become a question of absolute necessity, I was prepared to give my opinion that under all the circumstances of the case those laws ought to undergo a change (hear, hear). At the same time, however, I felt that the change ought to be effected by others than myself and my friends in office; and extending this opinion, I most cordially concurred in the resignation of our charge into the hands of persons who, from their longer maintenance of the opinions which we then entertained, were better fitted to discharge the duty, and had perhaps a better chance of carrying the contemplated measure into operation (hear, hear). And here permit me to assure the house, with the most unaffected sincerity, that when I tendered her Majesty my resignation of office, I had not the remotest conception that I should have ever to deal with this question in any other capacity than as a private member of Parliament (hear). If any hon. gentleman should be inclined to question this assertion, I am prepared to sustain it by testimony which cannot be resisted. I am prepared to prove, by evidence of the most incontestable character, that when I resigned my office, the resumption of it at a subsequent period never entered into my contemplation (loud cries of hear, hear). But to resume—When it was discovered that the noble lord, the member for London, found it impossible to construct a cabinet with satisfaction to himself, the question again rose whether I should again decline to accept office in a Government of which my right honourable friend was to be the head. Sir, I know of no principle on which it would be possible to justify a refusal (hear). I had in the first instance doubted as to the exact time at which the great move should be taken, and as to the particular measure which ought to be proposed, but I had subsequently seen and learned quite sufficient to convince me of the necessity of an alteration in the Corn Laws, and I was perfectly prepared, as a private member, to give the sanction of my vote and opinion to that course of policy which, under all the circumstances of the case, I considered to be most conducive to the interests of the country (hear, hear). Therefore, being fully prepared to maintain in my private capacity the opinions which I now advocate as a minister, I felt that there was nothing against honour, dignity, or duty in my resumption of the situation which I at present occupy (hear). That is, in a few words, a brief history of the transaction as far as I am concerned (hear, hear, hear). I trust this explanation will satisfy my friend the honourable member for Newark; and that he will understand that, although I may have had doubts at first, as to the particular period at which, and the particular mode in which her Majesty's ministers ought to have introduced the measures which they considered necessary, I have come at length to the deliberate conclusion that I am best consulting the interests of the country by adopting the course which I am now pursuing. A noble lord, a friend of mine, who has spoken in the course of this debate, charges me with acting in a manner inconsistent with my duty in not tendering a resignation of my seat in Parliament to my constituents, and he calls on me to make some explanation of the fact that I still remain here as representative of the University of Cambridge (loud cries of hear, hear, hear). Now, sir, I think it right to state that the views I take of the duties of a representative differ very materially from those which have been expressed by the noble lord. I do not pretend to say that if honourable gentlemen, at the period of their election, think fit to pledge themselves under all conceivable circumstances to maintain particular laws, and to take stated particular views of certain specified questions, they may not take upon themselves an obligation which they are bound in all honour to redeem, and which renders it imperative on them to resign their seats if they see grounds for changing their opinions; but I do not consider that I am one of those who are in this position (hear, hear). In offering myself as a representative to my constituency, I may have stated to them in general terms my views on particular questions, if they happened to come under discussion; but I have reserved to myself, in the most unequivocal manner, the fullest right to adopt, in reference to every question that may be deliberated upon in this house, that course—whatever it may be—that course which in my conscience I believe to be most conducive to the general interests of the community; and however strongly an opposite course may be sanctioned by some great examples, however conformable it may be to the views of certain honourable gentlemen who pledged themselves at the hustings—I cannot admit that it is the duty of a representative who happens to act in opposition to the feelings of his constituents on a particular question, to make that difference the ground for tendering his resignation, or even for acquiescing in a demand that he should do so (hear, hear, hear). I gave no pledges whatever with respect to the Corn Laws on any of the occasions to which I addressed myself to my constituents (hear, hear). I never expressed any indications of that permanent and unqualified adherence to existing laws which some honourable members around me appear to have expressed when they were elected; and upon these grounds I think that I would be abdicating the character of a representative altogether—that I would be depriving myself of the capacity of voting for the community in questions affecting their interests, if I were, by my professions or my example, to give countenance to the idea that it is the duty of a representative, in differing from his constituents on any point, to forsake the trust that has been reposed in him. Thus much, sir, I have said in matters personal to myself. I have to apologise to the house for having trespassed at such length on their time and attention. It was painful to me to have occupied so much of their attention by matters having reference to myself; but I felt that I was called on to say something in explanation, and having done so, I now proceed to address myself to the consideration of the question more immediately before us. The question we have before us is one which, in my opinion, can be comprised within a very narrow compass. It is simply whether you will continue to progress in the course which for some years past you have pursued in the relaxation of protective duties, or whether you will be content, not merely to remain stationary where you are, but to retrograde on the path which, after full and mature consideration, you have adopted. I am well aware, that in the course of this debate many honourable members who have supported the Government up to this period in their relaxing policy, maintain that we have now arrived at that particular point in the withdrawal of protection from native industry at which it is essential that we should come to a stop (hear, hear, from Protectionist members). They contend that we ought not to advance beyond it, because we cannot do so without injuring interests which we ought to study to protect, and because they think that in remaining where we are, we are doing what they believe is just to all parties (hear, hear). But when I consider the arguments of some of my friends at this side of the house—when I hear one honourable member declare that as regards the Corn Laws he thinks they ought to be suspended at once, and when I find that that sentiment is cheered in such a manner as would seem to show that it met with very considerable approval—and when I hear other gentlemen, at my own side, admitting that the Corn Laws may be modified after a certain fashion—when I see that some honourable members come a step further, and some not quite so far on this question; when, I say, I see and hear all this, it appears to me that the great principle for which we are contending is conceded upon all hands; and I certainly think that those gentlemen will find it difficult to account for the reasons why, with such professions and admissions on their lips, they resist, as they are resisting, the motion now before the house (hear). I could have understood them if they proposed some modification of the Corn Laws, or if they were prepared with some amendment after getting into committee (hear, hear). That would have been a natural and rational course. That would have been the proper time and mode to consider the measure. But they have adopted the course which precludes all consideration whatsoever of that kind. Whatever they may be in words, in actions they are against us. They refuse as much to suspend as to abrogate the Corn Laws (hear, hear, and cheers). They have taken no steps from which any results can come, but to remain just as we are, without a remedy for the existing evil, which they admit to be great—without a remedy for a possible future evil which may be yet more dreadful, and without the means of making that progress in the course we have undertaken which is essential for the welfare of this country. Sir, in support of the views which the Government take in support of this question, we have appealed, and I think in the opinion of the country successfully appealed, to the results of experience, as attesting the progress which we have made in opulence and power since the protective system has been relaxed (hear, hear). That progress has been attempted to be denied by certain honourable members who are adverse to Free Trade. They have referred to figures and calculations in support of their position, that no beneficial consequences have resulted from the relaxation of the protective system; but I think I am warranted in saying, that these figures and calculations have proved an utter failure (cries of no, no, from the Ministerial benches). Well, I think they have. I think they have been most triumphantly overthrown by my friend the right hon. baronet the Vice-President of the Board of Trade (continued cries of no, no, from the Ministerial benches). The statement made by the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government was this, that it could not be shown that in the case of any one of all the articles affected by the recent reductions of the protective system, anything had resulted from the relaxation but increased activity to the trade and improvement to the industry of the country. This was the proposition that was advanced, and in refutation of it one honourable gentleman, the member for Birmingham, pointed to the article of spelter or zinc; but his friend the right hon. baronet, the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, met the assertions of the member for Birmingham, and settled spelter as easily as everything else (hear, and a laugh), for he showed that though the home manufacture of the article might have been injured, the relaxation of the protective duty led to the introduction of a foreign article, the manufacture of which opened a new source of industry, and afforded increased employ to a vast number of the poorer classes. A friend of mine yesterday evening thought it necessary to complain of the hardship which those Free Trade measures would inflict upon the shipping interests. He told us that whatever might be its effect upon other interests, the welfare of the shipping interest was inseparably identified with the preservation of the protective system; and he did not seem willing to admit that the shipowners had derived any benefit whatever from the relaxations that had already taken place, or that they were likely to realise any from the reductions now in contemplation. I must say, sir, as my right honourable friend at the head of the Government has already said, that this opposition to freedom of commercial intercourse on the part of the shipping interests is one which greatly excites my surprise (hear, hear). I should have thought that a system of commercial intercourse, which leads to a great increase of exports and imports, would have suggested itself to the mind of every thinking man as one calculated to increase the means by which these imports and exports were carried on, and that it would be as clear as sunlight, that in proportion as commercial intercourse extends, in the same proportion would the shipping interest be benefited—and that this benefit would also be realised, that in addition to abundant commerce in times of peace, we would have ample means of defensive or offensive hostility in the event of war. This I ever regarded as the natural result of free commercial intercourse, as far as the shipping interests were concerned; and I confess that no one could be more surprised than I at finding that opposition on the part of those interests was offered to the propositions of the Government. But I deny that the shipping interests have been injuriously affected by the relaxation of protective duties. I can prove the contrary to be the fact. In the year 1842, the tonnage of British vessels engaged in the foreign trade amounted to 2,600,000 tons. In the year 1845 it was 3,699,000 tons, showing an increase consequent on the relaxation of protection duties of one million of tons in that brief period (hear, hear). The hon. member for Durham insists that injurious effects are likely to result to the timber trade from the proposed measures; and he maintained that injury had resulted from the relaxations which had already taken place. But let us come to figures. Let us consider what has been the quantity of shipping engaged in the Baltic trade within the last few years. In the year 1842 the number of ships engaged in that trade was 3519; their tonnage was 613,809; in the year 1844 the number was 4424, and their tonnage 818,440 tons; showing an increase of 1000 ships, and 200,000 tons (hear, hear). My honourable friend has said that the increase of British shipping in the Baltic bears no proportion to the foreign ships that are engaged in the same trade, and therefore that the removal of the duty would throw into the hands of foreigners a greater extent of trade than we derived ourselves from the same source. I admit that that is the necessary consequence of the navigation law itself, which admits the foreigner to introduce, if he pleases, the produce of his country in the shipping of his own nation (hear). There is another reason for the increase of foreign carriage in the Baltic, which the measure before the house is calculated to remove; and if my honourable friend deems it expedient to give encouragement to British shipping in the Baltic, there is no means by which he can do it more effectually than by passing the measure now before the house (hear, hear). Sir, if the honourable gentleman had looked to the proportion of shipping employed in the conveyance of corn under the system of the Corn Laws, when the demand being sudden, it must come immediately from the country where the produce is, in the ships that are to be had on the spot, and cannot wait to be introduced in ships which come from this country, bringing out a cargo to bring back a cargo in return, if he looked to the disproportion in that particular branch of trade between the British and foreign shipping employed, he would see that he could not do anything to give a better chance of employment to British shipowners, than by passing the measure now before the house (cheers from the Opposition). It appears by the returns of corn-laden ships that pass through the sound, that there are 1138 foreign ships, and only 501 British—a disproportion exceeding that which prevailed in the ordinary course of trade, and only to be accounted for by the circumstance I have stated (hear, hear). Then, if my honourable friend wishes to restore the employment of British shipping, let him join with us in doing that which, by giving more freedom in commercial intercourse with those particular ports, and in an article which will not be suddenly sent for, but in a regular article of trade—let him join us in passing that measure, and his object will be accomplished (cheers from the Opposition). But then, said my honourable friend, this diminution of duty on Baltic timber will necessarily affect the shipping interests as regards your Canadian provinces, and tend to injure those provinces which you ought to protect. I will tell my hon. friend that in making that statement he falls into an error, which is not uncommon with those who argue strongly in favour of protection, in respect to commercial measures (hear). They think that an advantage on one side is sure to produce a disadvantage on the other, whereas the converse of the proposition is the fact; for by increasing the import of an article into a country, instead of inflicting an injury upon the home produce, you confer a benefit on it. I have already referred to the state of our trade in the Baltic, in 1842 and 1844, and now let us see what is the state of the shipping trade, in those years, in the British North American colonies. In 1842, 1550 ships were cleared out; in 1844, 2844 ships were cleared out, with a tonnage, in the former case of 540,000, and in the latter of 789,000 (hear, hear). Can there be any more conclusive evidence than this afforded, that the reduction of the duty on foreign commodities did not injuriously affect colonial trade, or the interests of the British shipowners connected with it (loud cheers from the Opposition). This does not rest on my statement alone. There was a committee sitting last year, in which this very question incidentally arose, and Mr. Chapman, a gentleman of extensive interest in the shipping trade, states the benefit the shipping interest derived from the operation of the tariff, of which, however, the success is doubted by some persons. Mr. Chapman was asked: "Is it not the fact that it is only since freights were not remunerative that the attention of shipowners has been directed to obtaining relief from any quarter they could?" He replied, "That of course naturally follows from the state of such dreadful depression as they have undergone, that they feel they have had nothing done for them; it is not only the light dues, but other burdens. The fact is, that until Sir R. Peel, by the new tariff, allowed us to get foreign provisions out of bond, the competition we had to maintain against foreigners was most unfair; that made a difference of 30 per cent. upon those provisions at once. Previously it was like a penalty hanging over us, and a premium to the foreigner. Has that relaxation of the law, by which vessels going abroad can get provision out of bond, been very useful to the shipping? Of the greatest possible consequence; it makes just the difference, I believe, between a loss or no loss upon sailing the ship, as they are obliged to do, because they are compelled to have apprentices, and the apprentices must be maintained: and the real fact is, that they often send ships to sea only to save themselves being out of pocket." My honourable friend's statement as to the injury effected by the late change, or likely to be effected by future changes, rests only on the opinions of individuals who embarked in the trade when ships were more costly than they are at present, and who now find it difficult to get that interest for their capital that they originally had every right to expect. I admit there are shipowners on whom the repeal of the duty on Baltic timber will have an injurious effect. The ships built before the reduction of duty were built at an enormously enhanced expense, in consequence of the charge which that duty imposed on them. It is quite clear that the men who have built ships of this expensive article find it difficult to compete with those who build their ships of the cheaper article; but if I may compare great things to small, they stand precisely in the same position as the innkeepers on the north road, who have suffered from the formation of railways (laughter). Another hon. member said, see the injury you are about to commit on Canada, to whom you gave the advantage of being on the same footing as the mother country. He says, has not Canada a right to complain that you are going to admit foreign corn? Now, sir, I stand up as highly as any man for the importance of preserving the colonial connection, and of doing everything for the colonies which is just and equitable and right, and likely to conduce to their benefit (hear, hear). But I say, sir, if in dealing with a colony you place its produce upon the same footing as you do the produce of your own country, they have no right to complain (cheers from the Opposition). If the Canadians complain that the advantages possessed by them are diminished, they stand in the same position as the mother country (hear, hear). They must share the inconvenience—if inconvenience there be—and I don't admit that inconvenience will exist—but they will have no right to complain of the course that has been taken (hear, hear). Now, sir, it has been a favourite argument with honourable gentlemen in discussing this question—and it is always a favourite mode of dealing with this subject when arguments cannot be readily adduced—to draw a picture of the extraordinary consequences that are likely to result from it. We are told, therefore, that if the proposed measure of Free Trade be adopted, you must have Free Trade in everything. You must have no duty upon tea—you must have no duty upon tobacco—you must have no duty upon various other commodities. Now, sir, I beg to state, that in adopting these principles of Free Trade, which are promulgated by the Government, I do not adopt the extreme opinion either on one side or the other; I admit that all duties, whether they are raised for the purpose of taxation or otherwise, are impediments upon trade. But when I advocate Free Trade, I put in my claim distinctly to retain the duties which are essential for revenue purposes—to retain those which are essential for the purpose of preserving public morals—to retain those which may be necessary occasionally for public safety; and in doing that I do not conceive that I am in the least degree departing from the legitimate application of the principle of Free Trade for a society constituted as ours is. I view freedom of trade as I do civil liberty, where the liberty of the individual must be subject to certain restraint. It is an exception to the general rule, one which it would be desirable to avoid, but one which it may be necessary to maintain on the very grounds I have stated, namely, for the purposes of revenue, national safety, or what is most important of all, for the purposes of national morality (hear). The argument of the present question has turned upon the probable effect that the repeal of the Corn Law is likely to have upon the agriculture of this country. It is said that by the introduction of foreign competition with the agriculture of this country, we are likely to be overwhelmed with foreign produce. We heard the question ably argued in the course of this debate, and I shall not repeat the arguments that have been used, but merely content myself with calling the attention of the house to two cases in which we have made the trial of what is the effect of restriction upon agriculture, and what is the effect of introducing competition with respect to agriculture; and from the result of those two experiments, with which the history of the country furnishes us, I can show in the strongest manner the advantage that competition creates in the country which adopts it. It is known that a considerable number of years since, in the reign of Charles II., the agricultural interest of this country entertained opinions very similar to those which have been professed by individuals connected with that interest at the present moment. They thought they were deeply affected by the importation of articles which entered into competition with those which they produced. At that time the object of alarm was Ireland (hear, hear), where labour was cheap, the soil fertile, the climate favourable, and it was apprehended that by admitting the produce of Ireland it would necessarily overwhelm the agricultural interests of this country (hear, hear). They conceived that it would affect the interests of the owners and proprietors of land; and, therefore, the Parliament of that day passed a law restricting the introduction of cattle from Ireland. Now, at that period, it was rather curious to observe the argument that was used. The historian tells us, that in the House of Commons "There was a great murmur rather than a complaint of the great damage the kingdom sustained from the importation of Irish cattle, which were bred there for nothing, and transported for little, and might well undersell all the cattle here, and from hence the breed of cattle would be totally given over, and thereby the land yield no rent proportionably to what it ever had done, and that this could only be remedied by a very strict Act of Parliament to forbid the importation. Very many members of several counties desired that these counties might not undergo any damage for the benefit of other individual places. They professed that these counties had no land bad enough to breed, and that their great traffic consisted in buying the cattle, making them fat, and upon this they paid their rent, and this appeared to be the case of many counties of England" (hear, hear). But the voices of those honourable gentlemen had little effect in the House of Commons, and the bill passed almost with universal assent, and was sent to the House of Lords (hear, hear). In the House of Lords all expedition was used in passing it, and, by a singular coincidence, the Duke of Buckingham headed those who favoured the bill (loud laughter). "In the Lords, a marvellous keen resolution appeared to use all expedition in passing it. The Duke of Buckingham appeared at the head of those who favoured the bill with a marvellous concernment, and at the same time appointed for the debate of it, contrary to his custom of coming into the house, indeed, of not rising till 11 o'clock, and seldom staying above a quarter of an hour except upon some business he concerned himself in, he was always present from the first thing in the morning, and stayed till the last at night, for the debate often held till four o'clock in the afternoon, and sometimes till candles were brought in. It was urged that, if the bill did not pass, all the rents in Ireland would rise in a vast proportion, and those in England fall as much." It was then said that if the bill did pass, the rents in Ireland would be raised, and the rents in England would fall; but seven years afterwards a distinguished man in this country, an ancestor of the noble lord opposite (Lord Palmerston) Sir W. Temple, in a letter to the Lord-Lieut. of Ireland, the Earl of Essex, dated Dublin, 1673, says: "When the pasture is open, land will be turned most to feed cattle, when shut, to sheep, as it is at present, though I am of opinion it cannot last, because this act seems to have been carried on rather by the interest of particular counties in England, than by that of the whole, which, in my opinion, must evidently be a loser by it. For first, the freight of all cattle that are brought over being in English vessels, was so much clear gain to England. The trade of hides and tallow, or else of leather, was mightily advanced in England. Where the Irish sell, there will they be sure to buy too, and all the foreign merchandise which they had before from Bristol, Chester, and London, they will have in time from Rouen, Amsterdam, Lisbon, and the Straits. As for the cause of the decay of rents in England, which was made the occasion of that act, that proceeded not from the importation of Irish cattle. Besides, the rents have been far from increasing since." Therefore it appeared that the bill which was passed to exclude the importation of cattle from Ireland, and to raise the rents of England, was proved, after seven years' experience, by one most capable of judging—by a man of admirable judgment, who was conversant with the interests of England and Ireland, to be an utter failure (cheers). It is perfectly well known that up to the period of the union, Ireland, in the importation of corn to this country, was treated as a foreign country. After that period, and when a free intercourse was established between this country and Ireland, the corn of Ireland was admitted to the markets of this country to compete with the corn grown by the agriculturists here. We must bear in mind that at that particular period, the population of England was something short of 11 millions of souls, and the quantity of corn raised in England was proportionate to the population which at that time existed. When Ireland was permitted to import to England, she rapidly sent in here large quantities of corn for the consumption of the people. To the amount of a million of quarters per annum for a few years was sent here towards the maintenance of a population of 11 millions, and it rose gradually, until ultimately it amounted to between three and four millions of quarters of corn sent into England. Now, if there be anything in the argument that agriculture is ruined by the importation of corn from a country where labour is cheap, and the land fertile, if those arguments have any weight when applied to foreign countries, why not have weight when applied to the admission into England at that period of corn from Ireland, which enjoyed all those particular advantages (hear, hear)? If England, with a population of 11 millions, could sustain the admission to this extent of agricultural produce from Ireland, not only without injury, but, as I will show you, to the great increase of her own produce and the improvement of agriculture, what fear have we now, when the whole population of the United Kingdom amounts to 27 millions, that any impartial importation from abroad can exceed—in proportion to the population—the quantity which was previously admitted from Ireland, or can produce effects on the agriculture of this country more prejudicial, or otherwise than beneficial—than that which the Irish importation produced (tremendous cheers from the Opposition)? Why it is from the very period of the union we may date the improvement of agriculture in this country (hear, hear). It was then that a stimulus was given to British exertion (hear, hear). We find that in the year subsequent to the admission of Irish corn, a greater number of enclosure bills were introduced into the house than at any period preceding or subsequent (hear, hear). They would find that the gentlemen of England paid more attention to the progress of agriculture, and that science was applied to effect agricultural improvements. They would find that the agriculturists of England were not injured by the corn imported from Ireland, but that agricultural prosperity was on the increase from year to year (hear, hear). Therefore, if in the limited field in which this large proportion of corn was introduced they experienced no sensible effect to the injury of agriculture; if, on the contrary, they found that the importation of Irish corn excited emulation and industry, and led to permanent improvements, how could it be argued that a similar introduction of corn from the Continent would produce those disastrous effects which honourable gentlemen said it would produce to the agricultural interests of this country (hear)? But there was another remarkable circumstance as to the corn produced in the two countries, Great Britain and Ireland (hear, hear). In which of the two countries was agriculture in the most advanced state, in England or in Ireland? No man, he believed, however attached to the sister country, but must admit that the deficiency in skill was extremely obvious to the latter country. The corn of Ireland had, notwithstanding, been brought into England in successful competition with the native produce of that article. In Ireland corn could be produced at a cheaper rate than in any country on the Continent, and the produce was so abundant that she required none from abroad. From want of competition, however, agriculture in that country remained in much the same state as when the English market was open in Irish corn. The fact of no foreign corn being imported into Ireland had been productive of much injury to agriculture in Ireland, while the circumstance of its being introduced here had proved beneficial to English agriculture (hear, hear). They were told that this measure would prove peculiarly injurious to the interests of Ireland; now, he did not believe there was any ground for such an assumption, but on the contrary, that it would produce the same result and the same effect as in this country; and so far from diminishing the value of property or the amount of employment to the poor, that it would increase both by the stimulus that would be given by intercourse and competition with foreign countries. He had no doubt that it would produce the same effect there as here, and would lead to the formation of manufacturing establishments there to meet the wants and afford employment to the people. It had been truly said that the best market for a country was the home market. If this was the case, then it was most desirable that the consumers should be in a state of comparative affluence, and certainly it was most desirable for the agriculturists that this should be the case, for their trade was necessarily confined to the home market. So far then from looking with jealousy on anything which would extend or promote our manufactures, they should regard it with satisfaction, as affording new means for giving employment to large numbers of the people, and making them prosperous consumers of agricultural produce. The agriculturists of all men should be the most anxious to extend and promote the well-being of those who were the consumers of that produce which they had to sell (hear, hear). He would confine himself to one other topic, which, however, was one which had formed the subject matter for a large portion of the present debate. He alluded to the charge of inconsistency in public men (cheers from the Protectionists). This formed a main staple with many honourable gentlemen, and whenever the word was used it did not fail to elicit cheers (hear, hear). He was as strong an advocate as any man for consistency of public conduct (laughter and cheers); but when they told him that consistency consisted in adhering to a law which seemed at variance with an altered state of society from time to time, and that that law particularly referred to the means of supply of food for the people of this country, but which, at the time at which it was enacted and subsequently might have been attended with advantages; and notwithstanding any changes that may have taken place in the circumstances of the country—notwithstanding the wants of the country and a deficiency in the supply of food, and other alterations, you place the plea of consistency on a ground which was not tenable (hear). So far, then, from consistency under such circumstances being commendable, you place it on a footing which, if adhered to, would damage the character of public men (cheers). Who was there, of the honourable gentlemen present, who had been consistent on the subject of the Corn Laws (hear, hear)? He knew of no public man, from Mr. Huskisson or Lord Brougham down to any other public man of the present day, who had had to deal with the question of the Corn Laws, who had not at some time or other changed his opinion on the subject (hear, hear, and laughter). But were honourable gentlemen themselves agreed that the adherence to protection and the maintenance of the Corn Laws for the future, were essential to public men being consistent? Even his honourable friend the member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Stafford O'Brien) has said in the course of his speech that the present duty on corn never could be regarded as permanent. He, therefore, was at variance on the subject with many honourable gentlemen round him (hear, hear). He would, however, ask his honourable friend when he thought the time would arrive when they could, with a regard to consistency, make an alteration in the present Corn Laws, or when they could abrogate them altogether (laughter and cries of "No"?). Why his honourable friend had said that the duty could not be regarded as permanent, and he alluded to the abrogation of the Corn Laws; he, therefore, was justified in asking when the period of time would come for a repeal of the duty on corn (hear, hear). Would his honourable friend show him a time when a repeal of the Corn Laws could be effected with less injury to any class of society, or when it would be better for the public interests than the present, or when an adherence to the present law could be less effectively maintained (hear, hear)? If he could do so, it was then merely a question of time. He thought, for one, that the present time was the most important to lay hold of for that purpose. It was notorious that there was great distress from the failure of one particular crop which afforded food for large numbers. There was not only the temporary danger which threatened from the failure of this crop, but they must look to the possible failure in future years which might lead to a degree of distress which would be attended with the most alarming consequences. He said this, although his noble friend the member for Staffordshire (Lord Ingestre), who had appeared there that night as the advocate of Mr. Chapman, of Isleworth, had produced a potato which he said had been grown from the seed of a diseased Irish potato ("No," from Lord Ingestre; "not an Irish potato." The observation excited some laughter). Well, at any rate the produce of a diseased potato which had been cultivated in a garden at Isleworth. This might be the case; but then other experiments had been carried on on a more extensive scale than those of Mr. Chapman, with a very different result, and many of those experiments had been carried on under the superintendence of eminent scientific men. He had seen accounts on this subject from North America, where the disease in potatoes had prevailed for three consecutive years. It was observed that in the first year the disease prevailed to a comparatively slight degree; in the second year it appeared in a more aggravated form; and in the present year the disease prevailed to as great an extent as it had in many parts of Ireland. The extent and continuance of this disease for a series of years might happen in this country as elsewhere; it was only safe then to provide beforehand for the emergency, in case this disease should continue in this country and Ireland, as in America, for a series of years (hear, hear). But this disease existed not merely in England, Ireland, and America, but it prevailed to a great extent in many parts of the Continent, and if it there continued, the demand for corn in those countries would necessarily increase, and we should not be able to obtain a supply of that article from those quarters for our rapidly increasing population, instead of having an inundation of corn, as many honourable gentlemen had supposed (hear, hear). He would ask, had honourable gentlemen looked to the altered state of things which had arisen from the increase of our population? The addition made to the number of the population of this country every year was such as would require from 100,000 to 200,000 acres to be taken into cultivation for wheat to meet the wants of the increased population. In such a state of things you must be able to add almost an additional county under cultivation every year. Did not such circumstances make it incumbent on them to make provision in time (hear, hear)? He had heard it asked by some honourable gentlemen why it was proposed to make this change in a season of prosperity. Would they, he would ask, wait until a time of distress and adversity, when the sufferings of the people would give rise to great dissatisfaction? Could they then expect to make a satisfactory arrangement in a time of pressure (hear, hear)? He therefore thought that the present was the time when the corn question should be settled, and by this means provide food for the increasing population of the country, and for the comfort of the people, and at the same time excite a spirit of enterprise and emulation which would overcome all difficulties (cheers). He regretted that many of his honourable friends should have felt called upon to express their opinions in such strong terms as to the conduct of the Government (hear, hear). He regretted that those towards whom he entertained feelings of such great respect should use expressions of hostility, not merely against the measure, but also against those from whom it emanated (hear, hear). He did not intend to retort expressions of severity on any honourable gentleman. The right honourable member for the university of Dublin, in his speech, which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) might be permitted to say was far more eloquent in the declamation and attack on his honourable friends of the Government than on the subject-matter of the debate, stated that it was the duty of an independent member of that house to maintain the opinion which he believed to be right and just on any subject, irrespective of consideration as to the man or men by whom it was brought forward. He agreed to the fullest extent as to this principle, and as to the right of a private member to form a judgment on any measure as to what was right, and to act accordingly; but surely the right honourable gentleman would go to the same extent as regarded the ministers of the Crown, and that they should be allowed to act upon the principles which they believed to be right, independent of those by whom their measures were opposed (cheers). He asked whether it was not to be open to them to concur in a course which they believed to be right, and whether they were not to be allowed to act on the same principle which the right honourable gentleman claimed for himself without bestowing on them harsh terms (hear, hear)? The terms used by the right honourable gentleman were unstable and infirm of purpose, of being guilty of inconsistency and tergiversation, and that they were guilty of cabinet juggling (laughter). When the right honourable gentleman used this term, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) felt more regret at it as it affected the character and reputation of the right honourable gentleman more than it could affect him (loud cries of hear, hear). The house had before them the distinct explanation of all that had passed (cries of hear, hear, and no)—the house had before them a declaration of the whole of the transactions which led to the resignation of the Government and their subsequent return to office, and he believed that there was not another member in the house besides his right honourable friend who was not satisfied that there was nothing but perfect openness in their resignations (cries of "oh, oh," from some of the protectionist members). There was no hesitation in the charge of juggling which the right honourable gentleman imputed to the Government, and the only regret which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) felt on the subject was, lest the public at large, when the speech of his right honourable friend was before them, should arrive at the conclusion that his right honourable friend had always formed those conclusions which would not become his high judicial situation and character (hear, hear). He was afraid to maintain the principle that the claims of public party must be regarded in spite of the public interests. This would be the description of consistency of which he should be guilty if he had followed the course suggested by his honourable friends, and it was a consistency on which he would not act (hear, hear). If he were guilty of political tergiversation, if he had turned his back upon his friends, it was only to protect them against their own want of foresight (loud cries of "oh, oh," and cheers). Seeing the storm ahead, seeing the effect already produced in Ireland, seeing the effect which might be produced in this country, he was not ashamed of the course that he had taken, although he might be charged with abandoning party connections (hear, hear). Although he should painfully feel the loss of those who had supported the same line of politics as himself, he should always look back with satisfaction and pride to his former connection with them, and when their judgment had time to cool (laughter), and they had seen the danger with which the country was threatened, not merely in distant prospect, but in a proximate degree, they would then see the propriety of making the alteration in the laws for the supply of food; and he knew enough of them to believe that, however inconsistent they might think the change of opinion that had taken place in respect to public matters to be, there was not one of them who would not admit that he was wrong now in the view which he had taken of the subject, and that he would regret not having supported this measure, the success of which he would then be satisfied was essential to the best interests of this country (loud cheers).

Mr. FERRAND repeated the imputation he had, on a previous evening, made upon the petitions presented by Lord Morpeth, from the West Riding, in favour of Free Trade. He then detailed, in his own peculiar style, the proceedings of his recent electioneering crusade into Yorkshire. Having concluded this narrative, he proceeded to catechise, in a pretty severe manner, various members who had severed themselves from the protectionist party, reading extracts from their former speeches amid most uproarious mirth. The next topic was the cruelties practised under the factory system. That system he declared had a natural tendency to produce murder, and every other kind of atrocity. He also charged the Poor Law Commissioners with having conspired with the manufacturers to kidnap the agricultural labourers under promise of "a land flowing with milk and honey." Having made some allusions to the tenure upon which he held his seat in Parliament, he concluded by announcing that he should do his duty.

On the motion of Dr. BOWRING, the debate was then adjourned till Thursday.

PETITIONS.—The total number of petitions presented to the House of Commons, up to Feb. 10, is—against repeal, 1,422; for repeal, 398. Number of signatures against repeal, 107,952; for repeal, 1,150,293.

NOW, OR THREE YEARS HENCE?

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

However we may have felt it a duty to express our warm approbation of the general character and aim of the measures proposed by Sir Robert Peel, we have on several occasions felt ourselves not the less called upon to protest against some of the details, and what we call minor principles involved in those measures. Moreover, the unreserved support which we have all along given to the Free Trade policy of the present Government, entitles us the more freely to criticise their measures—and to expose their defects, without being suspected of a wish to endanger their success. We have never failed frankly to avow our admiration of the wise and bold determination of the minister to secure a final settlement of the Corn Law question by the only way in which that was possible—a final abolition of all protective duty. But neither have we failed from the first to point out what have always appeared to us powerful objections to the precise mode in which that great object is to be obtained; and the reasons we have hitherto urged in support of our views have had more reference to the interests of the agricultural body than to those of the consumer.

If, however, we felt that there were important objections to the details of the measure as proposed by the Minister, calculated to endanger, or at least delay the full benefits of so desirable a settlement—if we felt strongly the greater advantages to all parties which would result from an immediate rather than a deferred repeal of these laws, on grounds chiefly agricultural, and rather on economical than on social considerations—if such were our views before the delivery of Sir Robert Peel's remarkable speech, we must own that they have only been materially strengthened by that address. Amendments in the measure which before we deemed desirable, appear now absolutely necessary. They are necessary to sustain the logical consequences of the Minister's argument and the facts on which he relies. Moreover, the grounds of our convictions are greatly strengthened by new reasons, involving the most important considerations, both social and political.

The most accurate statements that can be obtained from Ireland—the most accurate and satisfactory that the Government, with all its machinery, can command—represent that in six hundred electoral divisions one-half of the whole potato crop has perished of the rot; that in another six hundred electoral divisions two-fifths of the crop have been similarly destroyed; while in some, eight-tenths of the crop are altogether lost for human food. Such are the Government accounts. The correspondents of the minister, some of whom were among those who were long inclined to disbelieve the truth of the reported danger, now measure the available subsistence of the Irish nation by a few weeks:—"For six or seven weeks, while the remains of the potatoes last, destitution will not be general; but I pray you, sir, look to it in time." "I don't think that by the 1st of March next, out of 100 acres on my land, sound seed will be left for next year's crop." Another of the minister's informants, in a different part of the country, says, "Our inquiries extended to one hundred and ninety families altogether, and enable me to state with the most perfect accuracy the frightful extent to which the destruction of the potato crop has proceeded in that part of the country. Many families whom we visited, and who had planted sufficient for their ordinary wants, including the seed necessary for the ensuing season, have not had a potato of any kind for the last month. Others have lost nearly all, and the few that are left are unfit for human food." Another account transmitted to the Lord Lieutenant, says, "His Excellency will find in these statements the announcement of the alarming fact that in two districts alone of the union in question, there are even at this early period of the year (the 9th of February) no less than three hundred persons whose store of provisions are on the point of becoming exhausted." Such then is the present state of Ireland upon the highest possible authority. But what, not only of the immediate, but the more distant future? The immediate future threatens appalling famine; the more distant future, the absolute want of the means of reproducing food. Can a country be placed in a position that more imperatively demands a great effort, the greatest effort that legislative power and private exertions can make? Between present starvation and future provision there is no choice. Self-denial, provident care for the future, are virtues utterly unknown where famine is committing its present ravages. What is the choice between the conviction that seed will be required for the next year's crop, and the present appeals of starving wives and children? "One-eighth of the whole crop is required for seed," says the Minister. "Take the tonnage which it would require to bring ten thousand tons of potatoes from any part of Europe where potatoes may still abound—it is almost impossible to supply the deficiency." But if we had the tonnage, if the Irish had the means, if Parliament were to vote the money, where is the part of Europe where ten thousand tons, or one thousand tons of potatoes could be procured for seed to plant in Ireland for next year? NOWHERE. The whole is a physical impossibility. But the faint hope, the only hope, which the Minister holds out of meeting this alarming crisis, is that the Government shall exchange other food for potatoes, and retain them under their own care for seed. One hundred thousand quarters of maize have been purchased in America with that view. One hundred thousand quarters of maize for the whole of Ireland! Why it is barely adequate to supply the place of potatoes for a single fortnight.

With these facts in view, we can well understand that Sir Robert Peel should "now declare in the face of Parliament, that the day in his public life on which he looks back with the greatest pride and satisfaction is the first of November last, when he was ready to take the responsibility of issuing an Order in Council to open the ports." Such a course the Minister deemed necessary then. Subsequent events have proved that the determination taken on the first of November was wise and unavoidable. Danger is not removed, but is rather aggravated by delay. And now, in the middle of February, when we find the worst anticipations and fears of November on the eve of accomplishment—when the slight hopes which then remained have given way to certain and impending danger—what is the proposal made by the Government? To open the ports, as the Minister proposed on the first of November? No; but to pass a law imposing duties, though much reduced, for three years on all kinds of grain except maize. If it were necessary to open the ports in November, then is it not more dangerous and less practicable to maintain any duty in February? If Sir R. Peel looks back with so much satisfaction to the determination taken on the first of November, in what light can he regard that part of his bill which in February provides for the continuance of any duty on grain? Surely such a provision cannot be the choice of the minister; nor can it be adopted with his approval.

The only palliation offered by Sir Robert Peel for this obvious discrepancy in what he deemed a necessary course in November, and that which he proposes in February, is that he admits maize free, and barley and oats at a nominal duty. But what is the fact? At this moment, according to the Gazette prices, the duty on oats, under the proposed scale, would be two shillings per quarter; and on barley two shillings and sixpence—duties amounting to about ten per cent. on the value of the respective articles. Then, taken in connection with this fact, what is the condition of the grain markets in all the surrounding countries to which we usually look for supplies? In Holland and in Belgium the deficiency of food is even greater than here. In no part of Europe is there a surplus. In almost every part there is either threatened or absolute want. The price of barley on the Continent—on the supply of which Sir Robert Peel appears to rely to make up the defective potato crop in Ireland, and to aid the Government in an effort to save seed for next year—is so high, that shipments of English barley have recently taken place to Holland, this being the cheapest market from which supplies could be obtained. Is this then, a time to maintain one penny of duty? Supplies will be withheld or diverted from this market as much as these proposed duties, in the present state of prices abroad, as if they were double the amount. Two shillings on oats, two shillings and sixpence on barley, are duties at this moment prohibitory. Double their amount could be no more.

If Sir Robert Peel has proved one thing more clearly than another in his speech of last week, it is that the measure now proposed, however well adapted it may be deemed for a permanent settlement of this question, is at least not equal to the present emergency, an emergency so great, so appalling, that we cannot conceive that any Minister charged with the responsibility of the public interests could willingly meet it with so inadequate a provision. It is with the most sincere satisfaction that we observe, that whatever amendment may be adopted by Parliament for the purpose of giving an immediate effect to the reductions of duties proposed by the Government, Sir Robert Peel will adopt it, and will still consider the passing of this law paramount to all other considerations.

THE FREE TRADE CANDIDATES FOR SOUTH LANCASHIRE.

A meeting of the Council of the League, and other subscribers to the League Fund, was held at their offices, last Tuesday evening, at which a numerous committee was appointed to canvass for the signatures of electors of this division, to a requisition to the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., and William Brown, Esq., requesting them to become candidates for the representation of South Lancashire at the next general election.

The following is a copy of the requisition:

"TO THE HONOURABLE CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, M.P., AND WILLIAM BROWN, ESQ.

"Gentlemen—We, the undersigned, electors of the southern division of the county palatine of Lancaster, respectfully address you, in the belief that the present is the most suitable period for soliciting you to become candidates for the representation of this division of the county at the next general election. We are induced to do this from the deliberate conviction that the representation of the vast and varied interests of this important section of the kingdom will be adequately sustained by you; that you will be firm in the support of measures founded on the most comprehensive and impartial views of what is necessary for the general good of all classes of the community; and that, especially, the principles of Free Trade will, in their widest signification, their fullest integrity, find in you ardent and uncompromising friends.

"We make the tender of our support to you, Charles Pelham Villiers, as a testimony of our gratitude and admiration of your persevering advocacy of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws in the House of Commons, continued from year to year in the face of obstacles, arising from the selfishness of some and the indifference, almost equally culpable, of others, until your efforts, along with your coadjutors out of doors, raised up throughout the kingdom a spirit and determination which will not subside until they have marked this period, to all future time, as the era of commercial reformation.

"We make the like tender of our support to you, William Brown, believing that your enlightened views and enlarged experience on commercial subjects eminently qualify you for representing this portion of the empire—the seat and centre of our manufacturing industry—the very heart where all its pulsations begin; in addition to which, your having undertaken to contest the division on a recent occasion, at considerable personal inconvenience, in the belief that, though not successful, yet that certain good would result, gives you a claim to our support, to which we are anxious to respond.

"Gentlemen,—In the firm persuasion that, should you consent to be put in nomination, you will be triumphantly returned to Parliament, we respectfully pledge ourselves not only to give you our personal support, but to endeavour to secure your return by every other constitutional means in our power, and we fervently hope that the connection thus formed may be long maintained, by the honourable fulfilment of our respective duties as constituents and representatives.—We are, your faithful servants."—(Here follow signatures.)

A public meeting was held on the 16th inst., at Campsie, Stirlingshire, for the purpose of ascertaining the general feeling on the momentous question of the Corn and Provision Laws, and to consider the propriety of petitioning both Houses of Parliament on the subject; when it was speedily and unanimously resolved to petition at once for a total and immediate repeal of so glaring an act of selfish legislation. The meeting was almost (if not entirely) composed of the operative class, and the petition, which is in course of being numerously signed, will shortly be forwarded to the Right Hon. Earl Grey, and John Dennistoun, Esq., for presentation.

PETITION FOR FREE TRADE.—It will be seen that the Town Council of Canterbury have voted, without opposition, a petition to Parliament in favour of Free Trade and the ministerial plans. This, it will not be denied, is an impartial testimony, Canterbury being the centre of an agricultural district, and deeply interested in the welfare of the owners, occupiers, and cultivators of the land. Free Trade, it is now generally seen, will benefit all classes.

Wheats which were worth at Santander about 40s. per quarter before it was known that the British ports would in all probability be opened at a low duty, have already advanced to 53s.

HOW CAN LAND BEST BE RELIEVED?

(From the Economist.)

The question of special burdens on land, which has been so frequently evaded by the House of Commons, has at length been entertained by the House of Lords, on the motion of Lord Beaumont, and a committee has been appointed to take evidence on the subject. In anticipation of this motion, we, last week, instituted an inquiry into the relative portion of burdens borne by land and by other property, by which it appeared that a considerable balance of exemptions exists in favour of the former. The balance, however, as it appeared in those calculations, will be still greater when we include two items of special exemptions in favour of land, which were omitted in our last statement, viz., stamp duty on fire insurances, and the tolls on turnpike roads. We have no accounts which enable us to estimate the exact amount of these items of exemption. With regard to the former, the finance accounts for the year ending 5th April, 1845, exhibit a sum of 1,003,669*l.* as derived from insurances on other property, independent of marine insurances, which afforded a further sum of 193,155*l.* Here, then, we have a sum of nearly 1,200,000*l.* contributed to the State from other property, from which the produce of land, as long as it remains in the producer's possession, and the whole implements and stock of farmers, is entirely exempted. We have no means of estimating the amount of the exemptions from turnpike tolls; but, when it is considered that all horses and waggons of every description employed in conveying farm produce and manure to or from market are exempt, the whole aggregate sum in the year for the kingdom must be very large.

Our special object, however, in now returning to this subject, is to claim the attention of our readers to another view of the burdens borne by land, which in our estimation is far more important than many others, but which has been singularly overlooked. We refer to the relief which the agriculturists, as a class, and which land, as a property, have derived from the rapid increase of the commerce and manufactures of the country during the last thirty years, both in regard to general and local taxation.

According to the population returns it appears that the proportions engaged in agriculture and in all other pursuits were, at the different periods, as follows:—

	Occupied in agriculture.	Otherwise occupied.
1811	35 per cent.	65 per cent.
1821	33 "	67 "
1831	28 "	72 "
1841	22 "	78 "

According to these proportions the numbers engaged in the production of food, and those constituting consumers only, were, in 1811 and 1841, respectively as follows:—

	Producers of food.	Consumers who were not producers.	Entire population of Great Britain.
1841	4,145,775	14,698,659	18,844,434

By these returns, it appears that the land afforded occupation for 263,105 persons fewer in the production of food in 1841 compared with 1811, while 6,510,736 persons more were added to the class of consumers, deriving their income from other sources. There is, however, no reason to think that the actual increase of population has been less among classes engaged in agriculture than among those engaged in trades and manufactures. But the facts before us lead to the indisputable assumption that the whole increase which has taken place in the rural districts has found occupation in the towns and manufacturing districts. If, however, there had been no such outlet for the surplus population of the agricultural districts—if our trades and manufactures had increased only at the rate required to employ the natural increase of their own numbers, what at this time would have been the condition of our rural districts? What the charge on property for the maintenance of their poor? The whole population during that period had increased at the rate of forty-nine and a half per cent.; if the land had been burdened with its own proportion, then those dependent upon agriculture at this time would have been 6,591,276 in place of 4,145,775; or, in other words, there would now have been an actual surplus of 2,445,501 persons dependent for support upon the produce of the soil, which must long ere this have threatened an extinction both of rent and profit in the shape of increased poor's rates. But what is really the state of the case? Upwards of two millions of persons, who would have been thus left a charge upon the land, have, by the rapid extension of our manufacturing system, been converted into so many valuable customers for the produce of the soil; and, instead of being a burden upon land, and a cause of diminution of rent, have contributed by their industry to raise the entire rental of land from 37,666,347*l.* in 1814, to 45,753,615*l.* in 1843, as shown by the returns of the income tax at the two periods in question.

Looking to the agricultural class as a body, this extraordinary change in the distribution of the whole population of the country has operated to relieve it to a great extent of the share of the general taxation of the country which it bore in 1811. In that year the whole revenue of the country amounted to 65,173,545*l.*, being at the rate of 3*l.* 10s. 3d. to each individual of the whole population of the United Kingdom, and of which the agricultural population of Great Britain consequently contributed 15,982,190*l.*, and all other classes 28,760,079*l.*

In 1841 the whole sum raised for public revenue was 51,911,588*l.*, being only at the rate of 1*l.* 18s. 10d. to each individual in the United Kingdom. Of this sum the agricultural classes of Great Britain, in 1841, contributed only 8,049,709*l.*; while the other classes contributed 28,539,897*l.* in consequence of the great proportionate increase of numbers which had found employment in other ways during that period. If the same proportion of the general taxation of the country had been borne by the agricultural class in 1841 as in 1811, it would have contributed 12,798,059*l.* instead of only 8,049,709*l.*—showing a saving of upwards of 4,700,000*l.* to the rents and profits of agriculture in this item alone, from the increased numbers engaged in the trade and manufactures of the kingdom.

When, therefore, it is asserted that real property is charged with burdens from which capital is exempt, it should not be lost sight of that it has been alone to the occupation of that capital, to the extension of our trade and manufactures, that we are indebted for the employment of the whole increase of the population since 1811, by which land has been relieved of the enormous charges to which it would otherwise have been exposed to support its increasing number of paupers, and by which the class now deriving rents and profits from the soil has been relieved of a portion of their contribution to the public revenue to the extent of more than 4,700,000*l.* annually. This has been accomplished by the additional contributions of the thriving masses of our manufacturing and trading classes.

But the relief from burdens which land as a property, and the agricultural class as a body, have derived from the increase of our commerce and manufactures does not stop here. The employment of capital in the extension of trade leads directly to the creation of real property, rateable both to public and local taxes. More houses and factories must be built; more quarries and mines and iron works must be opened up; more canals, docks, and railways, must be constructed. Every shilling invested for these purposes adds to the whole amount of rateable property, and to that extent relieves other real property of its existing share of burdens. A comparison of the distribution of the burdens upon real property between 1814 and 1843, shows the extent of this relief in a striking manner. The Parliamentary accounts of 1814 show that the whole income derived from real property in the United Kingdom amounted to 57,129,047*l.*, as chargeable to the property tax, of which 37,666,347*l.*, or sixty-six per cent., was derived from land, and 19,462,700*l.*, or thirty-four per cent., was derived from all other kinds of property. While, by a Parliamentary return of the last session, we find that the whole income derived from real property had increased to 95,284,497*l.*, of which 45,753,615*l.*, or forty-eight per cent., was derived from land, and 49,530,882*l.*, or fifty-two per cent., was derived from all other kinds of property. In 1814, therefore, land as a property was burdened with sixty-six per cent. of all the taxes, both general and local; while, in 1843, notwithstanding an increase of the annual rental of land by upwards of eight millions, other property had been created during the interval to so much greater a proportion, that land only now bears the burdens, whether general or local, placed upon real property to the extent of forty-eight per cent. Land, therefore, now represents somewhat less than one-half of the real property of the country chargeable with rates of all kinds, whether for public or local purposes. It will be an interesting inquiry to ascertain to what extent land as a property, and the agriculturists as a class, have really been directly benefited by the increase of our manufacturing system during the last thirty years. We have now ascertained the proportions of the population in these two great divisions of the country, which at the different periods in question contributed to the general taxation of the country. We have also ascertained the relative proportions in which land and other property were chargeable with burdens placed on real property, and we will endeavour in our next number to work out the precise amount, under all heads of general and local taxes, from which the land has been relieved, in consequence of this new distribution of rateable property, and occupations of the people.

In the mean time, it opens up, in a new and striking light, the enormous advantages which an increase of our commercial and manufacturing systems is calculated to confer upon the landed interest of this country; and that without any effort whatever on their part. Every additional person removed from the rural district, where his labour is not required, to the neighbouring towns, or to the manufacturing districts, where he can be profitably employed, is a direct advantage to the land in two distinct ways: first, it is a relief from a certain burden; and next, the consumption of every such well employed person increases the demand for the produce of the soil. The farmer is relieved of a pauper, and in his place obtains a good customer. Every additional person thus profitably employed is a relief to all the rest of the country, by sharing, through the production of his labour and the consumption of commodities which yield revenues, a portion of the taxes necessary to support the State. And moreover, every house or factory which is built—every mine, or quarry, or iron work which is opened up—every mile of canal or railway which is constructed, come to the relief of all other existing property, by sharing all the burdens to which real property is subjected. How, then, will the owners of land best consult their own interests? By repressing that system which at once relieves them of burdens, and supplies new sources of income, or by giving every possible encouragement and freedom to our commercial and manufacturing enterprise, which has already been productive of such immense advantages to them?

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE IN DANGER.—At a meeting held last week at Mossley, it was unanimously resolved, with one solitary exception, that every one present would purchase a qualification for Buckinghamshire, provided Mr. Cobden would pledge himself to stand as a candidate.—Preston Guardian.

POSSIBLE EXHAUSTION OF OUR COAL.—The consumption of fuel is a consideration far more serious. It is not many years since some person made an estimate of the quantity of coals existing in the country in attainable situations, and came to the conclusion that the supply must be altogether exhausted in half a century. This conclusion was not very cheering for the national prosperity. To believe that, within the probable lives of many of us, the grand resource of all our enterprise should be destroyed, and that we should be left a manufacturing Nineveh, amid the ruins of furnaces and warehouses—our energies crumbling to the dust, and our locomotives stationary—our poor-houses crowded with manufacturers—and our engineers petitioning Parliament for inquiring into the means of making fires without fuel—the whole nation, in fact, in anti-promethean state of wretchedness and darkness—all this made a gloomy picture, and one which might have induced many persons to buy investments for their grandchildren in the foreign funds. Unfortunately, the calculator knew but little of the resources of the country. Unfortunately, many districts where the coal is found actually on the surface will be exhausted in a very appreciable time; but the quantity is enormous which lies beneath the surface—unworked at present, till we have used what is more readily attained. It is in the magnificent coal-field of South Wales to which we must look for our enduring supply of fuel. The quantity known or probable is almost incalculable. Still though we may trust that it will be long, very long, ere the nation shall be deprived of so inestimable a benefit, the inconvenience to some districts will be very great, where their supply shall fail, as it must, long ere many living travellers shall have performed their last journey. To preach economy is useless, but it would be well to be careful. We should almost tremble to calculate the consumption in a few years.—Church of England Quarterly Review.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.
COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

THURSDAY, JAN. 15.

IMPORTANT CASE.—BOROUGH OF SCARBOROUGH.—FOUNDERS v. DONNER.—This was a case in which the voter claimed to be inserted in the list of voters for the Borough of Scarborough, in respect of a successive occupation of houses. A list of claims had been duly published by the overseers, and in that list the name and description of John Founders, and of the situation of the property, was as follows:—

Christian name and surname of each Claimant at full length.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, lane, or other place in this Parish or Township where the Property is situate or Number of House if any.
John Founders.	15, Aberdeen Walk.	House.	Queen Street.
"	"	House.	15, Aberdeen Walk

The above description is an exact copy in all respects of the notice of claim sent in by the voter to the overseers. The plan secondly mentioned, or the situation of the house, namely, 15, Aberdeen Walk, is the situation of the house which he at present occupies; and the street or place where the houses are stated to be situated, are well known, and are not so extensive or populous, but that any occupier of any premises in them may be found by reasonable inquiries. Both the houses constituting the qualification are, and have always been numbered.

The claim of John Founders was opposed on the ground that the number of the first house was not inserted in the list agreeably to the form prescribed by the 6th Vic. c. 18, schedule B. No. 3, nor in any claim sent to the overseers by him, agreeably to the form No. 6 of the same statute and schedule; the revising barrister decided that the said John Founders was not entitled to be inserted in the list of voters for the said borough, on the ground that the statute required that the number of each house constituting the qualification should have been contained in the column describing the situation of the property.

This was a consolidated appeal, and seven other votes depended upon the decision in the above case.

Mr. WHARTON appeared for the appellant, and Mr. Bliss for the respondent. The case having been argued at some length, the decision of the court was given by CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—I think the decision of the revising barrister in this case was right. He has decided that the claimant was not entitled to be inserted in the list of voters on the ground that the statute requires that the number of each house constituting the qualification should have been contained in the column describing the situation of the property, and such I think is the proper construction of the statute coupled with the form to which reference is made. The moment this court held that it was not sufficient to give merely the new qualification which was existing at the time of the matter coming before the revising barrister, but that he must also give the qualification which, when coupled with the present qualification, made out the whole—the moment that was decided, the law would apply as much to one as the other; and therefore if that precision was necessary to one, if it was to the later of the two, so also it was necessary in the earlier. You may find out a man by his present residence; you may have great difficulty in finding the number of the precise house on which he intended to rest his qualification, and therefore whether the earlier part is an unnecessary part? Therefore it appears to me it was necessary that the number of the house should be given, which formed part of the qualification in Queen-street. The answer endeavoured to be made to this, though the revising barrister has stated the facts of this case, from which we must review his decision, whether he had a right to make that amendment which we must supply—an amendment which in point of fact he has not made. A reference is made to the sections 40 and sections 101. In looking over section 40, that applies to the case where the revising barrister, not being satisfied with the identification of the premises, had expunged the name of the person from the list, and that afterwards and before the revision had ceased, evidence is given to him which to his satisfaction supplies the misdescription. Therefore, in order to avail himself of the section 40, this complainant ought to show that the revising barrister was satisfied before the sittings for the revision ceased, and that the number had been so-and-so, and that the qualification was complete. But we, as far as that statement goes, must hold that he was not satisfied, for he has still persisted the name should be expunged from the list. And it has been already remarked that was obviated here; and on the face of the case there is nothing to show that there is any fixed number applying to the house at all; therefore he cannot avail himself of section 40. At the end of section 101 it is stated, that "no misnomer or inaccurate description of any person, place, or thing, named or described in any schedule to this Act annexed, or in any list or register of voters, or in any notice required by this Act, shall in any way prevent or abridge the operation of this Act with respect to such person, place, or thing; provided that such person, place, or thing, shall be so denominated in such schedule, list, register, or notice, as to be commonly understood." You cannot liken that to a case where you are uncertain as to how it would be—uncertain as to whether in this street, called Queen Street, there would be 100, or 500, or only a few houses; and you cannot say necessarily that this particular house would be commonly understood to be the house, unless you are supplied with the means of forming a judgment as to the actual state of the street. Besides, the meaning of the words "commonly understood," would refer to some class or description of houses which are given, and from which you may extract the same as the common understanding. I, therefore, think it comes back to the same question referred to in the decision. The Statute requires in the claim should be inserted the name and the number, as well of the latter house as of the former to complete qualification. I think, therefore, the revising barrister has decided right.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Decision affirmed without costs.

JUDGMENT DELIVERED MONDAY, FEB. 28.—NEWTON v. THE OVERSEERS OF MARBERLEY, AND NEWTON v. THE OVERSEERS OF CROWLEY.—The Lord Chief Justice, in delivering the judgment of the court, said, in these cases, which were appeals from the decision of the revising barrister for the northern division of Cheshire, two questions were raised for the consideration of the court. With respect to the first, namely, whether the circumstances under which the rent-charges in the case had been granted were such as to make the grant void, the court was of opinion that the question was one for the revising barrister's decision alone. The second question was whether a rent-charge bona fide granted, but for the avowed purpose of multiplying votes, was invalid under the provisions of 7 and 8 Wm. III., c. 25. On that point the court was of opinion that the decision in the case of "Alexander v. Newman" (see the report in THE LEAGUE of February 7,) to the effect that a conveyance of such a nature was not invalid, must also govern the present case.

Decision affirmed.

Clenham Mill, Beaminster, Feb. 24th, 1846.

SIR,—In this neighbourhood I have distributed among the agricultural labourers 50 pair of sheets and 24 beds, &c. which the League kindly allotted me. Upwards of seventy families have been thus supplied, many of whom were almost destitute of bed clothing; but this goes but a little way amidst the misery with which I am surrounded. Hundreds of applications I have been compelled to refuse. I have the particulars of every family I have supplied, and I find, on an average, they have 1s. per head per week to find food, clothing, firing, &c.: in the Beaminster Union it costs 2s. 6d. per head. Mr. Bankes and his new allies dare not deny this. I have numbers of notes from farmers in my possession, informing me the amount of wages, numbers in family, &c.; and I can assure you the wretchedness of many of these poor creatures I cannot describe; they are far worse at present than ever I have known them in consequence of the great failure of the potato crop in this neighbourhood, which they entirely live on when bread is dear, as at the present time. I assert they are in a most deplorable and dangerous state—a state they ought not to be left in a day. In the face of all this misery the pretended representatives of Dorset will plead in Parliament, as they have at protection meetings in the county, for agricultural labourers—for protection to native industry. What audacity! what consummate hypocrisy! or, shall we call it by a milder term, ignorance, which is the most charitable? Should this meet the eye of any charitably-disposed person who may be able to do something towards clothing the poor labourers of Dorsetshire, as they have done in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, I shall be most happy to be the medium of conveying it to them.

I am, dear sir, yours truly,

JOSEPH TITE.

To the Editor of the CAMBRIAN.

SIR,—As a farmer, my own experience of good and bad years has long since led me to the conclusion, that the Corn Laws are as much opposed to the farmer's interests as to those of any class of society. I boldly ask my brother farmers whether our prosperous years have been not those in which the price of corn has been high, but those in which the iron, copper, and coal trades of these districts have been brisk? With their activity commences our sunshine—and with their depression the fall in price, the difficulty of finding a market for our farm produce. This at least has been the result of my observations and the experience of some years. The low prices of farming produce which prevailed in Glamorganshire and Carmarthenshire in 1843—the increased poor rates—and the deep distress amongst our farmers at that period, are as plainly to be traced to the depression of our great manufactures, and this again to the Corn Laws, in preventing exchanges with foreign nations, as the light of day is to the rising of the sun. The result of the reduction of duties on live stock by Sir R. Peel, has taught me and many other farmers volumes of wisdom, as to the real causes of the rise and fall of agricultural produce. In 1842, before the tariff came into operation, I sold beef at 4½d., pork at 2½d., and veal at 4½d. per lb. In 1845, after the importation of foreign cattle, by which we expected to be ruined, I have got for the same quality prices as follows:—beef, 6d., pork, 5d. to 5½d., veal, 6d. per lb., Welsh cheese, which in 1842 was sold at 2d., now sells at 4d. per lb.; fresh butter, for which, in 1842, I got 10d., I now sell in Swansea market at 1s. 4d. per lb. So much for foreign competition. While the farmer's customers are in full employ, the farmer's produce must sell well. One word as to farm labourers and the effect of low prices of corn on their wages. In 1842-3, I could procure an in-door farm servant for 7l. a year. I am now giving for the same class 13l. a year. Railway navigators in 1842 earned 2s. a day—last summer they got 3s. a day; the average price of wheat in the last weeks of May and June, 1842, being 61s. 10d. and 63s. 11d., and for corresponding weeks in May and June, 1845, 40s. 3d. and 47s. 11d.

As to immediate repeal, I should say in reference to the farmer's interests, by all means let it be immediate. We have to dread as our greatest enemy repeal by instalments. An English brother farmer has well said, "If the abolition of the Corn Laws are to ruin the farmer, put us to death at once, and not by inches." The gradual repeal of the Corn Laws, by a falling duty each year, whatever mercy it may seemingly have for the farmer on paper, would in practice be the very worst plan that could be devised for him. Whatever inconvenience may be experienced by us from this change (although that inconvenience has been absurdly and ridiculously magnified) would be increased tenfold by continuing a state of uncertainty. Any delay in the abolition of the law would have the effect of delaying satisfactory arrangements between landlord and tenant. The farmer would look forward to the ultimate repeal of the duty, and in the meantime would lay out no more money or labour on his land than would be necessary for the present. I need not add, to those who are acquainted with farming, that the consequence of this would be exhaustion of the soil—and thus both tenant and landlord would be in the end losers by delay.

With apology for these plain remarks,

A GLAMORGANSHIRE TENANT FARMER.

COMPENSATION FOR THE CORN LAWS.—Sir Grahame Montgomery, Bart., has intimated to his numerous tenants in Peebleshire that although he feels confident that Sir Robert Peel's measure, when once fairly carried into effect, will produce a result highly beneficial to society at large, still, with an anxious wish to satisfy the minds of his tenants, he begs to assure them should any reduction take place on farm produce in consequence of these measures, a reduction will be made upon their rents.—Edinburgh Witness.

REVIEW.

Rough Notes of a Farmer during an Agricultural Tour through Russia, Prussia, &c. By F. F. Salter, Esq. London. Ridgway.

This little pamphlet is so well calculated to soothe the exaggerated alarms with which some interested parties have endeavoured to inspire the agriculturists respecting the dangers of foreign competition, that we are anxious to bring it at once under the consideration of our readers. Mr. Salter's sober facts complete the overthrow of Lord Stanley's Romance of Tamboff; for no English farmer can seriously believe that he has to dread rivalry from those who pursue the system described in the following extract:

"The skill of the Russian people in agricultural operations, when I visited the country, could not be considered otherwise than in a very primitive state, and the implements in general use were of the rudest description. The plough, or rather grubber, being simply two pieces of iron set at right angles with a pair of light shafts; this is drawn by one horse, whose labour depends upon the pressure of the hand that steers it. The implement was worth in the English market 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. The harrow also is peculiar, being constructed of a given number of slabs of the fir tree, with the spurs or branches left on about 15 inches long; these slabs are fastened to two cross bars by means of a withe at each end, and of which the value could not be above 1s. 6d. to 2s. The waggons are also of very rude construction, and about the size adapted for a donkey to draw upon a common road; value from 50s. to 80s., but to this in general either two or three oxen are attached abreast.

"The land is cultivated chiefly by women, children, or old men. It is not an unusual sight to see one hundred women at plough, within a very short distance of each other, without hat, cap, shoes or stockings; their only covering being a loose kind of smock frock, made of a coarse material, woven by themselves during the winter months, with a string to draw it round the waist and above the breast. This of course is their summer dress.

"They not only plough, but harrow, sow, reap, mow, and harvest the crops—the able-bodied men being chiefly engaged either as soldiers or as servants to their lords, or at work as mechanics in the towns. The consequence is, that the lands, for want of strength to till them, look poverty-stricken and neglected, and must under any circumstances require an immense outlay of capital to improve them, independently of the energy and skill required to overcome the difficulties as regards the shortness of the season, during which anything connected with the improvement of the soil can be carried on. The earth is closed against all cultivation for seven months of continued and severe winter. One month of the year may be divided into spring and autumn, and four months into extreme heat of summer.

"The difficulty of transit, for want of material to make roads, forms a serious inconvenience and a considerable check to the improvements in agriculture, especially in the interior, where the visitor will travel hundreds of miles over tracts of deep sand, seeing but a small portion of retentive loam. The depth of these sands renders it necessary to apply the labour of at least three horses to draw a light load for one on a common road; and if it was not for the facility afforded by sledging in the winter, many parts would almost be shut out from a market altogether. I observed no gravel. From what I could see of the crops and from the information I was able to obtain, the carriage of grain is by no means a heavy affair, in comparison with the extent of land upon which it is grown. For instance, rye, which forms by far the larger portion of the grain crop, does not yield, on an average of years, more than 'from two and a half to three corn,' that is to say, from two and a half to three times the seed sown. From what I saw of the rye crop, both before and after ripening, I had a strong impression the yield was greater, although by no means a heavy crop, but upon a closer inspection I found the grain itself smaller than the English rye, and which accounted for the difference (about three bushels per acre) in my own opinion and the information received, and if the crop of 1842, as was stated repeatedly, the one the harvesting, of which I was an eye-witness, was the best that had been grown for twenty years, my decided opinion was that eight to twelve bushels per acre would top the average of many seasons. Wheat, barley, and oats, yield in the same proportion; neither turnips nor potatoes are cultivated to any extent, cabbage being the vegetable for a Russian."

Another passage exhibits the slovenly character of Russian agriculture in a stronger light.

"The poor horses also bespoke the slothful habits of their feeders, who screen themselves under the cloak of superstition, and plead as an excuse or reason for never cleaning the poor animals, or attending more diligently to the weaker constituted ones that sink under the cruelty and neglect, that they shall offend their (the horses) saint; for their impression is, every horse has his night master or saint to watch over him (and rub him down I presume), and therefore it would be presumption to smooth a hair. If the poor brute should be ill they conclude at once he has given great offence, and prevail on their masters to turn him out of the stud. The men at plough on this farm were using English foot-ploughs, with two horses, and a man to drive, ploughing very badly, and not going the nearest way to the end of the field. They were sometimes nine inches deep, and sometimes three inches, and sometimes nearly out. I took hold of the plough and dispensed with the driver, and although the horses did not understand English, I contrived, with the help of the plough lines, to shew them how to carry out a few furrows straight, and of a tolerably even depth. I was soon, however, obliged to give it up, for we were so infested by large black ant flies as to render a stay impossible. The men had a species of veil over their faces to protect them. I left them in high discourse and examining my work."

We shall next direct attention to the practical condition of the corn-markets in Riga and Odessa, from which nearly all the grain exported from Russia is procured.

"The opinion of the Riga merchants as well as landowners was that Russia was not likely to produce corn for exportation cheaper than heretofore, for that any increased demand at all times increased the price, and it was only from the want of a regular market, and their being able to obtain the corn at leisure from the interior that they have been enabled to sell at the prices they have done; and although there is capability in the soil, there is such uncertainty in the seasons, and a want of hands generally to cultivate it, that nothing but a very steady demand, and that at higher prices, would increase the energy of the people and cause them to apply themselves closer to the cultivation of grain.

"Odessa will no doubt at all times and seasons export grain, the uncertainty of the season being felt less in the south; but as the sea risk and freightage is much greater than from the Baltic, it must increase the value in the market, so that not more than one-third of the grain sent out from that port ought to be calculated as for the English market.

"To give some idea of the badness of the roads and the difficulty of transit, we had ten horses attached to a diligence with six people in it for nearly 250 miles of the journey, which was nearly all the time in deep sand."

Comment on these statements is superfluous. English farmers have as little need to fear competition with such tillers of the soil, as English soldiers an encounter with the most barbarous tribes of Asia or America. The Russians have neither the skill, the capital, nor the enterprise, which would enable them to compete with the English producers of corn. It might as well be said that the Kirghees with their bows and arrows, could compete with our discipline, musketry, and artillery.

Forest and Game Law Tales; By Harriet Martineau. Vol. III. London: Moxon.

The third volume of Miss Martineau's Game Law Tales contains but one story, "Gentle and Simple;" it is a leaf from what Gray very falsely described as "The short but simple annals of the poor," for it is a picture of long suffering and complicated misery. Luke Voile, a slow-witted lad, but the chief support of his grandmother, brothers, and sister, having found a partridge's nest, took it home, utterly ignorant of his having committed a crime. He showed the prize to a labourer, who mentioned it at the public-house; Groves, a master-poacher, at once marked Luke as his own.

When they had overheard Waterston tell a man at the counter about Luke and the nest, Groves said to Satchell, with a wink, "A nice scrape for a lad to begin with, that, Satchell! As nice a beginning as one often hears of."

"Why, you would not set an eye on him?" replied Satchell. "He is such a simple lad,—you may have a better than he, any day. You never saw such a simple lad. Why, if Waterston had told him to sit on the eggs to keep them warm, there he would have sat till they hatched off;—unless his granny had knocked him off the nest. You will never make anything of him."

"But you see, he is a stout young fellow; and if he gets on our side, he will be one the less against us; for you may rely on it, Lisamer will hire such a stout one as that for a watcher. The lad will be sure to be out o' nights, on the one side or the other....."

"Well, then, to be sure, it will be best for the lad himself to be with us. But what can you do with such a gawky?"

"We'll see whether he has not something in him. He has learned to drive a spade well in; and a boy that has learned one thing may learn another. And he need not be able to do us any harm. We'll manage it all for his good and our own."

"Ay, do! Do him nothing but kindness, for they are poorly off,—those Voiles. And the old vixen herself is an honest, thrifty, hard-working old body; so, give them a help, if you like, but nothing worse."

"I'll give them a lift," said Groves, with a decisive nod. "What you have to do is to get the story of the nest to Pole's ear to-night."

"To-night!"

"Yes: for the chance of finding either bird or eggs still extant, you know."

"I know," said Satchell, taking his turn to nod with decision.

He went and joined his other customers, and soon brought them to the point of going before dark to the meadow, to try to find the empty nest. Any object will serve for idlers who want to pass an hour. Satchell knew this; and he knew that one of Mr. Treherne's keepers was pretty sure to hear immediately from Mr. Sleath's people of anything that took place in relation to game on Mr. Eyre's farm, where Squire Sleath rented the shooting.

Accordingly, when Lisamer, Mr. Treherne's head-keeper, was locking the door of his lodge for the night, his assistant, Pole, came up with information which would not bear delay. One of farmer Eyre's labourers had stolen a bird and her eggs, and shown them to a miner who could swear to the fact, but had rather not come forward.

Luke was convicted, but Groves paid the fine for him, and believed himself sure of his victim, as the farmer for whom he worked feared to give any employment to one who had offended the preservers of game. Onslow, a more independent farmer, took pity on the youth, and we shall now see how his conduct was viewed by the "lovers of sport."

As Luke was turning into the field, three gentlemen came riding down the lane; and one of them called to him to open the lane gate. As Luke touched his forehead, as taught when he was a little boy, Mr. Holloway observed to Mr. Treherne that this was the lad who was before them in a scrape the other day. Mr. Treherne pulled up for a moment.

"What business have you here?" he asked of Luke.

"I'm come to my work from dinner, please you, Sir."

"Who gives you work?"

"Mr. Onslow. I did work for farmer Eyre till now; and now I work for Mr. Onslow."

"What, Eyre would have nothing more to do with such a fellow as you, eh?"

"No, Sir."

"There you see what it is to fall into vice. Nobody will trust you, and you will go to jail."

"I work for Mr. Onslow now, Sir."

"He will turn you off,—at least he ought,—if you are caught thieving again. So, take care."

"I was never caught thieving, Sir," exclaimed Luke, looking up surprised.

"Why, are not you the lad that was brought up for poaching—for taking a bird and eggs—only three days since?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Then how can you say you never did any thieving?"

Luke looked puzzled, and the gentleman rode on, Mr. Treherne observing to Lord B. that he thought they ought to watch Onslow, whose proceedings appeared very strange. Every fellow fresh from jail, every poacher just fined, had only to come to him to get encouragement and countenance.

"Do you object to that?" Mr. Holloway asked.

"I hope he has regard to the honest men first," observed Lord B.

"If he has," said Mr. Treherne, "it is only in giving them work. It is no compliment to an honest labourer to put him to work on the same hedge with a poacher. The honest men cannot have much to say for Onslow's consideration there."

The moral and legal code of certain game preservers is expounded in the following conversation:

"You see what happens for want of a little manly severity," observed Mr. Treherne. "A milkop magistrate who looks ready to cry over any brute that a poacher may have to show, and talks about violence and assault, and all that nonsense, is the very person answerable for detestable tricks like these. No man can doubt of the advantage of knocking down a poacher here and there, over such entrapping as this."

"You hold either assaulting, or spying and entrapping men necessary to the preservation of game?" asked Sir Francis.

"I do not admit the word 'assault,' in the case. I would have no one strike a blow who is not empowered by the Act to capture a poacher. That being provided, I am confident that a good deal less parley, and a few more timely blows would save a vast deal of mischief and false sentiment."

"That is your own practice?"

"Of course it is. When I know that a fellow is going to make opposition, I cut the matter short with a punch in the head."

"And by what means do you know it?"

"You may always see by a man's eye when he is intending a blow. How could you parry a blow but for that?"

"How is it that the man does not see the same thing in your eye? How is it that you get your blow struck?"

"Perhaps," observed Mr. Holloway, it is dark, as frequently happens in the night. But in that case, it is wonderful how Treherne sees the poacher's eye."

"Ah! you know nothing about it, any of you. You have not been in between twenty and thirty poaching conflicts, as I have."

Farmer Onslow's view of poaching contains some truths worthy the attention of country gentlemen.

"Where there is profit, Sir, there is always inducement; and there is much pleasure besides in the adventure of poaching; and no popular disgrace;—nothing more than the excitement of an amusing little mystery about their goings and comings. Well, then, there is that old fox Groves, who makes most of all. In all these cases, I have no doubt, if we were to see into their affairs, we should find a curious excess of expenditure over apparent receipts."

"Mr. Treherne is very clever at finding reasons for praising game-preserving," said Mrs. Onslow. "I wonder what he would say to so many people having their incomes improved by his and his neighbours' game."

"It is not the argument he would most rely on," observed Mr. Holloway.

"And it is met in a moment," declared the farmer, "by this;—that the money put into people's pockets, partially, unfairly, and guiltily, by the game, is no more than would be got fairly and honestly, by the proper persons, if there were no game—or no more than is harmless. Only let Mr. Treherne look at Frith's farm, and he may see, if he chooses, how many labourers might and would be employed and fed on that farm, if there was a chance for anything to grow. Lord B.'s tenants are many of them hardly placed enough; but it stirs one's indignation to see such a case as Frith's—how he is going to ruin, in spite of all he can do to save himself; and how the food that God gave for man is devoured and spoiled by brute creatures, while our poor neighbours are shrinking to skeletons for want of food. I wish somebody could get Lord B. and Mr. Treherne to go over that farm, and learn the truth for themselves."

"They could not see it, if it was before their eyes," declared Mrs. Onslow. "Mr. Treherne would say it was worms or rats, or birds, or weather, or anything rather than admit it to be the game.—Yes—even though nobody else had been troubled with wire-worm, and crows, and wood-pigeons, or a bad season. It agrees with his pleasures to say that pheasants are the farmer's best friends, and hares no enemies; and he will go on to say so to the last day of his life."

"I wish he would say so somewhere abroad, where such a saying would be harmless; and leave Frith and the rest of us to do what we like with our farms—paying him handsomely for his game. I am afraid he is not likely to stay away, Mr. Holloway; or we would make him a handsome offer to rent his estate."

The principles which the tale is designed to illustrate may be gathered from the extracts we have made; but the course of the story is developed with artistic skill which no quotations could elucidate. Luke, pressed by his debt to Groves, perseveres in poaching, and is finally transported; his family sinks into hopeless ruin; and finally, Treherne's gamekeeper, outwitted by the poachers, and afraid to meet his master, commits suicide. These sad events produce no more effect on Treherne than they would on Mr. Grantley Berkeley. His comment on the result is characteristic:

"It is a dreadful business," observed Mr. Treherne. "And I feel particularly for you in it."

"Treherne!" exclaimed Mr. Holloway, turning round to him with a face of anguish, "I wish you would go away."

"What! Go away! My dear fellow, what do you mean?"

"Come, say, what you mean."

"I must at such a time as this. Treherne, I wish you would let your estate here, and go to some other. You have other property, in more places than one, and nowhere could your presence be so—so—what it is here."

"The first duty of a country gentleman, Holloway, is to live on his estate. And no man is more resolved to do his duty than I am."

"Then come back when we have retrieved ourselves a little; but leave us a breathing time. You well know that your estate is unproductive—the neighbouring farms yielding bad rents, our harvests impaired, your tenants discontented, their labourers corrupted and exasperated; and now, here is suicide and flight—flight to another country and to the darkness of the grave—from before your face! You must go away, or I know not what will become of us."

"Come, no more of this, Holloway! I can make great allowance for you—great allowance this evening for you; and at all times for the clergyman of my parish. But there is a point beyond which....."

"Beyond which the voice of man can scarcely reach you," declared Mr. Holloway, "since the hand of Heaven works in vain before your eyes. May God awaken you to a sense of the position in which you stand!"

"When it appears in a new light to me, I will let you know, you may rely upon it, Holloway. I have shown you that I can confess myself wrong. But I have my own views of duty; and till they change, I shall live on my own estate, in the way I think fitting. I am never induced to anything by cant, as I thought you had known. Well, well; I don't apply the word 'cant' to you as originating that set of considerations, I mean only that I think you too easily caught by cant, as every clergyman is apt to be, in regard to game-preserving; even you, it seems, though you have enjoyed sport in your time more than many clergymen who take on themselves to talk of what they know nothing about."

Miss Martineau has done good service by her able exposure of the natural and necessary results of the iniquitous Game Laws; and we trust all who feel an interest in the moral improvement of the agricultural population will exert themselves to ensure a large circulation of these little volumes.

THE ICE HARVEST IN AMERICA.—It may not be generally known that a good pond of water situated in the upper part of the city, will yield to its owner a better income than a field of wheat of the same size.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

THE LABOURING CLASSES OF IRELAND.—We have just heard that the board of works will, within six weeks, commence the embankment of the slob between Derrymore point and Anna Island. This work, which is of considerable extent, will prove a most fortunate god-send for the labouring classes during the next summer.—Kerry Post.

DISSOLUTION OF THE LIVERPOOL ROYAL STOCK EXCHANGE.—As a sign of the times, the dissolution of this exchange might be adduced as important. A new association opened on Monday, into which we believe the bulk of its members, together with many who have seceded from the association in Bank-buildings, have entered.

INDIAN CORN.—The corn, the arrival of which we lately noticed, is in progress of grinding at the Lee Mills. The meal or flour is of a very fine quality, and is convertible into a valuable and an agreeable article of food.—Cork Constitution.

THE YOUNG WHEAT.—The young wheat plants in all parts of the country present a most healthy appearance. If they are not checked by spring frosts, we shall, in all probability, have an early harvest.—Edinburgh Register.

FUNERAL EXPENSES.—A movement is now being made in Paisley for the abolition of the custom, which is carried to an extravagant excess in Scotland, of providing refreshments to company at funerals.

EDUCATION IN VIRGINIA.—There are 120,000 children in Virginia who attend no school whatever.

On Friday week, the price of potatoes advanced 6d., and on some kinds 1s. per cwt. A pound of good potatoes cannot now be purchased under 1d. and 1½d.; and for one pound of the best bread the charge is, with very few exceptions, 2½d., or 3d., to 10d. per four pound loaf, the price having advanced 3d. within the last two or three days.—Morning Chronicle.

The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have ordered the marble archway or portico at Buckingham Palace to be covered with India rubber pavement, similar to the Admiralty Court Yard.

SPADE LABOUR.—The Duke of Marlborough is improving his land by spade-labour, and has now 250 labourers employed at good wages, in double digging Bladon-heath, Oxon.

It is reported that the King of Sweden has offered a reward of 10,000 dollars to the person who shall contrive the most efficient apparatus for converting sawdust into charcoal without waste.

A letter from Vienna says, "In the memory of man there never was such a winter, or rather we have not had any winter at all. The temperature is generally 14 degrees. Sometimes there are a few icicles in the Danube, but they arrive from Bavaria, and melt as soon as they mix with the river here. The trees are in flower, everybody wears summer clothes, and the promenades are thronged as if in the height of summer."

FAMINE IN SWEDEN.—A letter from Stockholm of the 15th January, states, that in the provinces of Upsal, Stockholm, and Westmanland, the scarcity has reached such a degree of intensity that it is feared generally, lest a mass of unfortunate persons rush to Stockholm, which would inevitably produce a famine. In Upland there are 14,000 persons without food or shelter.

HEALTHY LOCALITY.—It is an extraordinary fact that with a population of between seven and eight thousand persons in Chelmsford, there has not been a death registered in the parish for a month.

A MIRACLE!—A baker of Critch is astonishing his townsmen by exhibiting an egg, on the shell of which appears, in relief, the words, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die: repent." The baker pretends that one of his hens laid the egg a few days ago, and that the inscription was on the shell when it first came forth!

On Friday the first pie of the Nore viaduct, near Mountrath, was driven to its place, and the work commenced.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

MR. VILLIERS'S MOTION—POLICY OF THE LEAGUE.

The fate of Mr. Villiers's motion for making the Premier's total repeal of the Corn Law immediate, was certainly about the strangest result of a strange concurrence, or conflict, of circumstances, that any legislative assembly ever witnessed. It was not, as in times past, when the honourable member for Wolverhampton had to fight the hard, up-hill battle of fact and argument against half-friends, who thought him "right in principle," but mildly censured him for "going too far;" and declared opponents, who condemned him and his principles as wrong altogether. This time everybody agreed with him, and judged him to be altogether right. The motion was a thoroughly good motion—well principled, and well timed. There was no denying his premises—no resisting his conclusion. It was impossible there could be two opinions about it. Everybody felt, and almost everybody said, immediate repeal was the very thing. It was best for the British farmer, best for the Irish peasant, and best for the political peace and quiet of the country, which would then be totally and immediately relieved of the "machinations" and of the presence of an "unconstitutional" League. The emergency demanded it—sound principle required it—and public opinion could not be satisfied without it. There was scarcely a breath of doubt or dissent. Ministers "could not deny," and Opposition orators "frankly confessed." Sir Robert Peel was clearly of opinion that his plan was "not quite so complete" as Mr. Villiers's, and "less perfect" than Mr. Cobden's. Lord John Russell deemed the League scheme "both more wise as an abstract, and more effective as a practical proposition" than that of the Government. The protectionists, themselves, had said as much—only their memories failed them when the time came for saying it once more, with effect; and they had forgotten all about it. Never was such unanimity. Nobody pretended to think Mr. Villiers mistaken; yet, when it came to the point, Mr. Villiers found himself out-voted by a majority of more than three to one.

This calls for explanation; and the explanation is certainly of the oddest. The fact is, it was found, or fancied, that if the bill was made too good, it would never do for that mysterious "other place" to which so many dark and enigmatical allusions were made in the course of debate. Honourable members' imaginations were positively haunted; and their free agency paralysed, by the felt, though unseen spirit of this "other place." Sir Robert Peel said, it was totally impossible he could answer for the effect that might be produced in the "other place," by making the bill as good as he thought it ought to be—though he was chivalrous enough to volunteer braving the terrors of the "other place," in case of need. Lord John Russell "would not take the responsibility" of troubling the "other place" with anything like a perfect bill. With a glaring fault or two on the face of it, the bill might have a chance of respectful treatment in the "other place;" but everybody shook his head at the notion of sending a faultless bill to try its fortune in that quarter. It was impossible to say what might befall the bill in the "other place," unless its worst flaws were carefully preserved in their "integrity." Honourable gentlemen seemed, one and all, to have the worst possible opinion of the "other place."

Was there ever such a satire on an existing institution of the country, as that impliedly cast, all through the discussion of Monday and Tuesday nights, on the hereditary branch of the British legislature? It seemed to be taken for granted that their lordships of the upper house are naturally inaccessible to reason. Nobody was disposed to give them credit for believing the most indisputably-authenticated facts, or drawing the most irresistibly-obvious inferences. The general sense of the house was strong against putting too great a strain on their lordships' logical and statesman-like faculties. Nothing could make truth go down in the "other place" but a moderate admixture of the false and foolish—as one sweetens physic for squalling children—not arrived at years of discretion, without inquiring too curiously whether the sugar will improve or detract from the efficacy and wholesomeness of the dose. The faithful Commons apologise to one another and to the country for not doing the right thing by throwing it on the Lords' want of sense. The "lower" house must condescend to the mental debility and limitation of the "upper." Accordingly, all the faults are cautiously retained for the express gratification of the very peculiar tastes so freely attributed to the denizens of the "other place"—on some such principle, we suppose, as that on which the waggish toper, after having carefully taken the flies out of the decanter of wine, as carefully replaced them on the termination of the afternoon's proceedings; "for, though he did not like drinking flies, perhaps others might."

The policy of the League, in bringing forward at this particular juncture a motion having the formal character of opposition to a Free Trade Government, has been—or rather, had been—objected to by certain of our over-sensitive and cautious friends. That policy is, we presume, by this time, justified in the opinion of the most scrupulously-timid of them all. Independently of certain highly instructive and monitory incidents occurring in the discussions of this week—such as Lord George Bentinck's menace about "fighting the battle from pillar to post"—there is everything in the present state and prospects of the question to warn us against relaxing one iota of our demand, or receding by a hairs' breadth from our vantage ground of principle. If any of our friends have been flattering themselves with the belief that we are already out of the wood—that the bill is safe—that the majority of ninety-seven has settled everything—that the lords will be compliant—that there will be no dissolution and general election before the business is over,—they have probably seen or heard that within the last few days which may go far to undeceive them. The bill is not safe. The majority of ninety-seven has settled nothing, so far as regards the events of the next three or six months. For the compliance of their lordships, no human being can answer. And a dissolution and general election before the business is over, never looked likelier than at this present moment. A flat defiance of the Ministry, the House of Commons, and the country—a direct negative to the Government measure—a categorical No—a determination to maintain "protection in its integrity"—is, perhaps, not to be expected. But there is, just now, very great reason to expect that their Lordships will damage and destroy the bill with "amendments." Rumours of a "fixed duty" have been much afloat of late. The atmosphere of the lobbies and the club-houses is charged with "fixed duty," as the thick air is charged with thunder on a sultry summer's evening. These floating rumours have, within the past day or two, assumed a disagreeably definite shape. On Thursday morning, the Chronicle startled the good easy folks, who had been so pleasantly saying to one another, "all right," with the portentous announcement, that—

"Statements are now made of so positive a character, and with such special reference to persons and plans, as to leave no doubt that a very serious opposition to the Ministerial Bill in the Upper House is intended. Looking merely to the opinions of the leaders of the protection party, it might be inferred that a simple and direct negative upon the measure would be the course taken to ensure its defeat. This mode of proceeding would no doubt be most consonant with the feelings of the Duke of Richmond. A little reflection, however, must convince the most impetuous opponent of Sir Robert Peel that such a plan would have slight chance of ultimate success. * * * * Whatever may have been the first thoughts of the protectionist peers, it is not likely that their deliberate resolution will be in favour of an extreme course. It is much more probable that a compromise will be attempted; and although nothing of this sort can in reality meet with better success than would attend an unqualified opposition to the bill, the chances may appear to be more in its favour. Supposing that the high protection peers can be got to abandon their present position as untenable, and to join with men of more moderate views in making a stand for a low fixed duty, it may be imagined that, on that ground, a compromise can be effected. The advocates of such a course will urge that several of those who voted for Sir Robert Peel's bill supported the man rather than the measure, and that a reform less sweeping, if sanctioned by the House of Lords, will find a majority of the Commons to accept it rather than leave the question to be settled by a general election, carried on under circumstances of fierce excitement and exasperation. Upon some such calculation as this the intention is entertained of opposing to the Government Bill, when it reaches the Upper House, the proposition of a moderate fixed duty."

The notion of the protectionists taking up with a "low fixed duty," or a "moderate fixed duty," may seem chimerical to many of those who have still ringing in their ears the old Bond-street shouts of "No compromise," and "No surrender." For ourselves, we can perceive nothing at all chimerical in it. The world has seen enough, during the last week, in the sudden oblivion which overtook the landlords, with respect to everything they had so long been saying about the "infinite preferableness" of immediate or deferred repeal, to be able to judge what these passionate and random dicta of landlordism are good for. "Small fish better than none," or "half a loaf better than no bread," will now be the Richmond motto. Now that "protection in its integrity" is done for, we may expect a stout fight for the fragments. The merest odds and ends will be thankfully received, or impudently solicited. There are men among them, we do believe, who would risk a revolution for a "protection" sixpence. We think it in the highest degree probable, that the Morning Chronicle's exposition of protectionist policy is true to the letter.

Now, what is the country's security, in the event of this daring experiment on the public patience being actually tried? Suppose the lords really do that which it is said and believed they mean to do; suppose the ministerial measure thrown out by "amendments;" suppose a dissolution of Parliament, and an "appeal to the people;"—where is our security for the instant and crushing defeat of the audacious attempt?

Simply that which the League, and the League's

Parliamentary friends have taken, from first to last, and especially during the past week. If Sir Robert Peel cannot pass his measure, we, who have never linked our cause with Sir Robert Peel and his measure, are ready to go on with our measure. We have kept our old faith; we have maintained our old impregnable position; we have placed and kept our cause out of the reach of party politics and Parliamentary diplomacy; and we are prepared for all contingencies. Even a Ministerial and Parliamentary compliance with protectional suggestions of "amendment"—a thing, however, which it would be most unjust to Sir Robert Peel to speak of as in any way probable—would make no other difference to us than a difference of time. We should do with the new Corn Law exactly that which we have done with its two predecessors—only we should make much shorter work of it. Happen what will, our course is plain before us. We have not made Sir Robert Peel's bill our bill—his defeat would not be our defeat—his submission would not be our submission. In any and every contingency, we have the whole undivided and unbroken force of our principles to fall back upon. The lords may do what they will;—our position is exactly that which it was, three or six months ago—with no other difference than that of the prodigious and incalculable increase of force derived from everything that has happened in the interval.

Is it necessary for us now to warn the country against a blind and careless over-confidence? We entreat our friends everywhere to be watchful and alert; to keep their heads cool and clear; to take nothing for granted; to be on the look-out for "dangers, traps, and pitfalls;" to be prepared to hear, some day soon, of a ministerial defeat, a crisis, and a dissolution of Parliament; and to have every thing in the best working order for answering her Majesty's "appeal to the people." That the issue of their lordships' experiment would be sure and swift destruction to the last remnant of protection is no ground whatever for believing that the experiment is not going to be tried.

FREE TRADE AND PEACE.

Notwithstanding the menacing tone and complexion of the recent intelligence from the United States, we still hold to the belief that there will be no war—can be no war—between nations whom the ties of commercial intercourse and amity are about to bind together in a more effectual union even than that of a common descent and language, and similar laws and institutions. Were the case, indeed, merely and exclusively one for diplomacy to settle, there would really be ground for well nigh despairing of a pacific adjustment. All overtures of compromise successively rejected; arbitration twice offered, and twice refused; formal notice about to be given, that a settlement of some sort must be had without further delay;—all this has unquestionably a most bellicose aspect. At this moment it is certainly impossible to see how war is to be eventually avoided without concessions either by one party or the other, which there is no apparent reason for expecting that any party will consent to make. Still, though not seeing this, we entirely believe in the sure predominance of the mutual necessities and common interests created by free commercial intercourse over the war madness just now raging among a portion of the American people. By pursuits, habits, and interests, they are essentially a pacific people, despite all the fierce and foolish talk with which their halls of legislation have lately echoed. Their history is proof enough of this. For sixty years and more that they have been an independent nation, they have most perseveringly kept the peace, with the exception only of a brief contest provoked by ourselves—and this is a good deal more than any European nation can say for itself. We are unable to believe that now, when a new and potent stimulus is about to be offered to their peaceful industry, in the shape of a large and permanent new market for its produce, they will suddenly be found untrue to their enduring interests, their habitual character, and their traditional maxims of policy.

It will, of course, be borne in mind, that those recent acts of the American Cabinet and Congress, which look so warlike, were determined on in ignorance of that approaching change in our commercial policy which will effect so thorough and sweeping an alteration in the mutual relations and interests of the two countries. The resolution in-favour of giving the twelve months' notice to terminate the joint-occupancy convention (which notice, by the way, is not necessarily and intrinsically a war measure) was adopted, it will be remembered, on the 9th of February—only five days after the sailing, from our shores, of the monthly packet which carried out the intelligence of the Ministerial plan of Free Trade, announced to the House of Commons in the last week of January. That that resolution would not have been carried, had the arrival of this intelligence preceded the conclusion of the debate, is more than we can venture to affirm, in view of all that had previously taken place. But we are fully persuaded that its arrival now will be a vast accession to the moral and political force of the peace party, and render it next to impossible for any class of politicians to hurry the American people into a palpably suicidal contest. We are confirmed in this conviction by the intelligent Washington correspondent of the Times, who, on the 4th of February, wrote from the scene of action as follows:

"If Great Britain desires to settle by negotiation the dispute respecting Oregon, and at the same time strengthen the bonds of peace between herself and the United States, let a commercial treaty be negotiated. Settle the Oregon question by dividing it by the 49th parallel, and then negotiate such terms of admission into the English ports for the pork, beef, grain, bread-stuffs, cheese, butter, lard, rice, &c., of the United States as shall make you the best customers for these agricultural products of the United States as you now are for their cotton, and you immediately unite the whole farming interest with the present peace party, and you forge a bond of union between the two countries which it will be almost impossible to sever, or disturb by war."

The writer was not aware that the "commercial treaty" was in process of formation and announcement at the very moment he was penning his recommendation of it—and this without troubling the diplomatists. We have learned at last how to make our "commercial treaties," without wasting time and patience on "negotiation." Renouncing all pretence of making a good bargain—asking for no "reciprocity" stipulations—waiting for no foreign signature or ratification—we have taken the commercial law of the world into our own hands, and are about establishing that surest and simplest of all "commercial treaties," of which merchants are the only negotiators plenipotentiary, and ledgers and bills of exchange the only diplomatic notes and protocols. Some time about the 20th of last month—eleven days after the passing of the obnoxious resolution of Congress, the American people would become acquainted with the fact, that the best and richest corn-market in the world is about to be thrown finally open to the produce of their agricultural and corn-growing western states—and not a syllable said of "terms." A few days will now bring us their first answer to this "message of peace." We shall be greatly surprised if that answer be not such as amply to justify the faith of those who look to Free Trade to unravel the entanglements of diplomacy, and avert the horrors and miseries of war.

What a significant tribute it is to the truth and power of the great principle in whose name we have leagued ourselves, that in all difficult and anxious exigencies—foreign no less than domestic—a Free Trade policy presents itself as the only sure resort of baffled and harassed statesmanship! All the lines of sound and wise policy converge to one point. Whether the peril be famine in Ireland, or "a cloud in the west," whether the problem to be solved be, how to feed and employ our own people, or how to avert with honour an insane and destructive war;—in either case, the solution is the same. At home and abroad COMMERCIAL LIBERTY forces itself on our statesmen, as the only solid guarantee against national calamity.

STATE OF TRADE.—MANCHESTER, Tuesday.—The Indian letters have this morning been received. They are not favourable. Sales were tardy, and prices declining. Money also continued tight. The war had a prejudicial effect.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846

Seventh Week, ending Saturday, March 7.

Although the events of Friday night, the 27th of February, are familiar to all our readers, the historical importance of an occasion so memorable will excuse our reverting to it, more especially as we could not do so in our last publication.

It will be recollected that the early part of Friday was occupied by Mr. Ferrand, after his peculiar fashion, and in that style on which, amongst every member of the House of Commons, there is but one opinion, and that a very decided one. Perhaps we overrate the fact in using the phrase "every member." Lord John Manners is esteemed for his amiability, and he is enthusiastic, on all occasions, in praise of chivalric feeling and our "ancient aristocracy." He usually sits beside Mr. Ferrand, or rather Mr. Ferrand usually sits beside him, in that portion of the house where the protectionists cluster, or, as Mr. Cobden terms it, in a phrase which is becoming a noted one, "under the gangway." There is no disputing tastes; if Lord Manners likes Mr. Ferrand, it is nobody's business: but, after all, the majority of the House of Commons is composed of gentlemen, and though not indisposed to use a boisterous, blustering, bawling "fugleman," when he serves a turn, it is clear that there prevails a very general distaste of the manners of Lord John Manners's companion.

But Mr. Ferrand was the unconscious cause of performing a good service on Friday night. Mr. Bright reminded him how he shrunk from maintaining, in a court of justice, his base allegation that the chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League, Mr. George Wilson, and Mr. Rawson, were present at a public meeting where the idea of assassinating the Prime Minister was started. This point was taken up by Mr. D'Israeli, in a speech in which he criticised the Anti-Corn Law League, praised the purity of his own motives, and censured with a bitterness amounting to cold ferocity, the manners and conduct of Mr. Roebuck. This brought up Sir Robert Peel; and the First Lord of the Treasury handsomely retracted the imputation which he had thrown out, three years ago, on Mr. Cobden. He ought to have done it long ago, but "better late than never;" and now that it is over, the scene deserves to be recorded, not merely as exceedingly creditable to both gentlemen, but also for the moral which it conveys. Had Mr. Cobden been actuated by the pride and the passion of the school of false "honour," had he even acted on the suggestion thrown out at the time by a leading weekly organ of the liberal party, he would have given Sir R. Peel the alternative of retracting his words, or of "naming his friend." But he has waited for and obtained a nobler, a godlike satisfaction—the voluntary, unsolicited, expression of regret—a regret which, we believe, has long filled the mind of Sir R. Peel—that he should have been betrayed into throwing out a shocking insinuation.

The debate was commenced by Mr. Banks, whose sounding platitudes invariably weary the house. Mr. Bickham Escott, who has become an especial object of dislike to the protectionists, followed in an admirable speech. Captain Gladstone, the brother of the Secretary for the Colonies, and who represents Ipswich, declared himself an advocate of protection; and then came the speech, not merely of the night, but even of the debate. When Mr. Cobden rose, all around him set up a hearty cheer, as if to mark their gratification that his recent illness had not prevented him from showing himself at the closing scene of this never-to-be-forgotten Waterloo of Free Trade against Monopoly. It was gratifying to observe that, not merely the members on the treasury and ministerial benches joined in the cheer, but even some of the protectionists showed their good feeling by participating in it. This grateful tribute over, dead silence ensued; and Mr. Cobden began in a low voice, which, however, gathered strength as he went on and warmed to his subject; but from the first, so perfectly still and quiet was the assembly, that not a word was lost. He commenced by stating that he had carefully read over every word of the debate, although he had been unable to attend the house in person, and it appeared to him that it might be conveniently distributed under two heads. The first was merely the invective of an angry party against the chief whom they had lost; the second treated mainly of the propriety of appealing to the country.

before legislating on this measure, and slightly on the merits of the case.

To those who have never heard Mr. Cobden speak in the House of Commons, it will be difficult to convey an idea of the effect which such a speech as the one on Friday night produces. No matter how entangled the debate may have become (and entangled enough it was after three weeks' discussion), it instantly assumes the shape of a clear, explicit account, in which all the items are balanced, and their precise value assigned. You marvel that you have not seen all this before; and you perceive that the assembly he is addressing is marvelling at it too. But this is very far indeed from being the sole merit of a practical, acute, and sagacious intellect. The members of the House of Commons—at least a majority of them—are shut up in circles, clubs, and coteries; and Mr. Cobden walks into the house as if he had come from another sphere, purposely to enlighten "honourable members" as to the nature of a world of which they are wholly ignorant. Every man listening to him felt that he was tearing away the veil from the face of delusion, and placing the actual state of the country before the legislature. Admirably he treated the demand for an "appeal to the country." Assuming for a moment, for the sake of argument (although he utterly denied the fact), that they could obtain a numerical majority in that house, of whom would that majority and of whom would the minority be composed? Why, in the minority would be found the representatives of every town in England that held 25,000 inhabitants—the sixteen metropolitan members, and the members for the metropolitan county—the representatives of Edinburgh and of Dublin, of Manchester, Glasgow, and Liverpool—all the intelligence, all the active power of the country. Contrast the significance of the votes of the members for London, and that of the representatives of Woodstock or Buckingham. Public opinion would be represented by that minority, while the majority would be composed of the representatives of the pocket boroughs and the nomination counties, with their 50% tenants-at-will. Public opinion, said Mr. Cobden, is of such force, that in 1745, had the same unanimity existed in favour of the Stuart dynasty, as at this moment exists in favour of this measure, that dynasty would at this moment have been sitting on the throne of these realms.

The happy manner in which Mr. Cobden meets interruptions was strikingly exemplified repeatedly during his speech. When the protectionists were shouting out "No, no," to his test of public opinion, he asked, "What, then, will you take as a test? Do you require to be tossed in a blanket?" This raised shouts of laughter.

After Mr. Cobden had concluded, Mr. Spooner and Mr. Borthwick both spoke, but the house was not in the slightest humour to hear either of them. Then Lord George Bentinck, son of the Duke of Portland, who had been in training for a fortnight, delivered a dreadfully dreary speech of nearly three hours, commencing before twelve o'clock, and not concluding till twenty minutes to three. Nothing, however, put him down; and consequently he had the benefit of having the best part of his speech to himself, for the house only listened at brief intervals, and the newspapers have given it very short. Then came the division—

Against it 337

Majority in favour of the Government plan, 97

Much cheering marked the announcement of these numbers.

On Monday both branches of the legislature were engaged in listening to the accounts given, by the Earl of Ripon in the House of Lords, and by Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons, of the recent military operations in the Punjab, and voting the thanks to the Governor-General of India, and to the officers and troops, by whom the dearly-purchased victories of December last were gained.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Craven Berkeley moved for a Committee of Inquiry into the circumstances attending the getting up of a petition, purporting to come from Cheltenham, but bearing the Manchester post mark, to which certain signatures were alleged to be forged. Mr. Bright satisfactorily explained the circumstances, showing that an irregularity had occurred, but no fraud. The opportunity, however, was a tempting one for the Ferrand and Newdegate section to advance a charge of wholesale manufacturing of petitions by the Anti-Corn-Law League. Nothing, however, was made out of this, and the Committee of Inquiry was appointed. But on Tuesday Mr. Newdegate moved that it be an instruction to the committee to inquire into the system of objecting to votes in the registry, which led to a lengthened, though aimless discussion. All that Mr. Newdegate took by his motion was a very unequivocal demonstration of the fact that the innocent Conservatives have most extensively played at a game, which has now been turned against them by their opponents. Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell joined in the discussion; and Mr. Charles Buller resolved the whole argument into a tu quoque one, and showed that if an inquiry were gone into at all, it must not be a one-sided one, but embracing the conduct of both parties and all parties. Mr. Newdegate is not a peculiarly bright young man; but he opened his eyes wide enough to see the consequences of his motion, which he withdrew.

On Monday night the house went into a committee, without objection from any one. The SPEAKER having vacated the chair, the mace was placed under the table, at which Mr. Greene, the chairman of committees, took his place. Then

Mr. Villiers rose, to make his announced motion that the repeal of the Corn Law should be IMMEDIATE. The speech in which this was done was pithy, terse, argumentative, and, though short, completely exhausted the reasons for an immediate as well as a total repeal. When he had concluded, Colonel Sibthorp got up, and played a variety of antics, which, though amusing at first, grew tiresome. The whole fun of the gallant colonel lies in his manner. Sir John Tyrrell has really some humour in him, but Colonel Sibthorp has none; and when he makes one laugh, it is simply because of the absurdity of his assertions, and the superfluous gesticulation with which they are accompanied. For instance, when some members, tired of his nonsense, called out "question," he waved his hand, pointing grandly towards the door, and explained that if they were tired they could walk out! Again, when he found that he could not read his "documents," (he never gets up without sets of papers in his hand, though what they relate to is scarcely ever known), he avowed that his eyes were decaying, but, tapping his breast, he exclaimed, "It's all right here."

In the course of the night several agriculturists spoke, but they all shrunk from "immediate" repeal, notwithstanding their loud taunts. One of them, Mr. Goring, revived the old "whine" about incumbrances; which led to a happy reply from Mr. Bright. He told the agriculturists that their perpetual complaints were more pitiable than the appeal of the candidate in Mr. Dickens's portrait of "Vote for Scroggins and eleven small children!"

The chief speakers of Monday night were Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Bright, and Lord John Russell. The noble Lord told the House of Commons that it was as competent to alter the protective system, as the House of Commons, which passed the septennial act, was competent to prolong its existence from three to seven years. This argument put the protectionists "under the gangway" into a terrible passion. There they sat, Lord John Manners, along with such eminent public men as Lord George Bentinck, Mr. Ferrand, and Mr. Borthwick; and they were determined to "kick up a row." Accordingly, they moved the adjournment of the debate, which, after a division, in which 227 were against 70, was ultimately yielded, for when a few men are determined, they can renew motions for adjournment till the House is wearied out.

On Tuesday the adjourned debate was renewed by the perpetual Mr. Banks, and Mr. Peter Borthwick amused the house by informing it that he was in the habit of retiring into his "library" to study the political economists, who, however, had failed in convincing him of the practical advantages of Free Trade! Again, there was Mr. Liddell, who placed Bremen in the Baltic!—a blunder which was corrected by Mr. Hutt. Lord George Bentinck, too, told the house that the protectionists were determined on resistance, and will fight the battle from post to pillar, and from pillar to post. Napoleon, he said, had remarked that the English never knew when they were beaten; and so the protectionists never were to know when they were beaten. This bravado brought up

Mr. Cobden, who, in another of his powerful speeches, placed the case in its true light before the house. He reminded Lord George Bentinck that the protectionists were beaten by—Englishmen; and warned them against a protracted resistance, which will compel the Anti-Corn Law League to maintain its organisation, and concentrate its energies.

Mr. Ward, and other members, as Mr. Hudson, Sir John Hanmer, Colonel Sibthorp, Mr. Wakley, Mr. T. Duncombe, &c., took part in the debate, which terminated by a division.

For Mr. Villiers's amendment 78

Majority for Government plan, . . . 187

On Thursday night, the knot of protectionists "under the gangway," showed their sense of what is due to the great interests of the country. Under the leadership of statesmen of the weight, character, and influence possessed by Lord George Bentinck, Mr. Peter Borthwick, and Mr. Ferrand, they mustered to annoy the Government, and carry out the "post and pillar" policy. "Notices of motion" take precedence on Thursdays; and on last Thursday, the first on the list was a motion by Mr. Etwall, the member for Andover, for a committee of inquiry into the Andover Union case. Sir James Graham offered to produce all the documents and correspondence; and Mr. Etwall evinced a disposition to postpone his motion. But this did not suit the protectionists. Solemn Mr. Newdegate had a motion for a select committee, to inquire into an alleged organised and extensive system of fraudulent and vexatious objections to the votes of a great number of duly qualified electors for the northern division of Warwickshire, the northern division of Staffordshire, and certain divisions of other counties. And on this motion there was an amendment in the following form:

Mr. Charles Buller.—To move, as an amendment to Mr. Newdegate's motion, That Leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent frivolous objections to persons registered as electors for Members of Parliament for Great Britain.

Mr. Newdegate was determined to bring on his motion; and so Mr. Etwall, seeing that his withdrawal would not expedite the Government business, persevered.

The case took up the entire night. For about two hours the house was so thinly attended, that it might have been "counted out." But about nine o'clock the protectionists came down, and took their stations "under the gangway." There was Lord George Bentinck, who is trying the "doctrine of chances"—not on the turf, but in the House of Commons; whether or not he has any heavy bets depending on the issue, we cannot tell. There was placid Mr. Peter Borthwick, whose great stake in the country compels him to take a leading part in the "post and pillar" policy. And there was Mr. Ferrand, whose incessant cheer rises above all other sounds, and pierces the ear like the war-whoop of a wild Indian. These men are bent on showing that they come up to Mr. D'Israeli's notion of a "great statesman," in the possession of "a great idea." Their "great idea" is, that any stick will do to beat a dog with; and any sort of obstruction will answer the purpose of impeding the Government measure. Sir James Graham gave way to what appeared to be the feeling of the house, and consented to a committee of inquiry. At this concession such a burst of cheering—sarcastic cheering—came from "under the gangway," as was quite wonderful to hear. But then Sir James Graham refused to include in that inquiry an investigation into the causes which led to the resignation of Mr. Parker, the Assistant Poor Law Commissioner, who had been concerned in the Andover case. This was all that the protectionists wanted. They were getting afraid that they would not have their "division." An amendment was moved. Judas spake, not because he "cared for the poor," but because he "bare the bag." The protectionists voted, not because they were anxious about Mr. Parker, but because they saw they had a chance of beating the Government; and the Government were beat. There were 92 to 69, being a majority of 23 against Ministers.

The following are the amendments which have to be proposed in committee on the Government resolutions:

Mr. Monckton Milnes.—To move the omission of all words, in the resolution respecting the importation of corn, referring to the cessation or alteration of duties to be paid in the year 1849.

The object of this amendment is to render the reduced sliding scale permanent, instead of ending in three years.

Mr. W. O. Stanley.—To propose as an amendment to Sir Robert Peel's plan, That in lieu of the duties now payable on the importation of corn, grain, meal, or flour, the product of Foreign Countries, there shall be paid a fixed duty of five shillings per quarter upon Wheat, two shillings and sixpence on barley, and two shillings on oats; meal and flour in proportion.

This of course is a five shillings fixed duty

Mr. Blackmore.—To propose, instead of the propositions of Sir Robert Peel,—

That, in lieu of the duties now payable on the importation of corn, grain, meal, or flour, there shall, from the passing of the act, be paid the following duties, viz.—

If imported from any foreign country,	s. d.
For every quarter of Wheat	5 0
Do. of Barley	2 6
Do. of Oats	2 0

Other kinds of grain, meal, &c. in usual proportions.

That the said duties shall, as received, be paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of the Poor Law Commissioners.

That the money to be raised hereafter for the relief of the poor, the rates for levying the same shall be made upon land, distinct and separate from the rates upon dwellings-houses, buildings, and other property, and shall be distinguished by the name of "The Land Rate."

That the Poor Law Commissioners shall, every half year, apportion the money so placed to their credit in the Bank of England, to each of the unions or parishes in England and Wales, for which rates to the said land rate are made in such proportions as the amount of the said land rate for each union or parish shall bear to the aggregate amount of all the land rates of England and Wales collectively.

That on the sums thus apportioned being ascertained, the said Poor Law Commissioners shall transmit an account thereof to each of the unions or parishes to which the same has been apportioned; whereupon the Commissioners shall be rated in the land rate for such union or parish at the sum so by them stated and apportioned, and shall pay the same in like manner as other rated persons; and the sum so rated and paid shall be considered as paid in liquidation of the land rate, and be deducted therefrom, and the amount remaining after such deduction shall be the sum to be raised on the several persons rated to the said land rate in equal proportions in the pound, according to their several assessments.

ANALYSIS OF THE DIVISION ON SIR R. PEELE'S MEASURE.

We are anxious to direct attention to the analysis of the division on Sir Robert Peel's measure, which will be found below. This statistical examination of the relative condition of the protectionists and Free Traders, shows that the strength of the former consists mainly in the pocket boroughs and nomination counties. But before entering further into figures, we must notice those places, the representatives of which voted on different sides, such as South Lancashire and Liverpool. It is voluntary disfranchisement to send an "aye" and a "no" to the House of Commons. It is worse than a compromise, for it is an utter annihilation of principle; and we trust, therefore, that the places which now present the contemptible aspect of "halting between two opinions," will, at the first opportunity, redeem their character, and take their stand either for us or against us. We firmly believe that if such an opportunity were afforded to these neutralised constituencies, they would, in the great majority of instances, if not in all, return Free-Traders. In all the large constituencies, the repealers of the Corn Laws are found to predominate; but as the number of electors diminishes, the number of monopolist representatives will be found to increase in the same proportion. The members for rotten boroughs were unable to resist the real representatives of the people in the struggle for reform, and the present division of forces is in all respects similar to that which existed when the first division was taken on the Reform Bill. But though an examination of the relative strength of parties gives to the Free Traders an assurance of victory, they must not believe that this victory will be won without great labour and exertion. The struggle will not end with the present Parliament; the protectionists vaunt that they will renew their efforts at the next election; and our analysis must be an important guide in the preparations to be made for that event. We exhort the Free Traders, in all those places where the representation is divided, to form electoral associations without delay. To many of the counties we can declare that the day of their redemption is not distant; and we believe that the cause of Free Trade is not hopeless in many boroughs now misrepresented by monopolists. It is necessary to make early preparations for the contingency of a dissolution; and the tabular view we have given will not only aid in the examination of the general policy to be pursued, but will point out the special duties which devolve upon Free Traders in their several localities.

The following is a tabulated statement of the total number of Boroughs and Borough Electors, represented by the majority and minority who voted for and against Sir Robert Peel's measure:—

THE LANCASHIRE MEMBERS IN THE DIVISION.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

A very natural inquiry in this neighbourhood and district is, "How have the Lancashire county and borough members voted?" In all, this county sends twenty-six representatives to Parliament,—four county, and twenty two borough, members. We are sure that all who desire to see signs of progress, will feel the deepest mortification to find that both the northern and southern division of the county have on this occasion been neutralised, in voice and vote, in the legislature, the members of each division having voted on opposite sides; so that neither North nor South Lancashire, by its representatives, has been able to say either yes or no, to the ministerial measure on the Corn Laws. In the southern division, Lord Francis Egerton says "Yes"; Mr. William Entwistle cries "No." In North Lancashire, Mr. William Patten supports Sir Robert Peel; Mr. Talbot Clifton votes against him. Two Lancashire boroughs are in the same unenviable condition,—Liverpool saying "Yes" by Lord Sandon, and "No" by Sir Howard Douglas; and Lancaster, by Mr. Greene supporting Sir Robert Peel's measure, and dealing it a back-handed blow by the vote of Mr. George Marton. We commend this state of things to the earnest consideration of the county and borough electors; it is for them to say whether they shall in this way be virtually deprived of all "voice potential" in the legislature, on one of the most important questions that ever agitated Parliament and the country. Only one Lancashire borough has, by its member, voted wholly the wrong way. Mr. John Ireland Blackburne has thus added a further stimulus to the Free Traders of Warrington, to return a better man at the next general election. Wigan has been reduced to one vote on this occasion, by the recent determination of Captain Lindsay not to defend his seat; but that one vote, as every body would be sure who knows Mr. Standish, was rightly employed, that gentleman having paired off with Mr. A. B. Cresswell, the protectionist member for Northumberland. Oldham, too, was temporarily deprived of one of its votes, General Johnson being amongst the absent (without pairing), it is probable from ill health. Mr. John Fielden voted with ministers. The other boroughs of Lancashire were all on the right side; all, by their members, supported the Free Trade measure of Sir Robert Peel, Ashton, Blackburn, Bolton, Bury, Clitheroe, Manchester, Preston, Rochdale, and Salford,—all the members for these boroughs swelled the ranks of the majority in the memorable division of Friday last. The position of the Lancashire members, then, may be thus analysed:—

Voted for Sir R. Peel's measure.....	18
Voted against it.....	5
Vacant.....	1

REPRESENTATION OF BRIDPORT.—Mr. Cochrane made his entree on Friday. In the evening the late member delivered a Free Trade address. An address, with a long requisition, was carried the same day on behalf of Mr. Romilly, a consistent Liberal and Free Trader, who, it is understood, will stand the poll. The protection candidate has been announced, but, in the present state of parties here, it is not expected he will be put in nomination.

BRIDPORT ELECTION.—The nomination takes place to-day. The canvass in favour of Mr. John Romilly is said to have been highly promising in its reception by the most influential inhabitants of the borough. Mr. Cochrane has striven hard, with slender success, to explain his inconsistencies; and there is the fairest prospect of Bridport returning to Parliament a representative able and willing to co-operate with Mr. Mitchell in an honourable, genuine, and vigorous support of liberal principles and liberal institutions.

REPRESENTATION OF LINCOLN.—A report is in circulation amongst the electors of Lincoln, that Mr. Alderman Rudgard has received a letter, which states that if Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton can be shown, that with the present state of parties, he has any chance of being returned as one of the representatives of Lincoln, he will again become a candidate. A public meeting is to be forthwith called, to take the matter into consideration.

REPRESENTATION OF LYMINGTON.—Mr. George Koppel, a native of the town, has announced his intention of offering himself as a candidate for the representation of Lymington, Hants, at the next election. On the motto, "The greatest good to the greatest number," he says his political views are based. It is not his wish, he adds, to disturb the town by a premature canvass.—Post.

NORTH NOTTS.—The final close of the poll was, for Lord Henry Bentinck 1,741; for Lord Lincoln 218.

SALISBURY.—Lord Ashley is spoken of as likely to be a candidate for the representation of this city, whenever a vacancy occurs.

THE "INFAMOUS FABRICATION."

(From the Times.)

The public will not forget that from the 4th of December, upon which day we announced the determination of Sir R. Peel and his colleagues to repeal the Corn Laws, until the meeting of Parliament, when the truth could no longer be concealed, we were twice a day assailed with whole columns of the grossest abuse by the Mrs. Gamp and Mrs. Harris of the press,—that, not only was our announcement stigmatised as an "infamous fabrication," but that the conductors of this journal were accused of having wilfully set abroad a falsehood for the purpose of profiting by alleged operations in the stock, share, and corn markets. We have hitherto left these decrepit scolds unnoticed; the events of the last month have been a sufficient refutation of their calumnies; but a confession is so rare among those convicted of falsehood, that we cannot refrain from giving the first of the cronies who has shown symptoms of repentance the benefit of the following extract, from an article which she published last evening:—

"On the evening preceding that announcement of The Times, which we contradicted by authority, being instructed (unconsciously on our part) to 'tell a lie in the words of truth,' an insult and an injury which we must ever remember, on the evening of the 3d of December letters were, we know, despatched to public men of influence in the United States, by officers of the Government, making announcements similar to that made by The Times of the 4th. We have indeed, now little doubt that the article of The Times proceeded directly from the Treasury, and that the false part of it, the alleged decision of the Cabinet, was thrown in with a view to American use."

THE LEAGUE AND THE REGISTRATION COURTS.

(From the Daily News.)

This is the first year since the passing of the Reform Act in which the people have had fair play in any portion of the county registration. It is the first year in which, to any great extent, organisation has been confronted by organisation, claim by claim, and objection by objection. The squires have had it all their own way hitherto; and in their new affected purism must submit to be reminded of their past misdeeds. They have crammed the lists with sham voters. The first onset of the League upon the registration laid bare a mass of falsification. Last year, a commencement was made with South Lancashire. The result was, that 878 objections were sustained; considerably more than annihilating Mr. Entwistle's majority. In the West Riding of Yorkshire, 1,242 names were expunged by the revising barrister. During the last revision, the objections pronounced valid were, in East Gloucester, 249; East Somerset, 358; South Cheshire, 177; East Surrey, 367; North Staffordshire, 700; South Staffordshire, 442; North Cheshire, 349; Middlesex, 869; North Lancashire, 715; South Lancashire, 251 (in addition to last year's expurgation). A total of 6,600 non-legal votes in ten counties, argues an industrious manufacture. It was time to search into this abuse. Of course there must be many struck off, to whom it would be absurd to attribute fraud. But as in all this operation the League has been put to a very trifling expense for costs, which are given when the objections are frivolous and vexatious, a large amount of fraud is presumable. To those who hold their seats by such means, it must seem very desirable to raise a dust and stop the progress of detection and correction.

There are forty-two counties in England and Wales (not reckoning the electoral subdivisions) yet untouched. The registration ought to be cleansed in them also, before that appeal to the electors, for which some protectionists are so clamorous. It is not probable that they are in any better condition. The preference, for the commencement, has been simply founded on local convenience. Manchester, Leeds, and London have been its central points. The forms required by the Act render officers and agents necessary, for copying, witnessing, and many other operations, besides ascertaining whether there be grounds of objection. But no county ought to escape. The landlord influence has ample strength, when reduced within its legal boundaries. It must be taught to confine itself to the limits prescribed by the Act. It has no right to fictitious constituencies. Nobody suspected the extent of the imposition. Once ascertained in about a sixth of the country, as to representation, it is out of question that the remaining five-sixths should elude a like searching examination. The vote-factories must all be overhauled.

This work, though carried on conjunctively with, is in itself quite independent of, the introduction of new voters by their purchasing the legal qualification. It is merely a purification of the existing registries. It reduces them to legality. It carries the law into practical effect. The law may be good or bad. The disfranchising limitations may be wise or foolish. The squires had a hand in making them, which is more than can be said of the League. If unwise or unjust, let them be repealed. But anyhow, there must be the same law for both parties. That is only now beginning to be the fact in practice. The abuse has been untouched. Fraud has stalked abroad triumphantly, buckling swords and spurs upon its chosen ones. They must now produce their representative title deeds. Shearing pigs suggests but a faint idea of the consequent outcry.

The chance of a fair registration for counties is contingent on the existence of some such body as the League, at the head of a popular agitation. Individual exertion is utterly incompetent; and the little Subscription Societies, which have here and there existed, are almost as fruitless. It requires clear heads and active hands; a large establishment and a long purse. The law is made for landlords. In ordinary times any struggle is vain, either with their legitimate power, or with its fraudulent additions. For electoral right in counties, the League is a godsend. People should make the most of it. They have never had such a chance before, and never may again. Let them watch closely the attempt to obstruct its progress.

If, rather than endure further exposure and the loss of legislative honours and political power which must follow such exposure, the protectionists will honestly consent to simplify the system, they will, we are sure, meet with cordial co-operation. But it must be no one-sided reform. The franchise must not be narrowed. The expense and trouble of these registration battles must be materially abated. The technical conditions of a legal vote must be reduced; and so reduced as to render it much more easy for the honest, and more difficult for the fraudulent, to get upon the list. Repeated objections, the circumstances being the same, must be repressed by heavy penalties. A simple uniform suffrage, like that of the 10% householders in towns, would perhaps be the best remedy. Or a general registration of landed property, large and small, in which all charges of ownership would be recorded. Abusing the League does not mend the mischief in the least. It only shows that they have laboured not in vain, and have known how to plant their blows on the weak and sore places of monopoly. They will not fail to profit by the further knowledge of that kind which the present discussions afford, and for applying which there will be plentiful opportunity during the ensuing three years of pettifogging protection and continued struggle.

GENERAL DEBIT AND CREDIT ACCOUNT OF THE SPECIAL BURTHENS AND EXEMPTIONS OF LAND.

(From the Economist.)

Judging by the language held by some of the most influential members of the House of Lords, we are led to expect that the Corn Law repeal will be opposed, in their House, chiefly on the ground of alleged burthens peculiarly borne by land; and, at least, if they agree to the measure proposed by the Government, we may look for some attempt to change the present distribution of taxation, local or general, in some way which they will deem more favourable to the agricultural body as a class, and to land as a property. Such is the distinct object for which Lord Beaumont's Committee was sought and has been granted. Now, we feel assured that no proposition of the kind will be accepted by the House of Commons or by the country, whether attached to the new Corn Bill, as a condition of its passing, or passed as a separate and independent measure. We own we are not without considerable apprehensions lest an attempt be made, if not to defeat the bill in the House of Lords by attaching some such condition, at least to delay its progress on the pretence of waiting for the report of that Committee. No effort should be saved to prevent such a catastrophe.

The great object of complaint in the distribution of local burthens is, that real property only is rated to them, by which means all capital represented in stock in trade and money in the funds escape any charge for the maintenance of the poor and other local objects. This objection is made with more semblance of good reason, from the fact that the statute of Queen Elizabeth providing for the poor expressly includes all such personal property as rateable thereto. It has, however, long been abandoned as an impracticable attempt to rate personal property, although the exemption is provided for only by an annual bill. This exemption, however, of personal property is by no means the partial measure which those interested in land are in the habit of representing it, or that it may at first sight appear to be. All real property, of whatever kind, whether consisting of land, houses, mills, docks, canals, or railways, is rated to these burthens; and by the most recent Parliamentary papers, it appears that land does not now represent quite one half of the whole. But then it is complained that stock in trade and capital employed in commerce, from which large profits are derived, are exempt. True; but the stock in trade of the cultivator of the soil, whether owner or tenant, consisting of machinery, implements, cattle, flocks, and corn, and the whole capital engaged in his trade, are also exempted. And if we are to accept as an approximation to the truth of the computations made by Mr. Allison, Mr. McQueen, and others, of the comparative annual value of the products of the soil, no part of which are rated, and those of trade and manufactures, the exemption must be very greatly in favour of the land. Now, it is obvious that any tax placed upon farming stock or capital would indirectly be a charge upon the rent of the land; therefore, as between land as a property and all other capital used in other pursuits, the exemptions would appear to be balanced. Land, in round figures, at present pays one-half of these rates—other real property pays the other half. Include in the assessments the capital and stock used in both classes of pursuits, and while the nominal rate "in the pound" would be greatly reduced by being spread over a larger surface, yet still land and its stock and capital would pay the one-half, while other property and its stock and capital would pay the other half.

But even admitting, which clearly cannot be seriously insisted upon, that the whole share of the poor rates payable by land is a burthen upon land, and not shared by other capital and stock, we have already shown in our article of the 14th that there are other exemptions in favour of land which do not apply in any degree to personal property, which more than counterbalance this and all the other alleged special burthens.

The same remarks that we have now applied in respect to the poor rates and the apportionment of their assessment, apply in every respect to the highway rate and the church rate. We showed in that article, by reference to Parliamentary documents, that the proportions of the poor and county rates, and of the highway and church rates, contributed by land, are as follow:

Proportion of poor's and county rates collected from	£
Ditto of highway and church rates, ditto	496,974
Total	£2,593,611

Admitting, therefore, the whole allegations respecting the exclusive payment of those burthens as really true, which they are obviously not, then this sum represents the whole amount paid by land. Be it always remembered that a similar amount is paid by other kinds of property, and that if other capital and stock are exempted in trades and manufactures, so they are also in farming.

With regard to the alleged burthen of tithe, we have already shown (in our article of the 14th) that there can be no excuse for stating it as a charge on the owner of the land. It is a portion of the property, neither inherited nor purchased, and is no more a charge upon the rent which the landowner receives than would the share of the income be, which might be paid to a co-proprietor of an estate. To recompense the owner of land for the tithe would be to make him a present of it, as much as if he were compensated for a mortgage, or the interest held by a joint-proprietor.

With regard to the malt duty, this is obviously a tax paid by the consumer of the article, which is enhanced in price in order to repay the maltster for the sum advanced by him, in the same way as the sugar merchant is reimbursed for the customs' duty advanced by him. But it is alleged that the interests of the land are injured in consequence of the demand for barley being diminished from the lessened consumption caused by the tax. This, no doubt, is so far true. But if the consumption were ever so much increased, it could not be supplied by barley of English growth, as already we are obliged to import largely every year of this grain. An increased consumption, therefore, could only cause an increased use of foreign barley. But were it otherwise, can anything be more preposterous than to set up this claim? Exactly analogous to it would be the demand of the grocer, the tea dealer, or the spirit-merchant, for compensation for the necessary limit which the enormous duties imposed on those articles place upon their respective trades.

With respect to stamps, we have in our former article shown that this branch of the public income is as nearly as possible charged in equal proportions on all classes of the community.

Turning then to the exemptions of land. In our article of the 14th we show, by a calculation in every respect favourable to real property, that its exemption from the probate and legacy duty amounts at least to 1,675,946l. annually. We, however, committed an error in placing the whole of this amount as an exemption in respect to land only, as the calculation, in which land was stated as bearing a proportion of 52 per cent to the whole, included all real property. We are, therefore, only entitled to claim 52 per cent of that sum as an exemption to land, which will be 871,491l. annually. The next item of exemption stated was in respect to the horse duty;—in respect to which we made too low an estimate, as we only included the number of horses which had been charged, and for which exemptions were granted subsequently. We find, however, that it is not the custom for farmers to make any return of such horses at all. The number we stated as exempted from duty in 1841 was 435,002. In 1814 this class of horses, now exempted from duty, paid a low tax, and the number then was 937,898. It is not possible that this number can have diminished, but when we consider how much land has been brought under tillage during that period, it must be greatly increased. The exemptions from horse duty may be thus stated:—

In 1841—claimed for riding horses used by farmers renting under 500l. a-year, where only one horse is kept, 51,898 at 1l. 8s. 9d. each, and 10 per cent. ..	82,062
Horses employed in husbandry, at the average of the progressive duty taken as in 1814, 937,898 at 1l. 18s. 3d. and 10 per cent. ..	1,981,633
In 1841—horses exempted, specially, occasionally employed, otherwise than in agriculture, 17,056, at 1l. 18s. 3d. and 10 per cent. ..	35,878
In 1841—horses bred by bailiffs and herdsmen, exempted, were 1601 at 1l. 8s. 9d. and 10 per cent. ..	2,531
Total horse exemptions ..	£2,102,104

The total of the horse duty exempted from land amounts to a larger sum than the whole amount paid by that property to the poor rates altogether!!! This exemption, however, must be taken under one qualification. The amount of poor rates stated apply only to England and Wales. The exemption of the horse duty includes Scotland. When, however, we consider that we only calculated the same number of horses as now engaged in agriculture that paid duty as such in 1814, we make an ample allowance for the small portion of the whole, belonging to Scotland. The exemptions from window-duty claimed, in respect to houses occupied by labourers and farm houses of farms, under a rental of 200l. a-year, amounted in 1841, to 28,284l. And the exemptions on 66,778 dogs employed in the care of cattle and sheep amounted to 32,690l. Then there is an exemption from the duty on fire insurances, and also from the payment of tolls on the turnpike roads. There are no precise means of discovering the amount of these exemptions as applicable to land, but we may arrive at an approximation.

By the finance accounts for the year ending April 5, 1845, the amount yielded by fire-insurances was 1,003,669l. Taking it for granted that one-half of this sum represents moveable stock, and the other half buildings, and taking, it for granted, that the amount of farm stock insured throughout the country equals one-half the amount of stock in other trades, including household furniture, which we believe to be near the truth, then the exemption in favour of land will amount to 250,917l; which sum, considering the rapid increase of the number of fire-insurances effected of late years, appears below the real amount.

With regard to the exemptions from tolls on highways. By a Parliamentary paper, 580, September, 1843, it appears that the total revenue from turnpike roads in 1841, was 1,574,518l. It is impossible to compute what addition would be made to this sum, if all farmers' carts, waggons, and riding horses, going to and from market, conveying produce or manure, or being empty, paid the usual tolls; but when we consider the recurrence of one or two market-days in each week, in each market-town in the kingdom, and the immense number of farmers with carts, waggons, &c., who attend each, to say nothing of their use of the roads on other days, it would certainly appear that it would amount to a sum at least as large as is paid by travellers of all other classes. In agricultural and rural counties it must far exceed that sum. But to avoid the possibility of any exaggeration, we will consider the exemptions from toll to equal only one-half of the sum contributed by others; and this will show a yearly sum exempted in favour of the land of 787,209l.

We have now passed every item under consideration, and if with a leaning at all, towards the land. We will now put them together in the form of a clear debit and credit account.

Debit and Credit Account of the alleged Special Charges on Land, and of the Special Exemptions under Statute of Charges to which all other Property or Classes are liable:
Debit. £	Credits. £
To exemption from legacy and probate duty, on land only ..	871,491
Horse duty ..	2,102,104
Window duty ..	28,284
Dog duty ..	32,690
Fire Insurance ..	250,917
Turnpike tolls ..	787,209
£4,072,695	£4,072,695
Balance down against the land, £1,479,084.

Now we entirely deny, for reasons already explained, that either the poor rate, or the county rate, or highway rate, or church rate, are special burthens on land. All other property pays a sum equal to the land, and if the other capital and stock belonging to traders does not pay thereto, neither does that belonging to land. But were it otherwise—were it, as is asserted, that these charges are to be so classed as special burthens—then do we find special exemptions in favour of land amounting to a sum exceeding those charges by 1,479,084l., and without any corresponding exemptions whatever in favour of other classes.

One remark more and we close this case of the distribution of local and general taxation. Whatever may be the distribution of taxes, whether equal or not in the first instance, it is quite clear that they are soon equalised by the relative value which property chargeable thereto assumes; and though a tax unequally distributed may, at the time of its first imposition, act unfairly upon some classes of property, yet all subsequent possessors, whether by inheritance or purchase, have received it at a value proportioned to their burthens, and have therefore no right to complain of them, even if they existed. A new distribution, even though apparently more equal, would only be a new act of injustice, in exonerating one kind of property from a tax to which it had been subject when purchased, and imposing it on another which had been exempt therefrom when purchased.

Our space will not this week permit us to follow up the consideration of the relief which land as a property, and the agricultural body as a class, have derived in the amount of the local and general taxes to which they are chargeable, by the increase of trade and manufactures; and we must, therefore, defer it till next week.

MORE SACRIFICES OF OLD FRIENDS.

(From the Spectator.)

A new light has dawned upon the House of Lords. Year after year for more than a century have they, in combination with the Commons, been sharpening the law against vulgar destroyers of hares; but now hares are to be exterminated all the same as magpies. The Duke of Richmond declares they are "nothing but vermin"; and that ever since he became possessed of property he has destroyed all the hares upon it. Such being his grace's views, it is passing strange that he has never thought of interfering in behalf of his fellow labourers in the task of extirpating this "vermin," whom his brother landowners have been in the habit of sending to gaol. The Duke of Richmond claims credit for destroying hares; but the labourer who emulated him, instead of receiving so much per head, has been fined and imprisoned.

The unkindest cut of all to these ex-pets of the aristocracy has been inflicted by Lord Ashburton. On the same evening that the Duke of Richmond propounded his new definition of the genus Hare in the House of Lords—on the second reading of Lord Dacre's Game Bill—Lord Ashburton proposed that hares should be "struck out of the class of game altogether." Not a voice was raised in favour of the poor animal whom he proposed to degrade from the patrician caste of game. The scene reminded one of Gay's "Hare with many Friends." Hares collectively, as well as individually, are petted and praised only so long as they cost nothing. While hares were supposed to be fed exclusively at the farmer's expense, they were preserved ("protected") à la Poultre. But it has been found out, as the Duke of Richmond says, that "they not only injure the farmer, but the landlord, as they bark many of his most valuable trees." The barking of hares disturbs the noble duke's slumbers worse than the barking of dogs. The catiff hares no longer deserve the honour of dying by aristocratic triggers; they are to be consigned to a more vulgar doom. Ere long we may see hare-catchers as much run after as mole-catchers or rat-catchers. The "hare-destroyer to the Duke of Richmond" may rival in celebrity the "bug-destroyer to her Majesty."

If the hares but knew what is awaiting them, they would be as active at this crisis as the other agricultural interests. While the landlord endeavours to persuade tenant-farmers and labourers that the Corn Law is as much their question as his, the hares might address appeals quite as moving, and more convincing, to the partridges and pheasants, "Lord Ashburton," we think we hear some veteran puss—some Miles or Richmond of the leporine race—address the assembled Preserve. "Lord Ashburton may believe, or affect to believe, that by sacrificing us 'all complaints would be speedily got rid of.' But what says Lord Hatherton?—'he had destroyed hares and rabbits, and had found the pheasants and partridges increase in consequence.' Will these avaricious farmers, who seek to have the protection of the Game Law withdrawn from us, tolerate this increase? Their success in obtaining an ostracism of hares will only encourage them to demand the proscription of pheasants and partridges. The grouse and black-cock may be left for a season unmolested in their heathy retreats, but all the game of the cultivated land will speedily share their doom. True conservatives ought to concede nothing; for every concession but encourages to fresh demands. If the stroke of a pen—the wording of an act can make hares, who have been game for centuries, no game, will not the prestige which attaches to all kinds of game be weakened? I may go further: if an act of Parliament can unmake game, it may also unmake Peers. Our peerage and our game both came in with the conqueror. Let the peers beware, lest in making no game of us they teach the Radicals to make game of them." Then, wiping his eyes with his tail, he may protest that it is not for himself, nor even for the dear and numerous progeny around him that he cares, but for the throne and the altar.

THE PROGRESS OF THE LEAGUE.

(From the Glasgow Argus.)

When, in our progress towards Free Trade, we have attained, as at present, a high and commanding eminence, it may be well to pause a little, and look back upon the thorny and discouraging path we have trodden. The reflection may stimulate us to further exertion in promoting the cause of sound legislation, notwithstanding all the discouragements with which it may be apparently beset.

"Cobden and the League have done it all," say the protectionists now, in the anguish of their hearts.

Hear how Cobden and the League were spoken of some two or three years ago, by one of the great organs of the protectionist party. In "Blackwood's Magazine" for October, 1843, appeared an article, entitled "The Last Session of Parliament," which was cried up at the time as a most masterly essay, and as giving the death-blow to Free Trade agitation. Thus were Cobden and the League spoken of:

"Corn Law agitation is that mammoth nuisance of our times by which the gaiety of nations is eclipsed. We are thankful that its damnable iterations have now placed it beyond the limits of public toleration. No man hearkens to such debates any longer; no man reads the reports of such debates; it has become criminal to quote them; and recent examples of torpor beyond all torpor, on occasion of Cobden meetings amongst the inflammable section of our population, have shown, that not the poorest of the poor are any longer to be duped, or to be roused out of apathy by this intolerable fraud. Full of gifts and lies is the false, fleeting association of these Lancashire cottoners. But its gifts are too windy, and its lies too ponderous." And so on for several pages.

How must the writer of these vinegarish words, of these audacious sentiments, have stared (if he be still alive to stare) on reading the report of the proceedings in the Commons last Tuesday, to learn that the "nuisance" which no man would listen to has been adopted by a great majority of the nation—by almost every uneducated man of sound sense and good feeling in it—that the "lies" of the League have been adopted as the principles of the Premier; and that the "intolerable fraud" is about to become the basis of a beneficent and wise legislation?

OUR COMMERCIAL MARINE.

(From the Nautical Herald.)

In 1813, the first blow was given to the monopoly of the trade with India, but the hon. company did not yield up the exclusive power, which they had so long possessed, without a severe struggle to retain it, and they and their partisans, both in and out of Parliament, argued that our great prosperity in the East arose from the affairs of the Government of India being administered, and from the commerce with the natives being controlled, by a few Directors of unsurpassed honour, wisdom, and talents; and they boldly asserted if the trade were thrown open it would fall in the hands of needy, ignorant, and unprincipled adventurers, by whom it would be destroyed, and who would involve themselves and the country in irretrievable losses and ruin, and would disgrace and degrade the great name and character of Englishmen, so highly appreciated and honoured by the native merchants. After much discussion, Parliament decided that the East India Company should retain the exclusive right of trade with China, but that the trade to the other ports in India should be free to ships licensed by the Company. The trade under these restrictions was partially thrown open and we must judge from the result how far the prophecy of its ruin, and the destruction of the British character and capital has been fulfilled—perhaps the names of Green, Money Wigram, J. and W. Smith, Wimble, Somes, Toulmin, and many others we could select of the hon. and rich merchants and shipowners, in whose hands and by whose capital and talents the commerce with India is now carried on, is a triumphant answer to the one part of the prophecy, and the advantages of monopoly will be best appreciated and answered by the following tables:—

Number of ships and their tonnage which cleared out from London to China and the ports of India, during the following years of the monopoly of the trade by the East India Company.

Years.	Ships.	Tonnage.
1808 ..	44 ..	40,235
1813 ..	44 ..	38,556

Here, then, is a decrease each five years of the monopoly, and between the years 1803 and 1813 a decrease is shown of 11 ships, and nearly 10,000 tons.

Now for the seven years after the trade was thrown open: Number of ships cleared out from London to China by the Company, and from Great Britain by the Company, and by licensed traders.

Year.	Ships.	Tonnage.
1820 ..	109 ..	69,598
Increase since 1813, ships, 65; tonnage, 31,042.

Thirteen years after, when the trade was thrown open and unrestricted to China, as well as to all the ports in India, the ships cleared out from Great Britain to India were—

Year.	Ships.	Tonnage.

which shows a further increase from 1818 of 150 ships, and 46,005 tons.

Did the trade fall off after that it was wholly free? Let the returns speak. Cleared out in the which shows an increase from 1833 of 152 ships: tonnage, 74,750.

Let us conclude our statistics with the returns of last year:—

Year.	Ships.	Tonnage.
1845 ..	620 ..	291,999

Increase in the last five years, ships, 109, tonnage, 161,646. And since 1813, the last year of vaunted monopoly, and under which monopoly the trade had in the ten preceding years decreased nearly one-fourth, the Free Trade increased to—ships, 576; tonnage, 253,443.

CORN LAWS.—Yesterday a Parliamentary paper, obtained by Mr. Moffat, the member for Dartmouth, was issued, showing the number of addresses and memorials presented praying for the opening of the ports and repeal of the Corn Laws, since the 1st of September last. From the first branch it seems that 111 "addresses praying for the opening of the ports and repeal of the Corn Laws have been transmitted to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and presented by him to the Queen, since the 1st of September, 1845." Of that number 46 were for opening of the ports; some of the addresses were for opening the ports and for a Repeal of the Corn Laws. The memorials of the city of London, Liverpool, and Manchester, appear in the document. There were, it appears, by the second part of the return, 168 memorials addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury, the Lords of the Treasury, the Lords of the Privy Council, &c., praying for the opening of the ports, since the 1st of September, 1845, and two for the importation of Indian corn.

ALARMING PROSPECTS OF THE POTATO CROP.—At the ordinary meeting of the Horticultural Society, held yesterday, Dr. Lindley exhibited specimens of new frame potatoes as well as those grown in the open ground, from various parts of the country, which appeared to prove that the disease will be greater in the ensuing, than it was in the past season. Dr. Lindley further stated that on Saturday he had received from Lord Aberdeen the correspondence with the different British Consuls abroad upon the subject; amongst the most interesting of which was that from Washington, in which it was stated that the disease first appeared at Massachusetts in 1843, and went on increasing in intensity the last two years. The same course might be expected in this country, and it required the utmost caution to guard against the effects of its progress. That the disease was not confined to potatoes was apparent from some carrots exhibited by the Marquess of Lansdowne which were laid on the table. It had shown itself also in onions which had not kept this season, while nearly all the Dutch hyacinths are in a similarly affected state.

A FEW GLIMPSES OF THE LORDS AND COMMONS.

BY REUBEN.

THE DEBATE ON THE CORN LAW—LAND THROWN OUT OF CULTIVATION—WHO DISTURBS IRELAND?

ONE of the Parliamentary reporters, employed for a daily paper, mentioned to me one day during the long debate, that as I was desirous to look at the members, and listen to their speeches for a night or two, he would endeavour to obtain an entrance for me to some part of the house, where the members could be seen—to the reporters' gallery, if possible. But, he regretted to say, his turn was that night in the House of Lords. And although there was sometimes a debate there, and often a conversation on a variety of topics, he did not know what topics would be introduced that night, though he believed there was a likelihood of some debate. I said it did not matter much to me whether I listened to the lords or the commons; I had only once had a glimpse of the commons, and had never seen the lords at all; if he could procure me an entrance into the House of Lords, I would gladly accompany him.

Passing some policemen in the doorway of a house, which was screened from the street by a temporary boarding, we passed through a lobby, turned to the left through a narrow passage, passed a barrier and two more policemen, went through a small apartment where ten or twelve men were sitting round a table, went up a steep and narrow stair, then up another steep and narrow stair, and again up another, as if we had been dreaming of going up the cabin stairs of a small Thames steamer, and never getting on deck; but at last reaching a narrow cabin, which was lined with hats and coats hanging on pegs, and which was small enough to seem nearly filled, with half a score of people in it.

These were the gentlemen of the press; those their hats and coats; and this their place of waiting—an apartment seemingly made out of a part of some old passage. We added two more hats, a stick or two, and a coat to those on the pegs. And, coming out, took a peep through a door, opened just the least thing in the world, and saw over the heads of the reporters down into the House of Commons. A member with a thin voice was speaking on the right hand side of the house—the ministerial side—and seventeen gentlemen were sitting on the seats opposite to him. I did not see how many were on his side, but was afterwards told that there were not at that time seventeen there. This was between six and seven o'clock on the ninth night of the great debate—on one of the mightiest questions which has engaged the deliberations of a senate.

"Where are all the members?" I asked. "I see nothing but rows of empty seats, with red backs, and green or black leather coverings, save those few in a kind of knot near that pillar; and the few others imperfectly visible near to where the voice is speaking. Where are the 'hears' and the 'cheers,' the conflicts of counties, cities, and boroughs, the war of pocket interests and national interests? Where are the concentrated voices of agitated England? Where is the British Lion? Why roars he not throughout this mighty strife, in which he has proclaimed that his very existence is perilled?"

"This is the time of dining. The dinners last three or four hours. No question, not even that which is said to peril the very national existence, detains the gentlemen from their dinners, or draws them numerous here until about nine o'clock. The Lords usually try to get their debate over in time to go home to dinner. Let us close this door and go to them."

So spoke my companion, and he closed that door. Turning from us a few steps he found another, and this led us into the gallery of the House of Lords. We went down some steps having some rows of seats on our left hand, the ends of the seats towards us. These were occupied by an auditory. Then we passed, still going down some steps, two or three empty seats. Then we went within a barrier where there were two rows of seats, the front one filled with reporters, writing what the Earl of St. Germain was speaking below, on the floor of the house; and the second seat partly filled with other reporters, waiting until the clock, which was fixed above one end of the seats, showed that the three quarters of an hour allotted to each member had expired.

A broad, square looking table, with books and papers on it, stood in the centre of the floor. Three clerks of the house, in black gowns and grey wigs, sat at the table, and Lord St. Germain, a plainly dressed gentleman, stood at one side of the table, speaking in a simple style with a pleasant voice, on one of the most unpleasant subjects—grievous, horrid subjects I should say, that can be thought of—the new Coercion Bill for poor Ireland.

breast, and his head bent down, as if asleep—that is the old Duke.

"That one sitting on his left, on the same seat—the good-looking man, listening intently—that is Lord Ellenborough.

"The lights hide the Lord Chancellor and the woollack from us, and the throne behind him. He is at the farther side from us; but we can see the white lawn of the bishops in the recess, towards the right of the throne.

"On this side of the table, opposite to the Duke, the Whig lords sit. That is Lord Cottenham, with his hat on; and that elderly gentleman, with the whitish grey hair, next to him, is the Marquis of Lansdowne."

The Marquis rose, and addressed the house, when Lord St. Germain concluded. Having always supposed, from reading the marquis's speeches, that he must be a quiet, unimpassioned speaker, I was surprised to see his animated gesture, and hear his loud voice. But both gesture and voice were pleasing rather than otherwise. I only regretted that they were raised for the punishment of crime, and not for the removal of its causes. I have been on the marquis's Irish estates. There has been some wrong done there. One of his bailiffs, two or three years ago, was shot at. That was wrong; very wrong. But it was not the first wrong perpetrated. The marquis does not seem inclined to redress first wrongs; but he is for coercion, to put down their offspring.

When I had been in the gallery a few minutes, I rose half up, and stretched over the front seat to see who were immediately below. One of those there I took to be Lord Brougham, though I was not quite sure. I had looked down upon the crown of his head, and saw that head bald on the top, with gray hair on the sides. I looked again, and now I saw his profile, for he had turned round to talk to another lord, and I knew him by the profile. A minute after I looked and had another view of him. His feet were stretched out, and his body was thrown back in a position of rest, so that the tweeds which he wore, with the dark dragon-like stripes up the sides, were exposed at full length.

Again I looked, and he was in another position of rest. He had thrown himself upon the other side, and was speaking to another lord over his shoulder.

Two minutes, exactly by the clock, after this, I looked over again, and he was not there, but had removed to another seat, and was sitting composedly with his arms folded. The noble lord was now within view. He was close to Lord Cottenham, and very nearly behind the Marquis of Lansdowne, who was speaking. He let his arms drop quietly, turned round, and spoke to the Marquis of Clanricarde. He turned from the Marquis of Clanricarde, and removed half way back to the seat where I at first saw him sitting. Here he sat down and seemed to be at ease with his feet stretched out, his frock coat thrown back, his right elbow on the back of the seat, and his left hand rubbing a prominence behind his left ear.

I withdrew my eyes to look elsewhere; and when one minute by the clock, or hardly so much, had elapsed, I looked again, and he was not there. One of the clerks had gone out and left a vacant seat at the table, and the noble lord was in the occupation of that seat examining a large book which was lying on the table.

In about five minutes the clerk returned, and his lordship, giving him his seat, went across the house, and bent himself down as if speaking to Lord Ellenborough. Then he returned to his original seat, and sat about a minute and a half, looking to and listening to Lord Lansdowne, with his right hand placed on the top of his head backwards. Thus I left him sitting while I glanced across the house to a noble lord who sat on a back seat with a florid open countenance, and a white waistcoat on his broad ample chest. Behold, in a twinkling, the erratic lord was at that side of the house stretching over the front seat, and speaking to this nobleman. This was the Earl of Wicklow, so I was told.

From the Earl of Wicklow his lordship glided up the house near to the bishops, and disappeared in the rays of light which, as already said, hid from me the Lord Chancellor and the woollack.

All these movements were made while not one other peer, or bishop, or person, in the house, save the clerk who went out and came in, had moved from his place. The Duke of Wellington still sat with his hat over his eyes, his arms folded, and his venerable head bowed down.

Once again the peer, who seemed to have no resting-place, emerged from the effulgent obscurity before the throne, and returned to his original seat. Here, one hand was on his knee, and the other was as before rubbing the prominence behind his ear. Then he threw himself back on the seat, and leaned his head on his open right hand, stretching out his feet, as if he had at last attained repose.

There was no repose. He suddenly removed himself, and sat down beside the solid Lord Campbell. Two minutes after this he was at the table, and again back to his original place, where he sat with his hands alternately on his knees and on his head, rubbing his fingers behind his ears one moment, and the next moment on the upper part of the posterior region.

At last he sprung to his feet, forward to the table, and addressed the house. He, like the previous speakers, and like all who spoke that night, was for coercion to Ireland; only, in his estimation the coercion bill of the Government did not go far enough.

There was nothing said by Lords Farnham, Clanricarde, Campbell, Grey, &c., who afterwards spoke, with which the public is not already acquainted. So I shall not repeat what they said. But as I went at a later period of the evening, and several evenings since, into the House of Commons, and there listened to a repetition of what Mr. Cobden has since called his "old friends, the fallacies of six and seven years ago," the chief of which fallacies is the throwing of land out of cultivation, and the laying of it down in grass, if protection is removed, I think it is worth while to compare the doings of the Lords with the doings of the Commons.

Roscommon is one of the recently disturbed counties of Ireland. The greater part of Roscommon is laid down in grass. The policy of the landlords there is to discourage cultivation, to have as little land under culture as possible, and as much in grass as possible. They can get a ready market for their stock in England, and having soldiers, police, bayonets, bullets, gunpowder, and any other, or every other element of force, at their command, they can remove animals from the land by force, and sell them. When they have a population living on their estates by the culture of the land, they cannot prevent that population from eating a part of the cultured produce. That population, therefore, resolves to take spades and forks in its hands, and it takes them and goes into the grass fields, and digs them up, and swears there, in the face of the soldiers and armed police, that the land shall not lie in grass, that it shall not be thrown out of cultivation, that the land shall be cultured.

The police fire on the people to prevent them from digging the land; the people are not armed, and cannot fire again. They retreat and go home; but being yet unconvinced that land is best left in grass, to fatten cattle to feed England, while they are without work and without food, they still resolve to cultivate, and they take secret vengeance on some of those who are foremost in preventing them. In Roscommon, it is a war of men compelled to be without work and without food, and the owners and agents of the lands out of cultivation, wherein men say we must and shall work and dig, and plant the land, and raise food from it.

In Tipperary, where there are disturbances, the case is not quite the same; the land is there cultivated. It is divided and subdivided, and relet and sublet, into the smallest patches; and the competition for it is so great, that rents of 10*l.*, 12*l.*, and 14*l.* per acre, for one season, are eagerly offered. The inability of the people to pay such rents, the distraints which take place in consequence, the forcible sales of potatoes, the forcible transference of them under escorts of soldiers and police to the seaports, where, like the cattle and the corn they are shipped off to England, to which also the money received in payment, and paid in rent, goes; these lead to the agrarian crimes of Tipperary.

The new coercion bill may allay the popular disturbances for a time. A fire may be obscured and altogether hidden by the quantity of fuel heaped on it. Yet it will burn all the fiercer at some future time.

Employment, wages, and food are what the Irish want. The general purpose of many of the owners of Irish land is to lay it down in grass, and make work, and wages, and food still more difficult to obtain.

The Earl of St. Germain told how the armed constabulary of Ireland had been augmented, and took credit to the Government for the augmentation. I would beg to remind the readers of this paper of a series of letters which appeared in it two years ago, descriptive of a district of Ireland, near Kilkenny, which was peaceable and without crime, until a landlord erected a police barracks, and got a detachment of armed men to reside in it. He then made use of those armed men to effect illegal distraints upon his tenants—tenants who owed no rent. He used the armed constabulary to eject tenants from their farms who held on long leases, who held on legal covenants, as good as ever were written on parchment, actually written on parchment, yet who were ejected. Those tenants brought actions against the landlord, were awarded damages in courts of law; but did not recover them because the landlord refused to pay damages; and not only refused to pay, but continued to distrain on other tenants who owed no rent and held on lease; he in the meantime appealing to a higher court against the decisions given in the lower courts for the tenants.

He was at last shot at, or pretended to be so. Whether shot at, or only pretending so to have been, it was a great card for him to play. He threw the main witnesses into prison, charging them on suspicion of being concerned against his life, and his appeals were some of them decided in his favour, because those witnesses were not in the court.

When the necessity for their absence was over, they were allowed to leave the prison. When new trials were coming on, they were again put in prison once more, charged on suspicion of having shot at him.

In two years and a half from the time of getting the armed police on his estate, he, with only 70 tenants, was involved in, or had been involved in, fully 200 actions at law, or criminal courts.

A troop of dragoons was also brought into the neighbourhood, and the infantry was augmented from a depot to a full regiment. Two pieces of cannon were also added to the police barrack. Many men were imprisoned, several transported, and two hanged. The leases were broken, the tenants ruined with law costs, beggared and ejected to perish, and some of them did perish. The houses of others were pulled down about them by men supported by the armed constabulary and the soldiers, though the inmates had built those houses at their own expense, on land held on lease, and though the leases were unexpired, and they owed no rent.

With the law as it is, a landlord, if a political protestant, may attempt any enormity in Ireland, and ultimately succeed in it. All the functionaries of the law, from the lord-lieutenant to the hangman, are on his side.

What they will be able to do when they get a permanent coercion bill—it is fearful to think on. May the merciful God look down upon Ireland!

STATE OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS IN HANTS AND PART OF WILTS.

FEBRUARY 27, 1844.—The protracted debate on Sir Robert Peel's measure—the depression in the markets—the almost total impossibility of effecting sales at any price, added to the general apprehension or fear of ruin entertained by the farmers in this neighbourhood, have caused some to discharge or suspend many of their labourers; others have reduced the already too scanty wages of from 8s. to 9s. to from 6s. to 7s. per week. At the village of Amport (which parish extends six miles), Hampshire, to the borders of Wiltshire, the labourers fortunate enough to get employment are paid but from 6s. to 7s., one with a wife and six children but 8s. per week, out of which sum 1s. goes for rent weekly, not one of his children in work, his youngest five years, his eldest fourteen; consequently eight hungry and almost famished beings have to exist on 10d. each per week. Clothing they have scarcely enough to cover their nakedness—with out shoes or hats. The cottage without windows, or at least most of them broken; not thatched sufficiently to keep out the wet; neither bed nor bedding to keep them warm. Asking the wife how long it was since her or her family had tasted meat or any other food than bread, she replied "more than two months since," and then a neighbour killing a pig, gave her the "chillings." She further ejaculated, "now their potatoes were all gone. God of heaven only knew," bursting at the time into tears, "what would become of them all."

At Quarterly, Grately, Slipton, and other agricultural villages in Hants, wages have generally been reduced to 8s. per week within the last three weeks, for married, and to 6s. or 6s. for single men. At Almsbury and other villages in Wiltshire, the wages now paid do not exceed 8s. for married, and 6s. per week for single, strong, hearty, and able-bodied men.

Potatoes in Wiltshire seem generally to have escaped the malady or disease so much complained of, as has also some part of Hampshire. At Marlborough, Devizes, Salisbury, &c., good sound kidneys can be purchased at 5s. per sack of three bushels.

At Newbury 7s. per sack is demanded, while as much as 12s. is obtained at Winchester for similar kinds. Many are coming a great distance into Wiltshire for potatoes to set this spring; some out of Sussex, others from Somersetshire, Gloucestershire, and Herefordshire, which will no doubt tend to increase considerably the prices there in a short time.

THE POTATO FAMINE.—Potatoes in the midland counties continue still to advance in price and degenerate in quality. Those kinds which sold in our markets this time last year at 8d. per peck, are now selling as high as from 1s. 2d. to 1s. 4d. per peck. This is a serious calamity for the working classes. What aggravates the case, bread maintains a high rate, and notwithstanding the prospect of cheaper corn, the increased demand from a diminished supply of potatoes, will, we fear, serve to keep the quatern loaf at a price which few persons, with present rates of wages can afford to pay. Some uneasiness has been felt in regard to the obtaining of a supply of seed potatoes for planting the next and following month; but as it appears that the potato blight has not at all affected the potatoes grown in the north of Scotland, where there was also an abundant crop, an ample supply is expected from thence, via Hull, for all our wants. Yorkshire has got its potato seed for many years from the north of Scotland, where prices seldom exceed 5d. a peck, and Warwickshire will, it is hoped, this season be able to import a good many from the same quarter. Nor will there be any risk of potato riots in that district of the far north, inasmuch as the potatoes there raised for the exportation are generally what are termed "forced" potatoes, good for seed, but bad to eat.

PETITIONS ON THE CORN LAWS.—From the eighth report of the committee on public petitions, it appears that the aggregate number relating to the subject of the Corn Laws, presented up to the 24th of February, inclusive, was:—For repeal, petitions 633; signatures 1,354,692. Against repeal, petitions 1,382; signatures 137,454.

AGRICULTURE.

LANDLORDISM UNVEILED.

FARMERS, YOU MUST AID YOURSELVES

A man has been sent up fresh from Dorsetshire by the squires to represent, as he says, the tenant farmers of that county in the House of Commons! and what is his first essay? Why, with infinite simplicity, he talked in the House as squires talk among themselves, and told, as the most proper and natural occurrence possible, how the tenants of certain Free Trade landowners of Dorsetshire declined to sign a requisition to him (Mr. Seymer), a monopolist, until their landlords had given them leave to do so! This was letting the cat out of the bag, with a vengeance! What becomes now of the protectionist ardour of the tenant farmers? What is the roar of the "British Lion" worth? The truth is, that the tenant farmers, as a body, have long ceased to care much about "protection;" and a very considerable and daily increasing minority of them wish the whole delusion to be put down forthwith. Mr. Gibson remarked, in the House of Commons, on Monday night, that he always found, in his personal intercourse with farmers, that "they utterly disregard the question of the Corn Laws as a matter of business." This is perfectly true. We met with a striking illustration of this the other day. Wishing to learn the opinion of the farmers of a county in which some of the most frantic monopolist nonsense has been uttered by squires in the name of the farmers, as to the Government measure, we made the inquiry of an intelligent farmer, who constantly attends the principal local markets, and received this answer: "The farmers consider the whole question at an end, and would gladly have a Free Trade at once, that they might come to a settlement with their landlords; and so indifferent have they become to the progress of the Government bill, that I assure you I have scarcely heard the subject alluded to by a farmer during the three weeks the discussion has been going on; and on the day (market-day) when the news of the division arrived, I did not hear a single comment on the subject by a farmer throughout the day."

This is significant. But it may be said, how is it that the farmers are got together to shout at protection meetings, and to vote for monopolists at county elections? The new Dorsetshire member has afforded a clue to the solution of the paradox. Farmers don't sign requisitions to candidates till they have the word from their landlords, and they do go to protection meetings and county elections at the bidding of their landlords and masters. No one who has mixed with farmers can doubt that farmers do not, and dare not, act upon their own convictions in public affairs; and simple Mr. Seymer has innocently let out the truth, that squires would as soon expect to be opposed in public affairs by their own menial servants as by their tenants.

This is a state of things which must be amended before farmers can take their proper station in society; a new arrangement of the social relations of landlord and tenant must take place before husbandry in England can rise from its present inferior and depressed state. The domineering insolence of the squirearchy is not confined to political matters; it extends into all the intercourse of landlords with tenants. For instance, there is a minor landowner in Hertfordshire, who has lately taken to game preserving with great strictness, and he has recently sent verbal messages by a servant to three of his tenants to say, that if they did not keep their dogs tied up, he would turn them out of their farms!!! All these farmers are men of capital and intelligence, who are fully alive to the deep degradation to which their position as yearly tenants has compelled them for a time to submit. Can such a state of things continue? We say, unhesitatingly, it cannot. We have reason to believe that at this time the monopolist landowners are endeavouring to enforce, with more than usual stringency, that semi-feudal system which is the bane of agriculture in England; and they do so from a consciousness that the tenants are writhing under a vassalage which they will, ere long, arouse themselves to shake off.

The landlord's heel never pressed so heavily on the neck of the tenant as it does at this moment. Yet is the day of redemption at hand; for the time is coming when no landowner will be able to maintain the present system of management except by the sacrifice of half his income. But tenants must assert their own independence, and refuse any longer to occupy as yearly tenants, or to submit to agreements which render them mere vassals. Now, Free Trade in grain will greatly assist the emancipation of tenantry, and in this way:—when the world's market is open, it is highly improbable that the price of wheat in England will, one year with another, average more than 45s. a quarter; and to enable farmers to carry on their business with a profit, more capital and more skill must be applied to farming than is now the case with the class which may be called average farmers. To this the chief obstacles are, yearly holdings, obsolete, unnecessary, and restrictive covenants, game preserves, timber and hedgerows, and a superstitious reverence on the part of the landlord for natural pastures. There are often other landlord-imposed burdens of a local or peculiar nature, but those we have enumerated are almost universal. Together they form the cause of the backward state of English husbandry, the reason why the land produces little, if any, more than the half of what it might be made to produce with moderately good farming. Now the present rental of farms so burdened will be found from 30 to 50 per cent. too high; when the price of wheat shall have settled down to about 45s. a qr., and struggle as they may, landlords who won't relinquish these burdens must ultimately undergo a considerable reduction of income. But how many of them can submit to such a reduction? Will their mortgagees look on quietly at such a wilful sacrifice of property to prejudice? Will the squires themselves like to feel themselves sinking in the scale of society? Well, then, look to the alternative. Rents are not in general too high, if the farmers had long leases, with no burdensome restrictive covenants, no game, an extensive clearance of timber and hedgerows, and liberty to break up a considerable part of the permanent pasture lands. We believe, that when prices have become natural and moderate, the majority of landlords, perhaps in some instances, after a period of fruitless struggle, will adopt the course of rational men, and let their farms upon fair terms, that is, without the landlord-imposed burdens. Then will the tenantry be in their proper position, and the English farmer will no longer be open to the reproach of being a laggard amongst the industrious capitalists of this country. To hasten the advent of that period, every farmer should join in demanding immediate as well as a total repeal of the Corn Laws.

Since writing the above, we have a most decisive admission of the accuracy of our views in Sir Thomas Acland's speech upon Mr. Villiers' motion. In declaring his intention of voting against immediate repeal, the monopolist member for Devonshire said, "he was aware there was a difference of opinion upon this subject between landlords and tenant farmers. He believed that tenant farmers thought that the arrangements between the landlords and their tenants would be in a very unsettled state. He took an opposite view of the matter. He should be glad to come to a right understanding with his tenants as soon as the measure passed, for three years, which would give time to see how the proposition of the right hon. baronet would work, and then to make an ultimate arrangement." That is what we say. That is our case on behalf of the tenant farmers against suspended repeal of the Corn Laws. To this Lord Worsley—who is the most rational man amongst the active protectionists—added "that from extensive inquiries he had made among the farmers occupying large farms, he believed their wish of the two things was, if there should be a repeal of the Corn Laws, that instead of three years it should be immediate. What farmers were most anxious about was, that there should be at least a settlement of this question."

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

We publish the following letter, which has been addressed to us by Mr. Warnes, of Trimmingham, Norfolk, and it deserves the attention of farmers upon two grounds; first, that in the cultivation and preparation of flax, the means of profitably employing the agricultural population of all ages, at good wages, is found; secondly, that by the use of boiled linseed, barley meal, and straw chaff, cattle may be fattened at something less than one-half of the cost of feeding on oilcake, or meal alone. Nobody can deny the vast importance of these things to the agricultural interest; and we believe that when once the incubus of "protection" shall be totally removed from agriculture, both subjects will receive more attention from farmers than they have hitherto done. We have used the mixture, for all kinds of cattle, with the most satisfactory results; and a farmer in a home county, who at our recommendation has this winter fattened forty head of cattle on the linseed compound, declares that he never before fed stock so cheaply, so rapidly, or with so good a profit. We believe we saw some of the beasts Mr. Warnes mentions in his letter, at the latter end of September last, when they had just begun to feed, they were decidedly lower in condition than farmers commonly like to begin with:

CULTIVATION OF FLAX. To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"Sir,—Several years have elapsed since the meeting of a society, that I had been instrumental in forming, took place. It was called the "Norfolk Flax Society," and was held in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich.

"Present were the Lord Lieutenant and the High Sheriff of the county, the Bishop of Norwich, with a large assembly of nobility and gentry.

"I had the honour of moving the first resolution, to the effect, that flax culture, as a means of employment to the poor, ought to be vigorously promoted by every true lover of his country.

"The success of my advocacy, on that memorable day, was of short duration. For, in less than twenty-four hours after the meeting separated, a cloud, charged with mischief, arose to mar the bright prospects that I had so recently depicted.

"Eventually, I resolved to pursue alone that path, which I in vain pointed out as the only way to success.

"The cloud is now removed; my work complete; and the unobstructed sun of prosperity shines upon the flax cause: the two main points that I endeavoured to enforce, viz., profitable employment to the poor, and reduction of rates, being clearly established.

"I now invite all thoughtful, prudent, and philanthropic persons to visit Trimmingham, in order that they may see how far I have carried out the spirit of my resolution, and witness the realisation of the above statements, with the happy effects of constant work at adequate wages.

"They will also discover that if flax had been cultivated to the extent, and in accordance with the plans I recommended, every parish in the county might, at the present time, have been cleared as free from rates as Trimmingham; where one quarter's poor-rate only, of the past three, at 8d. in the pound, has been required for the support of the infirm, and for Union charges; all hands being employed in dressing flax, that would otherwise have been maintained in idleness. As a proof, Mr. Brown, who has greatly contributed towards the elucidation of this subject, left his farm at Michelmas, engaged another at Ruckhath, and took his flax with him. In consequence, several young persons were thrown out of employment; some of whom were lately obliged to take refuge in the workhouse, where they must still have remained, had I not received them into my flax establishment.

"To remove all prejudice would be to alter the construction of human nature: a thing impossible—so innumerable are the secret springs of opposition. But justice to the poor, whose cause I advocate, and for whose sake the Norfolk Flax Society was formed, demands the statistical investigation. I would therefore just observe, that the system of preparing flax for market is reduced to so great a certainty upon my premises, that I am now able to afford assistance to any part of the kingdom; and that, under the instruction of Belgians from the celebrated Central district, young men, women, and children have become expert flax-dressers, earning from 9s. 6d. to 10s. per week. For instance, the wages of Thomas Siddy, aged 13, exceed, upon the average, 8s. a week.

"In conclusion, allow me to subjoin the copy of a letter, addressed to a nobleman on another part of my advocacy, of the utmost importance to the agricultural interests of the country; and to say, that I this week, sold seven bullocks, fattened according to the system recommended, from the resources of my own farm, that paid 77l. for less than six months keeping:

"My Lord,—The people in this neighbourhood were once as stolid and as stiff-necked as those who inspect your bullocks, nor would they acknowledge the superiority of the compound-feeding system, till they had themselves reaped the profits I described. Now, they are a pliant, communicative, and I wish I could add, a grateful race.

"But, I am richly rewarded by the testimonies of an extensive and enlightened correspondence: and it is with pleasure that I answer your Lordship's present inquiry. I wish, however, first to observe, for the instruction of those parties who admit that your bullocks are doing well, and who will not allow the cheapness of the food upon which they are fattening, that linseed can be purchased at less money per ton than the best oil cake.

"For instance, I was offered, on Saturday, at Norwich, linseed at 18s. per quarter, weighing 80 st., while oil-cake was 11l. 10s. per ton. Now, where farmers are so prejudiced against the new system as not to perceive the superiority of the pure seed over the refuse formed into cake with all kinds of rubbish, no arguments can produce a contrary conviction; and they must be left, till compelled by circumstances, like many in Norfolk, to try the experiment.

"Your Lordship will discover by the above prices, that linseed and cake are about 1s. 5d. per stone each; and that, if a compound of barley and linseed is made, consisting of 1 seed, and 3 cake, at 9l. per stone, [at which price the seeds of quakers may be purchased], it will amount to 7l. 10s. per ton, exclusive of the water; but, when that important ingredient is incorporated according to the recipe in my book, the price will be reduced to 6l. per ton, and those who adopt only this part of my system, obtain five tons and a half of the incomparable cattle compound at the same sum, which others give for a ton of comparative rubbish.

"I do not say that the same effect will be produced from a ton of compound as from a ton of cake; but I know of no instance where the superiority of the former has not been acknowledged, without taking into calculation the advantages derived by consuming so large a proportion of native produce.

"My Lord, I thank you for having instituted an inquiry into this subject, which I should not otherwise have criticised so minutely, and which I shall expect to turn to some further use.

"Hoping that I have succeeded in resolving the problem contained in your Lordship's note, I have the honour to remain, your obedient servant, Feb. 16th, 1846.

JOHN WARNES.

"It is not my intention again to enter the lists of controversy, and, in closing this more arduous part of my labours, I am abundantly gratified by the many expressions of benefits conferred, by the glorious prospects of the future, and by a mind conscious of right.

"Hoping that this letter may find a place in the columns of your paper, and in those of every patriotic journal in the United Kingdom,—I remain, Sir, your obedient servant, Trimingham, Feb. 17th.

JOHN WARNES."

Mr. COBDEN AND THE LEAGUE.—Mr. Cobden spoke as a triumph. His speech was a perpetual defiance hurled at the landed aristocracy. It is not only the Tories who ought to have trembled on their seats. The Whig party reckons in reality more real aristocracy in its ranks than the Tories. The "League" saps and mines their influence as unceasingly as that of their opponents, and it is easy to understand that the most political and enlightened portion of the English oligarchy chooses rather to deaden the influence of this dangerous confederacy, by yielding to it now, than to allow it to go on pursuing its crusades against the preponderance of landed property. We have often heard our readers remark how much the interference of the League in election matters tended to modify the elements on which the balance of the great political parties had hitherto reposed. The fact is, that of late years, this formidable association has almost effected a revolution in the representative system of England. Nor did Mr. Cobden conceal this fact; on the contrary, he boasted of it. He laid bare the basis of aristocratic influence, and complacently showed the ravages that had been committed upon them by the repeated assaults of the League. He reminded the great families—which possess the land that their power reposed on about 150,000 electors, who hold farms without leases, and who are thus at the mercy of their landlords. "But," said he, "we can also create voters, and the most enlightened of you well know that we shall effect our purposes? It is a fact worthy of notice that the English aristocracy now finds itself beaten with the weapons which it forged itself. In fact, in a country where wealth and power are concentrated in a small number of hands, the more the electoral basis is enlarged, the more the influence of the aristocracy augments; the more poor electors, the more multiplied is the action of the rich. At the time of the Reform Bill, it was the aristocracy that, quite logically, introduced or maintained on the electoral lists the greatest possible number of persons whose comparative poverty necessarily ensured dependence. But here, in face of the great influences of family and fortune, is a collective influence which resists concentration by combination. In face of the great landowners, with their millions of revenue, here is a League organized, which opens subscriptions and also collects millions. These coalesced cotton spinners also apply themselves to the fabrication of votes; they buy freeholders; they range the country and sow gold in their path, like the dragon's teeth in the fable of Ovid; and the new-born electors everywhere spring up beneath their feet. "You call that revolutionary," cries the great Leaguer, "why it is you that are the revolutionists. It is you that have put these arms into our hands." The "most enlightened" of the aristocracy have perceived that it was time to put an end to this anomalous position, and to put a period to a struggle in which they were losing ground day by day. In spite of the cries and the rage of the vanquished it is probable that the Peers will deem it prudent to be their own executioners. It is clear, that if they were to reject the measure, and so necessitate an appeal to the country, the new election would not give them a majority. Even if they gained a few votes, they would not gain enough to be masters of the field. They are a lost party.—Journal des Débats.

IRISH PROVISIONS.—On Monday, the 23d ultimo, five vessels arrived at the port of London from the Irish ports, bringing collectively 2,205 quarters of oats, 1,887 packages of butter, 1,014 packages of bacon, 169 of pork, 87 of hams, 401 of eggs, 576 of lard, in addition to a quantity of tongues and various other articles of Irish production. On Thursday three vessels arrived in the river, bringing 255 quarters of oats, 1,038 packages of bacon, 560 of pork, 160 of beef, 509 of butter, 284 of lard, 152 of hams, 110 of eggs and other articles. One vessel arrived on Friday with 1,029 quarters, and one on Saturday with 1,386 quarters of oats. The imports into the port of Bristol, in the same period, consisted of a large quantity of linens, malt, oatmeal, seed, 69 packages of lard, 390 of butter, 171 of bacon, besides barley, oats, &c. The arrivals at the port of London from the same quarter at the beginning of the present week have consisted of 708 packages of bacon, 57 of butter, 207 of lard, 193 of pork, 140 of eggs, 94 of hams, 189 of beef, 80 packages of linens and cottons, in addition to oats, malt, yarn, and various other articles the produce of the Irish soil. REVIEW.

Trade and Travel in the Far East. By F. Davidson, Esq. London: Madden and Malcolm.

This pleasing and instructive volume contains the recollections of a residence of 21 years in or near the islands of the Indian Archipelago. With these islands, our country had an opportunity of forming interesting and valuable commercial relations; but the ignorance of Lord Bathurst, and the blundering vanity of Lord Castlereagh, led to the sacrifice of our advantage at the treaty of Kenna. Our duped negotiator not only complimented away the trade of England, but the rights of the natives of Java, at the very moment when the exertions of Sir Stamford Raffles had opened marts for commerce, and stimulated the energies of the Javanese by affording them security to person and property. Under the Dutch Government the natives have fallen back to that indolence which prevails in every country where labour is uncertain of obtaining its reward; and this want of industry is a prominent feature in the prospect from the inn of Bayenzorg:

"The scenery is magnificent; and the view (well known to every visitor) from the back verandah of the inn, is the finest that can be imagined. Standing on the steps of this verandah, you have, immediately under your foot, an extensive plain, thoroughly cultivated, sprinkled with villages, each village being surrounded with evergreen trees, and the whole almost encircled by a river. To the left of this valley rises an extensive and picturesque mountain, cultivated almost to the summit, and dotted here and there with villages and gentlemen's houses. Looking into the valley at early morn, you will see the lazy buffalo, driven by an equally indolent ploughman, dragging a Lilliputian plough through the slimy paddy-field; the lazy Javanese labourer going to his work in the field; the native women reaping, with the hand only, and stalk by stalk, the ripe paddy (rice) in one field, while those in the next are sowing the seed; the adjoining fields being covered with stubble, their crops having been reaped weeks before. Upon the declivity of the mountain is seen the stately coffee-tree, the plantations of which commence about 1300 feet above the level of the sea, and proceed up the hill till they reach the height of 4000 feet."

The conduct of the Dutch to the native chiefs is illustrated by their treatment of the gallant Diepo Nogoro:

"During my first stay at Batavia, from 1823 to 1826, the celebrated Java war broke out, the so-called rebel army being headed by a native Chief of Djokdjocarta, named Diepo Nogoro. Shortly after the first outbreak, the then Governor-General, Baron Vander Capellan, called on all Europeans between the ages of 16 and 45 to serve in the schuttery, or militia. An infantry and a cavalry corps were formed, and I joined the latter, preferring a rifle in the evening to a walk with a 14-pound musket over my shoulder. After a probation of pretty tight drilling, we became tolerable soldiers, on 'nothing a day and finding ourselves,' and had the good town of Batavia put under our charge, the regular troops being all sent away to the scene of war. As I do not intend to return to the subject, I may as well mention here, that the war lasted five years, and that it would have lasted five years longer, had Diepo Nogoro not been taken prisoner—I fear by treachery. I saw him landed at Batavia in 1829, from the steamer which had brought him from Sumarang. The Governor's carriage and aides-de-camp were at the wharf to receive him. In that carriage he was driven to gaol, whence he was banished no one knows whither; and he has never since been heard of. Such is the usual fate of Dutch prisoners of state. Diepo Nogoro deserved a better fate. He was a gallant soldier, and fought bravely. Poor fellow! how his countenance fell—as well it might—when he saw where the carriage drew up! He stepped short on putting his foot on the pavement, evidently unwilling to enter the gloomy-looking pile; cast an eager glance around; and seeing there was no chance of escape, walked in. Several gentlemen followed, before the authorities had the door closed, and saw the fallen chief, with his two wives, consigned to two miserable-looking rooms. Java has been quite tranquil ever since."

That great precursor of Free Trade, the smuggler, is hard at work in upsetting the system of exclusive commerce established by the Dutch authorities:

"Singapore is annually visited by a large fleet of vessels from all parts of Java: the most important of these are what are commonly called Arab ships; that is, ships fitted out and owned by Arabs residing in Java. They carry the Dutch flag, are commanded by Arabs, and manned by Javanese. If fame does not belie them, these Arab commanders are notorious smugglers. This is certain: that they take goods from Singapore in exchange for the coffee, sugar, rice, &c., which they bring from Java, and that they give prices that would leave them no margin for profit, if his Netherlands Majesty's duties were paid on them. For this sort of illicit trade, the coast of Java offers many facilities in its numerous small rivers, with which the Arab ship-master is intimately acquainted. The article of opium, though strictly prohibited by the authorities of Java, is taken by the Arabs from Singapore in considerable quantities, notwithstanding the pains and penalties attached to its being found on board their vessels; and smuggled into Java the drug most undoubtedly is, let the Dutchman boast of their spies and custom-house establishment as they will. These Arab ships are built of teak, ranging from 150 to 500 tons per register, and are altogether remarkably fine vessels."

The condition of Bencoolen affords another proof of the miserable incapacity of the British ministry of 1815: the ministry which imposed Corn Laws to cripple industry at home, and abandoned advantages to prevent the extension of British commerce abroad:

"The once thriving settlement of Bencoolen, (or Fort Menapoung) which I visited at different times between 1811 and 1813, found, even then, to have declined very seriously from its former prosperity. Previously to its transfer, in 1825, to the Dutch, great exertions were made to render this settlement important for its exportation of spices of all descriptions; and so far as regards nutmegs, rice, and cloves, those exertions were eminently successful. Planters and others, however, soon found that, on the hauling down of the British flag, and the hoisting of the Dutch, their prospects underwent a very material change, arising from duties and other charges laid on the commerce of the place. Most of the capitalists retired with the British establishment, of which, indeed, they formed a part. A hard struggle was maintained by those planters who remained behind, but without success; and the place is now very little more than a station for a Dutch Assistant-Resident and a small garrison.

In this arrangement the wishes and rights of the natives were as ostentatiously disregarded as the commercial interests of England:

"The transfer of this settlement to the Dutch (in exchange for Malacca) in 1825, was a severe blow and great disappointment to all the natives, both high and low. At a meeting of chiefs held at the Government house, at which the English and Dutch authorities were both present, for the purpose of completing the transfer, the senior Rajah rose to address the assembly, and spoke to the following effect:—'Against this transfer of my country I protest. Who is there possessed of authority to hand me and my countrymen, like so many cattle, over to the Dutch or to any other power? If the English are tired of us, let them go away; but I deny their right to hand us over to the Dutch. When the English first came here, they asked for and got a piece of land to build warehouses and dwelling-houses upon. That piece of land is still defined by its original stone wall, and is all they (the English) ever got from us. We were never conquered; and I now tell the English and Dutch gentlemen here assembled, that had I the power, as I have the will, I would resist this transfer to the knife. I am, however, a poor man, have no soldiers to cope with yours, and must submit. God's will be done.' This was a bold, straightforward speech; but it was thrown away upon the callous ears of the hearers. Delivered in pure Malay, it sounded stronger than in this translation. The speaker was an old man, with whose power and will for mischief, in former days, the British had good cause to be acquainted."

As another specimen of the Dutch policy which the imposers of the Corn Laws established in the Indian seas, we quote an account of the disguised slave-trade at Padang:

"There is a disgraceful traffic carried on between Padang and the island of Nias, a little further up the coast, by Chinese, who visit that island, and purchase hundreds of its inhabitants, for whom they find markets all along the coast. Those brought to Padang, are not, indeed, sold as slaves; but they are registered at the Resident's office, and held as bond-debtors for different terms of seven, fifteen, and even twenty years. During this servitude they are treated as slaves, but free at its expiration. They have also the option of buying their liberty in the meantime, if they can raise the means; and the proprietor is not at liberty to refuse a sum equivalent to the value of the unexpired term of service. This value is fixed thus: on the registering of a debtor, a certain sum is put down as his value or debt; say 400 rupees; of this sum a certain proportion, say 20 rupees, is placed to his credit for every year he serves; so that, if he serves his master for five years, his debt is reduced to 300 rupees; and this sum, the master is compelled to accept as the price of his liberation. If a debtor has a hard master, he is at liberty to induce another to buy his services; and the transfer cannot be declined, if the sum due is forthcoming."

Mr. Davidson resided for three years in New South Wales, and estimates very highly the advantages it offers to agricultural emigrants, notwithstanding the drawbacks of convicts escaping to become highway robbers in the bush, the ravages of occasional droughts, and the depredations of the cockatoos. The last is a plague very perplexing to the farmers:

"While on the subject of the settler's troubles, I may mention, that the cockatoos annoy the farmer in Australia, as much as the crows do in England: they attack his wheat and maize, when the grain is ripening, by hundreds; indeed I may say, by thousands; and it requires a very active watchman to keep them from doing serious injury to the crop, not so much from the quantity they eat, as from what they destroy and scatter. These birds, which, by-the-by, furnish an excellent dish that occasionally formed part of our dinner, are remarkably cunning: while the flock are busily feeding on the farmer's wheat, two of their number are left on some neighbouring trees to keep watch; these, on the approach of danger, give a loud, shrill scream, which at once puts the thieves to flight, and renders it very difficult for the sportsman to get a shot at one of them."

Mr. Davidson's account of Hong-Kong is too superficial to be of much value, and more recent information has refuted several of the speculations in which he indulged. We, however, join with him heartily in recommending that all the English establishments in the Indian and Chinese seas should be declared "free ports," and that the revenues necessary to defray colonial expenses should be raised by direct taxation. The experiment has been tried with complete success at Singapore, and Mr. Brooke has adopted the same course in Borneo. Monopoly is nothing more than legalised piracy, and the Government that sanctions it has no right to complain that the Malay pirates carry out the principle in their own way, and even contrive to better the instruction.

Narrative of a Four Months' Residence at the Marquesas, or, a Peep at Polynesian Life; by Herman Melville. London: Murray.

We have more than once had occasion to refer to that most interesting series of amusing and instructive volumes which Murray is publishing in his Home and Colonial Library. Without entering into any invidious comparisons, we may safely say that no publisher has been more successful in combining cheapness with excellence, and that there is not a single volume in the whole series which we should not grieve to lose from our collection. The work before us contains the adventures of an American mariner, who deserted from a cruel captain, and sought shelter among the natives of the Marquesas; it offers much for extract, and little for comment, and is therefore a book more gratifying to the reader than useful to the critic. Melville, though an American, does not disguise the atrocities which his countrymen have committed in the islands of the Pacific Ocean—atrocities which have provoked fearful retaliations, though the vengeance has chiefly fallen on the innocent. He thus describes the exploits of Captain Poiter, of the United States navy, during his campaign of 1814, against the Typees:

"On that occasion I have been told that a considerable detachment of sailors and marines from the frigate Essex, accompanied by at least two thousand warriors of Haparr and Nukubeva, landed in boats and canoes at the head of the bay, and after penetrating a little distance into the valley, met with the stoutest resistance from its inmates. Valiantly, although with much loss, the Typees disputed every inch of ground, and after some hard fighting, obliged their assailants to retreat and abandon their design of conquest."

"The invaders, on their march back to the sea, consoled themselves for their repulse by setting fire to every house and temple in their route; and a long line of smoking ruins defaced the once smiling bosom of the valley, and proclaimed to its Pagan inhabitants the spirit that reigned in the breasts of Christian soldiers. Who can wonder at the deadly hatred of the Typees to all foreigners after such unprovoked atrocities?"

"Thus it is that they whom we denominate 'savages' are made to deserve the title. When the inhabitants of some sequestered island first descried the 'big canoe' of the European rolling through the blue waters towards their shores, they rush down to the beach in crowds, and with open arms stand ready to embrace the strangers. Fatale embrace! They fold to their bosoms the vipers whose sting is destined to poison all their joys; and the instinctive feeling of love within their breasts is soon converted into the bitterest hate."

"The enormities perpetrated in the South Seas upon some of the inoffensive islanders well nigh pass belief. These things are seldom proclaimed at home; they happen at the very ends of the earth; they are done in a corner, and there are none to reveal them. But there is, nevertheless, many a petty trader that has navigated the Pacific whose course from island to island might be traced by a series of cold-blooded robberies, kidnappings, and murders, the iniquity of which might be considered almost sufficient to sink her guilty timbers to the bottom of the sea."

"Sometimes vague accounts of such things reach our firesides, and we coolly censure them as wrong, impolitic, needlessly severe, and dangerous to the crews of other vessels. How different is our tone when we read the highly-wrought description of the massacre of the crew of the Hobomak by the Feejees! how we sympathise for the unhappy victims, and with what horror do we regard the diabolical heathens, who, after all, have but avenged the unprovoked injuries which they have received! We breathe nothing but vengeance, and equip armed vessels to traverse thousands of miles of ocean in order to execute summary punishment upon the offenders. On arriving at their destination, they burn, slaughter, and destroy, according to the tenor of written instructions, and sailing away from the scene of devastation, call upon all Christendom to applaud their courage and their justice."

Melville left the ship with a companion he calls Toby, and fled towards a ridge of hills in the interior. The obstacles he met on his route were of a formidable nature. Let us select a specimen:

"When we arrived within a short distance of the ridge, we were stopped by a mass of tall yellow reeds, growing together as thickly as they could stand, and as tough and stubborn as so many rods of steel; and we perceived, to our chagrin, that they extended midway up the elevation we purposed to ascend."

"For a moment we gazed about us in quest of a more practicable route; it was, however, at once apparent that there was no resource but to pierce this thicket of canes at all hazards. We now reversed our order of march, I, being the heaviest, taking the lead, with a view of breaking a path through the obstruction, while Toby fell into the rear."

"Two or three times I endeavoured to insinuate myself between the canes, and by dint of coaxing and bending them to make some progress; but a bull-frog might as well have tried to work a passage through the teeth of a comb, and I gave up the attempt in despair."

"Half wild with meeting an obstacle we had so little anticipated, I threw myself desperately against it, crushing to the ground the canes with which I came in contact; and, rising to my feet again, repeated the action with like effect. Twenty minutes of this violent exercise almost exhausted me, but it carried us some way into the thicket; when Toby, who had been reaping the benefit of my labours by following close at my heels, proposed to become pioneer in turn, and accordingly passed ahead with a view of affording me a respite from my exertions. As, however, with his slight frame he made but bad work of it, I was soon obliged to resume my old place again."

"On we toiled, the perspiration starting from our bodies in floods, our limbs torn and lacerated with the splintered fragments of the broken canes, until we had proceeded perhaps as far as the middle of the brake, when suddenly it ceased raining, and the atmosphere around us became close and sultry beyond expression. The elasticity of the reeds, quickly recovering from the temporary pressure of our bodies, caused them to spring back to their original position; so that they closed in upon us as we advanced, and prevented the circulation of the little air which might otherwise have reached us. Besides this, their great height completely shut us out from the view of surrounding objects, and we were not certain but that we might have been going all the time in a wrong direction."

"Fatigued with my long-continued efforts, and panting for breath, I felt myself completely incapacitated for any further exertion. I rolled up the sleeve of my frock, and squeezed the moisture it contained into my parched mouth. But the few drops I managed to obtain gave me little relief, and I sunk down for a moment with a sort of dogged apathy, from which I was aroused by Toby, who had devised a plan to free us from the net in which we had become entangled."

"He was laying about him busily with his sheath-knife, lopping the canes right and left, like a reaper, and soon made quite a clearing around us. This sight reanimated me, and, seizing my own knife, I hacked and leaped away without mercy. But, alas! the farther we advanced, the thicker and taller, and apparently the more interminable the reeds became."

"I began to think we were fairly snared, and had almost made up my mind that without a pair of wings we should never be able to escape from the toils; when all at once I discerned a peep of daylight through the canes on my right, and, communicating the joyful tidings to Toby, we both fell to with fresh spirit, and speedily opening a passage towards it we found ourselves clear of perplexities, and in the near vicinity of the ridge."

After enduring terrible hardships in the defiles of the mountains, the adventurers at length reached an uninhabited valley, where they discovered two figures half hidden in the bush:

"My mind was at once made up. Dropping my staff, and tearing open the package of things we had brought from the ship, I unrolled the cotton cloth, and holding it in one hand plucked with the other a twig from the bushes beside me, and telling Toby to follow my example, I broke through the covert and advanced, waving the branch in token of peace towards the shrinking forms before me."

"They were a boy and girl, slender and graceful, and completely naked, with the exception of a slight girdle of bark, from which depended at opposite points two of the russet leaves of the bread-fruit tree. An arm of the boy, half screened from sight by her wild tresses, was thrown about the neck of the girl, while with the other he held one of her hands in his; and thus they stood together, their heads inclined forward, catching the faint noise we made in our progress, and with one foot in advance, as if half inclined to fly from our presence."

"As we drew near their alarm evidently increased. Apprehensive that they might fly from us altogether, I stopped short and motioned them to advance and receive the gift I extended towards them, but they would not; I then uttered a few words of their language with which I was acquainted, scarcely expecting that they would understand me, but to show that we had not dropped from the clouds upon them. This appeared to give them a little confidence, so I approached nearer, presenting the cloth with one hand and holding the bough with the other, while they slowly retreated. At last they suffered us to approach so near to them that we were enabled to throw the cotton cloth across their shoulders, giving them to understand that it was theirs, and by a variety of gestures endeavouring to make them understand that we entertained the highest possible regard for them."

"The frightened pair now stood still, whilst we endeavoured to make them comprehend the nature of our wants. In doing this Toby went through with a complete series of pantomimic illustrations—opening his mouth from ear to ear, and thrusting his fingers down his throat, gnashing his teeth and rolling his eyes about, till I verily believe the poor creatures took us for a couple of white cannibals who were about to make a meal of them. When, however, they understood us, they showed no inclination to relieve our wants. At this juncture it began to rain violently, and we motioned them to lead us to some place of shelter. With this request they appeared willing to comply, but nothing could evince more strongly the apprehension with which they regarded us, than the way in which, whilst walking before us, they kept their eyes constantly turned back to watch every movement we made, and even our very looks."

They were at first uncertain whether they had fallen in with the cannibal Typees or the more innocent Haparrs. It soon appeared that their hosts were the dreaded devourers of human flesh, but they nevertheless received the fugitives with great hospitality:

"Reclining upon our mats, we held a kind of levee, giving audience to successive troops of the natives, who introduced themselves to us by pronouncing their respective names, and retired in high good humour on receiving ours in return. During this ceremony the greatest merriment prevailed, nearly every announcement on the part of the islanders being followed by a fresh sally of gaiety, which induced me to believe that some of them at least were innocently diverting the company at our expense, by bestowing upon themselves a string of absurd titles, of the humour of which we were of course entirely ignorant."

"All this occupied about an hour, when the throng having a little diminished, I turned to Melevi and gave him to understand that we were in need of food and sleep. Immediately the attentive chief addressed a few words to one of the crowd, who disappeared, and returned in a few moments with a calabash of "poe poe," and two or three young coconuts stripped of their husks, and with their shells partly broken. We both of us forthwith placed one of these natural goblets to our lips, and drained it in a moment of the refreshing draught it contained. The poe-poe was then placed before us, and even famished as I was, I paused to consider in what manner to convey it to my mouth."

"This staple article of food among the Marquesa islanders is manufactured from the produce of the bread-fruit tree. It somewhat resembles in its plastic nature our bookbinder's paste, is of a yellow colour, and somewhat tart to the taste."

"Such was the dish, the merits of which I was now eager to discuss. I eyed it wistfully for a moment, and then unable any longer to stand on ceremony, plunged my hand into the yielding mass, and to the boisterous mirth of the natives drew it forth laden with the poe-poe, which adhered in lengthy strings to every finger. So stubborn was its consistency, that in conveying my heavily-laden hand to my mouth, the connecting links almost raised the calabash from the mats on which it had been placed. This display of awkwardness—in which, by-the-by, Toby kept me company—convulsed the bystanders with uncontrollable laughter."

One of the most remarkable objects in the Typee valley appears to have been the Taboo ground of the tribe, which is thus described:

"Here were situated the Taboo graves of the valley—the scene of many a prolonged feast, of many a horrid rite. Beneath the dark shadows of the consecrated bread-fruit trees

there reigned a solemn twilight—a cathedral-like gloom. The frightful genius of Pagan worship seemed to brood in silence over the place, breathing its spell upon every object around. Here and there, in the depths of these awful shades, half screened from sight by masses of overhanging foliage, rose the idolatrous altars of the savages, built of enormous blocks of black and polished stone, placed one upon another without cement, to the height of twelve or fifteen feet, and surmounted by a rustic open temple, enclosed with a low picket of canes, within which might be seen, in various stages of decay, offerings of bread-fruit and cocoa-nuts, and the putrefying relics of some recent sacrifice.

"In the midst of the wood was the hallowed 'hoolah, hoolah,' ground—set apart for the celebration of the fantastic religious ritual of these people—comprising an extensive oblong pi-pi, terminating at either end in a lofty terraced altar, guarded by ranks of hideous wooden idols, and with the two remaining sides flanked by ranges of bamboo sheds, opening towards the interior of the quadrangle thus formed. Vast trees, standing in the middle of this space, and throwing over it an umbrageous shade, had their massive trunks built round with slight stages, elevated a few feet above the ground, and railed in with canes, forming so many rustic pulpits, from which the priests harangued their devotees.

"This holiest of spots was defended from profanation by the strictest edicts of the all-pervading 'taboo,' which condemned to instant death the sacrilegious female who should enter or touch its sacred precincts, or even so much as press with her feet the ground made holy by the shadows that it cast.

"Access was had to the enclosure through an embowered entrance on one side, facing a number of towering cocoa-nut trees, planted at intervals along a level area of a hundred yards. At the farther extremity of this space was to be seen a building of considerable size, reserved for the habitation of the priests and religious attendants of the groves.

"In its vicinity was another remarkable edifice, built as usual upon the summit of a pi-pi, and at least two hundred feet in length, though not more than twenty in breadth. The whole front of this latter structure was completely open, and from one end to the other ran a narrow verandah, fenced in on the edge of the pi-pi with a picket of canes. Its interior presented the appearance of an immense lounging-place, the entire floor being strewn with successive layers of mats, lying between parallel trunks of cocoa-nut trees, selected for the purpose from the straightest and most symmetrical the vale afforded.

"To this building, denominated in the language of the natives the 'Ti,' Mehevi now conducted us. Thus far we had been accompanied by a troop of the natives of both sexes; but as soon as we approached its vicinity, the females gradually separated themselves from the crowd, and standing aloof, permitted us to pass on. The merciless prohibitions of the taboo extended likewise to this edifice, and were enforced by the same dreadful penalty that secured the Hoolah Hoolah ground from the imaginary pollution of a woman's presence."

While Melville was laid up with sickness, his companion disappeared, having it seems found an opportunity of escaping in some European boat. Melville, however, feared that his companion might have been sacrificed by the cannibals, and his Typee associates tried to console him in vain for some days, but they finally succeeded.

"The conduct of the islanders appeared inexplicable. All reference to my lost comrade was carefully evaded, and if at any time they were forced to make some reply to my frequent inquiries on the subject, they would uniformly denounce him as an ungrateful runaway, who had deserted his friend, and taken himself off to that vile and detestable place Nukubeva.

"But whatever might have been his fate, now that he was gone, the natives multiplied their acts of kindness and attention towards myself, treating me with a degree of deference which could hardly have been surpassed had I been some celestial visitant. Kory-Kory never for one moment left my side, unless it were to execute my wishes. The faithful fellow, twice every day, in the cool of the morning and in the evening, insisted upon carrying me to the stream, and bathing me in its refreshing water.

"Frequently in the afternoon he would carry me to a particular part of the stream, where the beauty of the scene produced a soothing influence upon my mind. At this place the waters flowed between grassy banks, planted with enormous bread-fruit trees, whose vast branches interlacing overhead, formed a leafy canopy; near the stream were several smooth black rocks. One of these, projecting several feet above the surface of the water, had upon its summit a shallow cavity, which, filled with freshly-gathered leaves, formed a delightful couch.

Here I often lay for hours, covered with a gauze-like veil of tappa, while Fayaway, seated beside me, and holding in her hand a fan woven from the leaflets of a young cocoa-nut bough, brushed aside the insects that occasionally lighted on my face, and Kory-Kory, with a view of chasing away my melancholy, performed a thousand antics in the water before us.

"As my eye wandered along this romantic stream, it would fall upon the half-immersed figure of a beautiful girl, standing in the transparent water, and catching in a little net a species of diminutive shell fish, of which these people are extravagantly fond. Sometimes a chattering group would be seated upon the edge of a low rock in the midst of the brook, busily engaged in thinning and polishing the shells of cocoa-nuts, by rubbing them briskly with a small stone in the water, an operation which soon converts them into a light and elegant drinking vessel, somewhat resembling goblets made of tortoiseshell.

"But the tranquillising influences of beautiful scenery, and the exhibition of human life under so novel and charming an aspect, were not my only sources of consolation.

"Every evening the girls of the house gathered about me on the mats, and after chasing away Kory-Kory from my side—who, nevertheless, retired only to a little distance and watched their proceedings with the most jealous attention—would anoint my whole body with a fragrant oil, squeezed from a yellow root, previously pounded between a couple of stones, and which in their language is denominated 'aka.' And most refreshing and agreeable are the juices of the 'aka,' when applied to one's limbs by the soft palms of sweet nymphs, whose bright eyes are beaming upon you with kindness; and I used to hail with delight the daily recurrence of this luxurious operation, in which I forgot all my troubles, and buried for the time every feeling of sorrow."

We shall now turn to the feast of calabashes, given by the chieftain to the members of his tribe:

"What lavish plenty reigned around!—Warwick feasting his retainers with beef and ale was a niggard to the noble Mehevi!—All along the piazza of the Ti were arranged elaborately carved canoe-shaped vessels, some twenty feet in length, filled with newly made pœe-pœe, and sheltered from the sun by the broad leaves of the banana. At intervals were heaps of green bread-fruit, raised in pyramidal stacks, resembling the regular piles of heavy shot to be seen in the yard of an arsenal. Inserted into the interstices of the huge stones which formed the pi-pi were large boughs of trees; hanging from the branches of which, and screened from the sun by their foliage, were innumerable little packages with leafy coverings, containing the meat of the numerous hogs which had been slain, done up in this manner to make it more accessible to the crowd. Leaning against the railing of the piazza were an immense number of long, heavy bamboos, plugged at the lower end, and with their projecting muzzles stuffed with a wad of leaves. These were filled with water from the stream, and each of them might hold from four to five gallons.

"The banquet being thus spread, nought remained but for every one to help himself at his pleasure. Accordingly not a moment passed but the transplanted boughs I have mentioned were rifled by the throng of the fruit they certainly had never borne before. Calabashes of pœe-pœe were continually being replenished from the extensive receptacle in which that article was stored, and multitudes of little fires were kindled about the Ti for the purpose of roasting the bread-fruit.

"Within the building itself was presented a most extraordinary scene. The immense lounge of mats lying between the parallel rows of the trunks of cocoa-nut trees, and extending the entire length of the house, at least two hundred feet, was covered by the reclining forms of a host of chiefs and warriors, who were eating at a great rate, or soothing the cares of Polynesian life in the sedative fumes of tobacco. The smoke was inhaled from large pipes, the bowls of which, made out of small cocoa-nut shells, were curiously carved in strange heathenish devices. These were passed from mouth to mouth by the recumbent smokers, who, taking two or three prodigious whiffs, handed the pipe to his neighbour; sometimes for that purpose stretching indolently across the body of some individual whose exertions at the dinner-table had already induced sleep."

"The sound of the drums continued, without intermission, the whole day, and falling continually upon my ear, caused me a sensation of horror which I am unable to describe. On the following day hearing none of those noisy indications of revelry, I concluded that the inhuman feast was terminated; and feeling a kind of morbid curiosity to discover whether the Ti might furnish any evidence of what had taken place there, I proposed to Kory-Kory to walk there. To this proposition he replied by pointing with his finger to the newly risen sun, and then up to the zenith, intimating that our visit must be deferred until noon. Shortly after that hour we accordingly proceeded to the Taboo Groves, and as soon as we entered their precincts, I looked fearfully round in quest of some memorial of the scenes which had so lately been acted there; but everything appeared as usual. On reaching the Ti, we found Mehevi and a few chiefs reclining on the mats, who gave me as friendly a reception as ever. No allusions of any kind were made by them to the recent events; and I refrained, for obvious reasons, from referring to them myself.

"After staying a short time I took my leave. In passing along the piazza, previously to descending from the pi-pi, I observed a curiously carved vessel of wood, of considerable size, with a cover placed over it, of the same material, and which resembled in shape a small canoe. It was surrounded by a low railing of bamboos, the top of which was scarcely a foot from the ground. As the vessel had been placed in its present position since my last visit, I at once concluded that it must have some connection with the recent festival; and, prompted by a curiosity I could not repress, in passing it I raised one end of the cover; at the same moment the chiefs, perceiving my design, loudly ejaculated, 'Taboo! Taboo!' But the slight glimpse sufficed; my eyes fell upon the disordered members of a human skeleton, the bones still fresh with moisture, and with particles of flesh clinging to them here and there!

"Kory-Kory, who had been a little in advance of me, attracted by the exclamations of the chiefs, turned round in time to witness the expression of horror on my countenance. He now hurried towards me, pointing at the same time to the canoe, and exclaiming rapidly, 'Puarkee! puarkee!' (Pig, pig). I pretended to yield to the deception, and repeated the words after him several times, as though acquiescing in what he said. The other savages, either deceived by my conduct or unwilling to manifest their displeasure at what could not be remedied, took no further notice of the occurrence, and I immediately left the Ti."

His desire of escaping was increased when he saw that he had given grievous offence by refusing to be tattooed. The natives, however, were very unwilling to part with him, and long refused the ransom proffered for him by the captain of an English vessel. At length he was rescued partly by purchase, and partly by force. The Marquesas are now one of the colonies into which the French are introducing the same system of civilisation that they have established in Tahiti and Algiers, so that this volume may be regarded as a record of customs, which in a few years will have disappeared for ever.

WHEAT IMPORTED FROM CANADA.—It appears from a return issued by the House of Commons, that the quantity of wheat and wheat flour imported into the United Kingdom from Canada, in the year ending the 5th January, 1846, was 239,241 quarters (certified as the produce of Canada, under the Act 6th and 7th Vic. c. 29); three quarters of foreign wheat were also imported from Canada, making altogether a total of 239,244 quarters.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

NEWTON, APPELLANT, v. MOBBERY, RESPONDENT.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—In this case the revising barrister appears to have reserved two questions for the opinion of the court: first, whether the circumstances attending the execution of the grant of a rent-charge are such as to show the grant to be void as founded on fraud in fact; and, secondly, whether it is void as being made for the purpose of splitting freeholds and multiplying votes at elections in violation of the statute 7 & 8 Wm. III., c. 25. As to the first point, whether there is fraud in the making of the grant itself, the revising barrister must in all cases find the fact one way or other for himself; it is not a question that ought to be referred to the court. And it is further to be observed, that in this case he has expressly stated his own opinion to be that there was no fraud in fact. As to the second point, we think the case comes directly within the rule laid down by this court in the case of Alexander, appellant, v. Newton, respondent; and the consequence of holding this case to fall within that is, that the decision of the revising barrister ought to be affirmed in this case; and also in the following case on the list, that of Newton, appellant, v. the Overseers of Crowley, respondents, which arises on facts substantially the same as the present.

JUDSON, APPELLANT, v. LUCKETT, RESPONDENT.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—In this case, the nature of the qualification in respect of which the appellant claims to be placed on the list of voters made out by the overseers is "part of a house;" the revising barrister held the description to be insufficient. The question reserved is, whether such a description is sufficient in point of law? We have already laid down in more than one instance the mere occupation by a party of a portion of a house is an occupation separated from the residue as to constitute an occupation as a tenant within the meaning of the 28th section of 2 Will. IV.; and in this case no question is raised as to the occupation being separate in that respect, but solely on the point whether the description of the qualification on the list is sufficient? We think it is: it is precisely true, in fact, according to the common understanding of the word, and may well denote such a case as will confer—and we must take it in this case that it does confer—a qualification. It becomes therefore unnecessary to consider the second point reserved, namely, whether the revising barrister had the power of amending under the 40th section of the Registration Act? The third point reserved was as to the rating. It appeared the landlord occupied one part of the house and the appellant the other; no question being before us as to the sufficiency of the occupation. The landlord's name was on the rate for "a house" opposite to his name, and the appellant's name under that of the landlord, but nothing was carried out under the name of the appellant, nor were the names connected by brackets or otherwise; and in this state of facts the barrister held the appellant not rated. And we think on this state of facts the name is on the rate as a person charged to the rate which might well be considered to charge the appellant in respect of the premises inserted opposite the landlord's name in the line above, just as if the word "ditto" had been inserted without any bracket to connect it. We think therefore the revising barrister was wrong on both these points, and that his decision should be reversed, and the name of the appellant restored.

COLVILLE APPELLANT, v. THE OVERSEERS OF CHATHAM, RESPONDENTS.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—In this case, the point of law reserved by the revising barrister for our determination was, whether, in the case of a person claiming a right to vote for the borough, by reason of the occupation of a house as tenant, the bare value of the rent was a proper criterion of the value, without deducting the landlord's repairs? And we are of opinion the revising barrister is right in holding the bare annual profit, without making such deductions, to be the clear yearly value within the meaning of the statute, 2nd Wm. IV. chap. 45, sec. 27. It was contended before the revising barrister, not only that the average annual value of the landlord's repairs should be deducted from the rent paid by the occupier, but the landlord's expense of insurance. But this latter appears so plainly to be a voluntary charge on the part of the landlord, who insures his own house for safety, that we think such an opinion cannot be declared. Of course, the landlord's insurance never could be held a necessary deduction in order to ascertain the clear yearly value of the premises; and we think the same as to the deduction of the landlord's repairs. This is the case of the occupier of a house as tenant, who pays a rent of ten pounds per annum, exclusive of rates and taxes; that is, so far as the tenant is concerned, a clear yearly rent to the landlord of ten pounds per annum. If the statute requires that the house must be of the clear yearly value of ten pounds in order to confer a qualification, it is undoubtedly not enough to find that the tenant pays the rent that is imposed, as such rent is not a measure of the true value; it may be an exorbitant one, such as no other tenant would give, or may have been fraudulently fixed at that sum to confer a vote. It is necessary in order to satisfy the statute to show further the house is of that clear yearly value, that it is therefore a house worth ten pounds per annum as the fair rent of the premises. And whether this is proved to be the clear yearly value is the question before us. There is some difficulty in ascertaining the true meaning of the act in the use of the expression. Where the right to vote depended as it did formerly on property only, there was no difficulty in distinguishing its yearly value in the case of counties, as the 8th Henry, v. 6, c. 7, named that the knights of the shire should be chosen by the people, of whom every one should have a freehold land or tenement to the value of forty shillings by the year, at least, above all charges. And again, it appears the 18th Geo. II. c. 18, s. 5, enacts that "no person shall vote in any such election without having a freehold tenement of the clear yearly value of forty shillings above all rents and charges payable out of, or in respect of the same." It was easy to arrive at the clear yearly value, more especially as the sixth section of the late act had defined the nature of the charge intended to be created, by enacting that no public or Parliamentary tax should be deemed to be any charge payable out of, or in respect of, any freehold estate within the meaning of the act. But in the present case, the register created a new qualification for voting in boroughs, namely, that of the occupier as tenant of a house of the clear yearly value of not less than ten pounds, applying to the case of a tenant the description and definition, which, in strictness of language, and under former enactments belonged exclusively to the owner of property. For, in strictness and propriety of language, though rent, may be a fair criterion of value to the landlord, it cannot be so to the tenant; the value to let depending on the use he puts it to,

and its capabilities for occupation, and other circumstances under the control of the landlord. We cannot conceive the legislature could have intended the right to confer a vote should be dependent on calculation so nice as this, and of so difficult an application; and though it would not be easy to give effect to all the words of the section, we think it may well bear the meaning that where a house is occupied by a tenant at the clear yearly rent of 10*l.*, if such house be really worth that rent to any one wanting to occupy it, if the party was able to pay such a rent, the house would be clearly worth not less than 10*l.*, as far as the tenant is concerned; for we think the legislature intended that any person who is in such a condition as to pay such a cost charged by the owner of a house that is fairly worth the sum of 10*l.*, and shall become a tenant thereof, is a fit person to have a vote at an election of members of Parliament for the borough. In the course of the argument we were referred to the cases of rating under the Settlement Act, 13 Car. II., ch. 12. We think the appellant can derive no benefit from those cases; the rateable value of property has been considered to be what it will fairly let for to a tenant paying all such public burthens as those that are attached to his occupation. In consequence of the disputes as to the principles on which parties should be rated, the statute 6 and 7 Wm. IV., ch. 96, was passed, to state and describe the mode of ascertaining the rateable value of all kinds of property; namely, that it should be a net annual value left after making certain deductions specified in the act from the rent. But if you find in the 2 Wm. IV., ch. 45, s. 27, the expression, rateable value, we must ascertain what that is by applying to it the provisions of the 6 and 7 Wm. IV., ch. 96, where the expression is construed as clear yearly value without any deductions; that is the mode of ascertaining it. Considering that these statutes are made in diverso intuitu, it does not, we conceive, militate against the principle laid down as that which we ought to give in interpreting the 27th section. For these reasons we think the decision of the revising barrister ought to be affirmed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Staleybridge, March 3, 1846.

SIR,—I am a constant reader of your paper, and saw Mr. Ferrand's speech, in the House of Commons, of last Tuesday. Did I not believe that the house had ceased to place any credit in Mr. Ferrand, or his statements, I should be surprised that the members of the manufacturing districts did not rise as one man to contradict the scandalous assertions of that gentleman. It would be well for that gentleman if, instead of making statements on hearsay, he would visit the manufacturing districts and examine for himself. Let him come to our own town for instance, which contains 20,000 inhabitants, and some of the largest concerns in the kingdom; let him ask, one by one, and I think he would not find many who would change their present situation to go into the country, and work for 9*s.* or 10*s.* per week. Let him visit our churches and chapels on a Sunday, and he cannot (I say it with pride) tell an operative from his master. Let him visit our railway stations on a Saturday night or Sunday morning, and see the hundreds that are going to see their friends, or on parties of pleasure in the country, and when he has done all, let him show us an agricultural town where the labourers can afford these privileges; and yet we are to believe that we are ground to the dust by our tyrannical masters, the cotton lords. I will not trespass on your paper by giving the amounts of wages which an operative can earn, but I know many who have saved a deal of money by economy and steadiness. I know a boy, only 16 years of age, who is the sole support of himself and his aged father, keeping him out of the workhouse, and who is only a weaver; yet so intense is Mr. Ferrand's hatred against this manufacturing system, that I believe, had he power, he would consign it all to one grand ruin.

I know a firm in Rochdale who are intimately connected with the League, and who have not escaped from the vituperation of Mr. Ferrand, who engage a town missionary at their own expense, and give him money to distribute among the poor and afflicted in that town, yet they are among the number of cotton lords who are accused of such "tyranny, cold-blooded cruelty," and other abominations too numerous to mention. I have lived amidst the din of factories all my life, yet I never witnessed any of the cruelties which Mr. Ferrand has talked so much about. If you could put this letter in a corner of your paper, you will oblige me. I am an unlettered man, but what I have said is true, which is more than the (honourable?) member for Knaresborough can say. Wishing you every success in the good cause in which you are engaged,

I am, Sir, yours &c.,

AN OPERATIVE.

Warwickshire, Feb. 24, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—Having engaged to subscribe to your Fund of a Quarter of a Million *5*l., as my first mite, I herewith send 2*l.* by post-office order, with an engagement to forward 3*l.* when wanted, or at your request. Had I, Sir, the wealth of some of our lords, dukes, and nobles (so called), or some of the wealthy ignobles, it would not be the gift to your funds of 5*l.*, or of 500*l.*, that would please or satisfy my mind in these days. Nay, Sir, I believe, that had I as much as some of the mean and little-minded nobles of our day, who realise from 100,000*l.* to 300,000*l.* per annum, I would give the whole of my year's income to accomplish the abolition, or final destruction of all the unrighteous, unreasonable, unchristian, and cruel laws on our statute-books, which are contrary to the laws of God, as revealed in the book of heavenly inspiration, opposed to truth, and which I do not scruple to denounce as most vexatious and criminal. Among these are the Corn Laws, the Provision Laws, the Game Laws, the Poor Laws, and the Income Tax.

It is many months since I last troubled you with a line from my pen; and I now forbear saying much, knowing that time with you must be very precious. But, Sir, I feel as the result of reading and thinking, &c., what I know most of the members of her Majesty's Cabinet Council, and her lords and gentlemen of both houses cannot feel, whilst they are trifling with the weighty and all important national concerns of the present very awful crisis.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

AN OLD MINISTER OF GOD OUR SAVIOUR.

To George Wilson, Esq.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"There is that scattereth and yet increaseth."

SIR,—It is with much pleasure that I acknowledge the receipt of 1*l.* from Mr. G. G. Turner of Glasgow, through the medium of Mr. R. Fletcher; and 1*l.* from Mr. W. Riley, Chapel-en-le Frith, Derbyshire, for the use of the poor in my poor neighbourhood.

My friends may fully depend upon my making a seasonable and prudent use of the fruits of their benevolence.

As there will be a time—and that time is now at hand—when thousands of the English peasantry will ask, "What shall we do? we have no potatoe seed!" I have not lost sight of this heartrending fact; and therefore I have it in my heart, and hope to have it in my power to procure fifty or sixty bushels of potatoe-seed for the most distressed field-labourers in my own neighbourhood. I hope this will prove a new hint to those good men who, I rejoice to see, are imitating me in pleading for the poor.

I am, Sir,
Bicester. W. FERGUSON.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 7, 1846.

In political contests, as in military struggles, great danger arises from underrating the strength of the adversaries. The Austrians had actually won the battle of Marengo, when Melas, instead of pursuing his advantages, stopped short to enjoy his fancied triumph, and thus afforded Napoleon an opportunity of reversing the fortunes of the day. Though the ministerial measure has been sanctioned by a majority of ninety-seven, the protectionists assure us that they are far from recognising its destiny as decided, and that they will use their most strenuous efforts to defeat, to mutilate, and to repeal the measure. They have received a large infusion of fresh courage from the recent defeat of the ministers, though on a question of minor importance, and they vaunt that several peers, on whose neutrality the ministers had counted, will join in active opposition, and defeat every measure of Free Trade in the House of Lords. Their avowed object is to precipitate a dissolution, and to strain all the energies of deception, intimidation, and corruption, to obtain a majority in the next Parliament. It is the duty of every Free Trader to prepare for such a campaign. Let no one say to himself that the protectionists are too prudent to enter on such a desperate course. Sir H. Hardinge formed the same opinion of the Sikhs, and clung to it even when they had actually begun to cross the Sutlej. We have reason to know that the protectionists, like the Sikhs, will make more desperate efforts in their cause of speculation and plunder; and we are therefore anxious to see the League fully prepared for the encounter. It is for this reason that we again implore our friends not to slacken their efforts in obtaining contributions and subscriptions to the great Quarter of a Million Fund. It has been hitherto the most efficacious force to terrify our adversaries, and to animate the exertions of our friends within and without the walls of Parliament. Supporters and opponents look to the list of subscribers as to a kind of Free Trade gauge, for measuring the strength of public opinion; they require to be taught that the spirit of the British people is not "below proof."

During the present crisis it would be impossible for the leaders of the League to hold public meetings in the countless places where their presence is ardently desired, and where indeed it is waited for with lingering expectation. But, as Mr. Cobden has very justly said, the time for speaking has passed, the period of decisive action has arrived. We recommend the Free Traders to hold subscription meetings for themselves in their several localities; the silent eloquence of the sums attached to their names will now be of more avail than the most powerful orations or the most convincing logic. The thick skulls of opponents may resist the force of reason and argument; but they are open to the convincing argument of a strong array of figures. Though they cannot put two ideas together in their heads, yet most of them are able to count upon their fingers.

The mission of the League is not completed until Free Trade be the established law of the land, and so established that the revival of monopoly shall be impossible. We have done much with the registration; but we have to do a great deal more. The counties must not remain the recruiting depots of the monopolists; the registration movement must be continued, must be extended, and must be urged forward with increased vigour, not only to ensure success, but to secure what may be won. The Free Traders have taken a position as a constitutional force "in the presence of men and angels," which they cannot abandon without proving false to themselves, to their principles, to their country, and to future generations. They must achieve the liberation of British industry, not only from the shackles with which it has been fettered, but from the domination which may retain the power of imposing new chains. This can be done by one great and decisive effort; never had we a more favourable opportunity. Let us, then, avail ourselves of "the tide which taken at the flood leads on to triumph;" for if we neglect it, our future will inevitably be "bound in shallows."

SIR ROBERT PEELE'S POLICY.—A meeting of the inhabitants of Chelsea, adjourned from Friday last, was held last night at the Commercial-rooms, King's-road, for the purpose of expressing "their grateful sense of the patriotic, wise, and statesmanlike conduct of the Prime Minister, in proposing to Parliament, under the sanction of her Majesty, the measures now under its consideration, for removing restrictions on trade." On the motion of F. Lloyd, Esq., the gentleman by whom the meeting was called, Mr. J. H. Lee, the senior churchwarden, was called to the chair. Mr. Lloyd proposed a petition in favour of the ministerial measure, which was seconded by Mr. Burgess. Mr. Anderson moved an amendment in favour of total and immediate repeal, which was seconded by Mr. Murray, and supported by Mr. Ryder. Mr. Dowling, a working man, thought that instead of thanking Sir R. Peel, they ought to thank the Anti-Corn Law League, and their 40*s.* franchise movement (cheers). The amendment was carried by a large majority, and embodied in the petition, which was adopted. It was then resolved that the county members be requested to present and support the prayer of the petition. Colonel Wood, M.P., would be most happy to present the petition, concurring as he did in every word of it (cheers)—but how he would vote was another thing. He firmly believed that the immediate repeal would be far more advantageous to the entire community (cheers), and more especially to the agricultural interest (cheers). But he feared, voting for it under the present circumstances would endanger the great practical object for which they were all struggling (hear, hear). The hon. member, after some personal explanations, addressed the meeting at great length in support of Free Trade, and concluded by calling on the meeting and the public to give a cordial support to the right hon. baronet. Mr. Ryder moved the thanks of the meeting to their representative, Colonel Wood, for his kindness in attending the meeting, which was passed with acclamation. Thanks having been voted to the chairman, the proceedings terminated.

FREE TRADE PRINCIPLES IN FRANCE.—The Press publishes a letter from M. Blanqui on Free Trade, in which we find the following remarkable passage:—"Do you know what really would occur if we enjoyed freedom of commerce to-morrow? We should see in Paris some of those rich Turkey carpets which I contemplated at Smyrna with eyes of envy. But we in return would export light carpets to the East, to which climate they would be better suited, and we would in return receive in exchange warm carpets, such as Aubusson dare not manufacture in consequence of the absurd duty of 23 per cent. imposed upon foreign wool. We should receive Swedish iron, by which our cutlery would be raised to a level with that of England, and we could sell in return to the Swedes, who drink beer at present, some Bordeaux wine. We should receive Bohemian glass, and the Bohemian ladies would receive in return millinery from Paris. Every one would have a part in the feast, for our imports could not increase without a corresponding movement in our exports. We could not continue to buy without selling, unless foreigners should make us a present of their superfluous produce, which I would not be ashamed to receive were it offered to me."

BRECHIN.—A correspondent writes us to this effect:—"You can now have no idea of the change of opinion that is abroad amongst us in the town of Brechin. For instance, a protection paper has been lying for the last fortnight, on a table, and they have got the goodly number of four signatures. They have been more fortunate in this county. But not one, for ten that would have signed the paper five years ago, would allow their name to be admitted to it now."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

FRIDAY, FEB. 27.

On the question that the house on its rising do adjourn till Monday,

Mr. FERRAND defended himself from the attacks which had been made upon him in his absence on the previous evening. Mr. Roebuck, who had commenced the attack, was the last person who ought to have used such language. Mr. Roebuck had once, with language far more violent and indecent than any which he had used, flung down The Times newspaper upon the floor of the house, and recommended its members to horsewhip a gentleman in every way his superior. He believed that the public held Mr. Roebuck in such estimation that they would not give a quarter of a farthing for his opinions; and among all his other failures in life the knowledge of that fact ranked most deeply in his breast. Adverting to the speech of Mr. Bright, he showed that Mr. Bright had put words into his mouth which he had never used. Having repeated to the house the words which he had actually employed respecting Mr. G. Wilson, he observed that the Manchester Guardian never denied the fact of Mr. G. Wilson having convened and presided at the meeting of starch manufacturers, although it did deny that which he had never asserted, namely, that Mr. Wilson had been part of the starch deputation which had waited on the Government. Mr. Bright, however, was not a person entitled to attack him on the score of veracity, for two meetings had been recently held in Lancashire to rebut a statement which he had made in his place in Parliament, respecting the reluctance of the working classes at Preston and at Rochdale to support a ten hours' bill. Dr. Bowring had also put in his mouth words which he had never uttered, for the purpose of damaging him in the estimation of the house and of the country. Mr. Ferrand then re-stated and justified the words which he had actually used respecting Mr. H. Ashworth. He appealed to Dr. Bowring, as a member of Parliament and as a gentleman, to retract the charge which he had cast upon him. Turning next to Lord Morpeth, he asserted that he had never said that the petition from Union Mill was not a free and unbiassed petition. What he had said, was, that petitions against the Corn Laws had been in many instances signed by the workmen in the manufacturing districts against their will, and at the compulsion of their masters. He concluded by declaring that it was high time for the house to take into consideration the manner and extent in which petitions against the Corn Laws had been forged and manufactured by the Anti-Corn Law League.

Mr. C. BERKELEY corroborated the statement of Mr. Ferrand respecting the manufacturing of petitions. He held in his hand a petition which was delivered at his house on Wednesday last, purporting to come from Cheltenham, and to be signed by 594 inhabitants of that borough. There was, however, the Manchester post-mark on it, and that led him to make inquiries, which convinced him that the petition ought not to be presented as a petition from Cheltenham. On Monday he would bring forward that petition as a breach of privilege, and he called on the members of the Anti-Corn Law League to support him in his demand for inquiry into the source of this imposition.

Mr. BRIGHT expressed his readiness to second Mr. C. Berkeley's intended motion for inquiry into the source from which these fabricated petitions proceeded (hear, hear). After all that had fallen from Mr. Ferrand that evening, he was prepared still to say that Mr. Ferrand's statement respecting Mr. Geo. Wilson was unfounded. He then read a letter from a Mr. Rawsthorne, declaring that Mr. Geo. Wilson did not issue the circular convening the meeting of starch manufacturers at Manchester, that he did not preside at that meeting, and that no such deputation as that of which Mr. Ferrand had spoken had ever waited on the Government. He then adverted to some charges which Mr. Ferrand had brought against Mr. Rawson and another member of the League, as assassins, and which, he said, Mr. Ferrand shrank from substantiating in a court of law. In conclusion, he repeated that the charge of Mr. Ferrand was calumnious and unfounded altogether.

Dr. BOWRING observed that Mr. Ferrand had accused Mr. H. Ashworth of "cold-blooded cruelty" in having caused the distress and misery which existed in his neighbourhood. He appealed to Lord J. Manners, who had visited the establishment of Mr. Ashworth, whether Mr. Ferrand's statement was correct.

Mr. ROEBUCK had nothing to say, but what he had said last night; if Mr. Ferrand was not present when he spoke, the fault was Mr. Ferrand's, not his. He would not say one word respecting the attempt at sarcasm just made upon him. If he had failed in his career in life, it was his consolation that in all his misfortunes it had never been his fate to have a unanimous resolution of the House of Commons put on record against him, that what he had said was a calumny and a falsehood. He denied that he had ever dealt in personalities, unless, indeed, they called direct accusations personalities.

Mr. D'ISRAEL regretted that Mr. Ferrand made these attacks on gentlemen connected with the manufacturing districts. He had often remonstrated with Mr. Ferrand on that subject, but in vain, for it was Mr. Ferrand's honest conviction that those attacks were necessary and just, and if Mr. Ferrand entertained that conviction, he had not done anything on this occasion deserving the censure of the house. He did not know Mr. G. Wilson personally, but he did know that he had been for many years an agitator, and was therefore very sorry to find that he was so thin-skinned when his name was mentioned. With regard to Mr. Ashworth, he must express his opinion that Mr. Ferrand had substantiated his position, although he much regretted that Mr. Ferrand had taken it up. Mr. Bright had been very angry with Mr. Ferrand, because he had made some obscure accusation, which he did not well understand, against two members of the League as "assassins," and had complained that Mr. Ferrand would not give the League an opportunity of discussing them in a court of justice. Now, the same charge had been brought against the League by Sir Robert Peel, and Sir J. Graham, and why did not the League, instead of chasing such small deer as Mr. Ferrand, proceed against the antlered monarchs of the wood? Mr. Roebuck, too, had made too much of the resolution of the house against Mr. Ferrand. He thought that resolution ridiculous. Sir J. Graham and Sir R. Peel did not wish for it, and were very unwilling to have it passed. It originated from the same source from which all matters, which were disagreeable in that house, originated, namely, from Mr. Roebuck himself. When Mr. Roebuck said that no other member had been so stigmatised, he forgot that a similar resolution had been passed against Mr. O'Connell. He utterly denied that Mr. Roebuck never dealt in personalities; on the contrary, he was perpetually offending against the rules of the house and the ordinary rules of gentlemanly decorum—no man more so. Corrupt motives had been attributed to himself by Mr. Roebuck. Well, the tree must bear its fruit; the crabtree must produce crab apples; and a man of acid mind must, of course, make acid speeches. He held up to well-merited scorn the melodramatic malignity and the Sadler's-wells sarcasm with which Mr. Roebuck looked daggers, though he used none. If such gesticulations came from a person entitled to use them, he should merely say that they were ridiculous; but coming from Mr. Roebuck, they were not only ridiculous but offensive.

Mr. O'CONNELL had never been accused of calumniating any members of that house, nor had any resolution ever been passed against him for such calumnies. He had said, that the system of trying elections was a system of fraud and perjury. For that assertion the Speaker had read him a solemn lecture. As soon as it was concluded, he repeated the words: and the house proved the truth of them by repealing the system altogether.

Mr. W. BERESFORD animadverted with great warmth on the language of Mr. Roebuck, and complained that three years ago he had been very acrimoniously and unjustly treated by the election committee of which that gentleman was chairman.

Lord JOHN MANNERS gave his testimony in favour of the mode in which Mr. Ashworth conducted his mills. He believed that Mr. Ashworth, as an employer of labour, was as deeply impressed with a deep sense of the responsibility cast upon him as any baron of the cotton system: but that was no answer to the statement of Mr. Ferrand, respecting his negotiations with the Poor Law Commissioners.

Mr. FIELDEN bore testimony to the truth of Mr. Ferrand's statement respecting the distress of the hand-loom weavers.

Sir R. PEEL said, I did not mean to take part in this discussion, and should not have done so but for some observations that have fallen from the hon. member for Shrewsbury, in which he recalled to recollection something that occurred, I think three years ago, in the course of a debate at that time, in which I put an erroneous construction on some remarks of the hon. member for Stockport (hear, hear). That hon. gentleman made an explanation of the meaning of the expressions he then used; I followed the hon. gentleman in the course of the debate, and my intention, after that explanation, was distinctly to relieve him from the imputation I had cast on him under my erroneous apprehension of the remarks he had made (hear, hear). If any one who was present at that debate had hinted to me that my reparation was not complete, and that my acceptance of the disavowal was less unequivocal than it should have been, I should have taken the earliest opportunity of stating what I meant to convey. This was my intention, and I think a reference to the record of the debate will show that this must have been my intention. I am sorry, Sir, that the hon. member for Shrewsbury has thought fit to revive the subject; at least I should be sorry that he has done so, if it did not give me an opportunity of stating what my intention was, and of entirely withdrawing the imputation I threw out under what was at the time an erroneous impression (hear, hear).

Mr. COBDEN (who spoke from the lower part of the house) said—I feel happy that the right hon. baronet has had an opportunity of correcting what fell from him on a former occasion. At the time the occurrence took place I did feel, and I think the country felt, that the right hon. baronet's language did not convey that distinct disavowal which it might have done, and which was due to me (hear, hear). Still, the matter itself was so extraordinary, and so incapable of bearing the interpretation which many on that side of the house put upon it, that I did not see how I could return to it. I take the present statement, however, as a full and entire disavowal of the imputation made by the right hon. baronet, and I am glad it has been made, since it gives me the opportunity—quite as pleasant to my feelings as to those of the right hon. baronet, of expressing my regret that whilst the remembrance of what had passed in this house was ranking in my mind, I have alluded to the right hon. gentleman in terms which I lament having adopted. After the explanation that has been given, I hope no one will feel justified in ever hereafter alluding to the matter (hear, hear).

The discussion then dropped.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The adjourned debate on the Customs and Corn Importation Acts was resumed by

Mr. G. BANKES, who commented on the impropriety, in a constitutional point of view, of Sir R. Peel's addressing to her Majesty, in his capacity as a private individual, an important communication for the purpose of influencing her mind on a great public question. It was the first time in the history of England that any individual, who had been Prime Minister, had ventured to tell his sovereign that he would give his support to his successor, whoever he might be, if he entertained such and such opinions. It was this coalition between the Whigs and the broken party of Sir Robt. Peel which had prevented her Majesty from appealing to the constituencies of the country on the great change which was now proposed in our commercial system. He denounced this coalition, be it secret or avowed, because it involved the sacrifice of principle somewhere, and the knowledge of that fact had always rendered all coalitions in England unpopular. Everywhere, without exception, the elections showed that the mass of the constituency was in favour of protection. Was he, then, asking too much, when it was admitted that the fate of Ireland did not depend on this measure, in asking to have the opinion of all the constituencies in Great Britain upon it. If that demand were refused, many individuals would begin to doubt whether the existence of Parliament had not better be limited to a less period than seven years. After the lesson which had been administered to the house that night, it could attach but little weight in future to petitions. That circumstance rendered him more anxious that the representatives of the people should see their constituents face to face, explain their sentiments to them on this question, promise them what course they would pursue upon it, and then take care to perform the promises they made. At present he felt that the house was not justified in belying the expectations of those who had elected it—that the members of it would not be acting honourably in entertaining this question with a view of carrying it now—and that they ought, therefore, to oppose it in limine, especially as they disapproved of it entirely in detail. Feeling the weight of the combination now formed against the agricultural interest by men who never before were united on any subject, and whose union the country saw with inexpressible grief, he still believed and trusted that in another place such delay would occur in the progress of this measure as would give the constituencies an opportunity of declaring their opinion on this important question, "Would they be parties to this great, extraordinary, and extravagant change?"

Mr. B. ESCOTT gave his vote in favour of the measure of Government, in the strongest hope and confidence that it would be productive of benefit to the country. After what had occurred in the early part of the evening, he would not enter into the slightest collision with Mr. Ferrand; but would merely observe that the statement which that gentleman (Mr. Ferrand) had made the other evening, that he (Mr. B. Escott) had been called upon to resign his seat, and that he was acting inconsistently with his private honour in retaining it, was utterly unfounded. The question then before the house divided itself into two parts: the first, whether this great measure was likely to benefit the community? and the second, whether it was possible, in the present condition of the country and of parties in it, to prevent it from being carried? He maintained the affirmative of both these questions, and implored the protection party to prepare themselves for what they could not prevent whilst there was yet time. One reason why they could not maintain the existing Corn Laws was their extraordinary choice of leaders. Their fault was in deposing the Duke of Buckingham from the agricultural throne, and in elevating the Duke of Richmond to it in its stead. The Duke of Buckingham had never argued on the starvation principle. But could the same be said of the Duke of Richmond? He was famous for two circumstances—his predictions about wool, and his declaration that Sussex did not grow grass but timber. That was proof of his selfishness; and on such grounds Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Cobden, in the present state of the constituencies, would beat the Duke of Richmond and twenty such as him out of the field. Under these circumstances, the protection party had better put up with what they could not avoid, and cease to exasperate by their resistance a people who were all but within the grasp of famine.

Captain GLADSTONE briefly explained the reasons why he was compelled to oppose the proposition of the Government, and to support the amendment of Mr. Miles.

Mr. COBDEN—I assure the house that it is impossible for me to trespass long upon their notice, but I am anxious to say a few words before the close of this protracted debate. I have had the good, or the ill fortune, to listen to many debates upon this subject in this house, and although it has not been my fate to listen to this, at all events I have had the merit of perusing every word of it. On former occasions I have had to complain, that although the object and purpose of the motion was to discuss the principle of the Corn Laws, yet that hon. gentlemen always evaded the question, and tried to discuss every other rather than the particular question before the house (hear, hear); but however I may have had to complain of that on former occasions, I think it will be admitted that extraneous matter has been introduced into this debate by hon. gentlemen opposite to a much greater extent than before. It appears to me, that one half of the debate has turned upon the conduct of her Majesty's ministers, and nearly the whole of the other half upon the necessity of a dissolution and an appeal to the country (hear, hear). Now, though there may be ground, I will not say there may be just ground, for hon. gentlemen below the gangway assailing the ministers for the course they have pursued; yet the country, I assure them, will not sympathise with them in the quarrel with their leaders, nor will they be without some suspicion that that grievance has been dwelt upon to avoid that discussion of principle (hear, hear); for I wish to bear in mind that, on former occasions, by similar means, you did try to avoid that discussion. In 1841 you denounced the leaders of the Whigs as furiously as you denounced the leaders of your own party now; and when I came into Parliament, in the spring of 1842, I must say that I myself and the members of the Anti-Corn Law League were as much the objects of your vituperation as the ministers are now. The country, therefore, will not sympathise with you; and, on the other hand, it will doubt whether or not you have introduced these personal topics because you cannot justify the Corn Law (hear, hear). Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite have any fear that their present leaders contemplate, after the repeal of the Corn Laws, doing something else which they may think injurious to their party interests, I beg to assure them that they are taking the most effectual means of arming the present ministers with the power of accomplishing something else, if they wish it; for the more they attack them, the more obloquy they load them with, the more will the country sympathise with them out of doors. Why, you are making the present ministry the most popular men in the country (cheers). If the right hon. baronet the First Lord of the Treasury were to go into the manufacturing districts of the north, his journey would be one continued triumph (hear, hear). The right hon. Home Secretary was not personally very popular two or three years ago (a laugh). It is a difficult thing for a Home Secretary in troublesome times to become popular; but the magnificent contribution the right hon. baronet (Sir J. Graham) has given to our good cause, by his able speeches and authoritative statements of facts, has sunk deep into the mind of the country; these, and still more the martyrdom you are nightly inflicting upon him, have rendered him so popular that I don't think we could parade any one in Manchester or Liverpool who would meet with a more cordial reception. I don't think you (addressing the protectionists) are pursuing a good party course. I think you are as badly off on the score of good judgment and tactics as ever you were (a laugh). I will now, however, draw your attention to the second topic to which I have referred, and which is of still more importance. If I understand your position rightly, it is this—you say, "We wish for an appeal to the country; if the country decide that Free Trade shall be the national policy, we will bow to that decision" ("hear, hear," from the protectionists). I believe I am fairly interpreting your meaning. I tell you, then, in the first place, that if you are believers in the truth and justice of your principles, you are unworthy advocates of those principles, if you would think of abandoning them on such grounds. If you believe in the truth of your principles you should not bow to the decision of a temporary majority of the house. When I came into Parliament, in 1841, I met you with a majority of 91 in your favour. Did I then bow to that majority and submit to the Corn Law (hear, hear)? No; I felt as confident in the triumph of justice then as now. I said I would never cease my exertions till you abrogated that law. If you have confidence in the truth and justice of your principles you should use the same language. You should say, "It is not one defeat that shall make us abandon those great principles which we consider essential to the welfare and prosperity of the great mass of the people. No; if we are thrown to the ground now, we will spring up with renewed determination and vigour" (cheers, and some cries of "yes" from the protection benches). You say "Yes, yes," to that sentiment, but you had already told me by your cheers that you did not intend to do anything of the kind (laughter and cheers); I am conscientiously of opinion that you are unbelievers in the doctrines you advocate (shouts of "oh, oh!" from the protectionists). But I will assume that you can carry out your object—that you can force a dissolution; and to this point I wish particularly to draw your attention, and what is of still more importance, the attention of persons in another place. We have had some pretty frank allusions, especially in the peroration of the speech of the hon. member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Banks), to what is to be done in another place, where there is no representative with this measure of the middle classes—no merchant, no manufacturer, no spinner, no farmer. In that other place, however, what I now say on the subject of a dissolution may probably be read. You want a dissolution in order to ascertain the opinion of the country. Have you ever thought, or considered, or defined what the opinion of the country means (hear)? Do you think it means a numerical majority of this house? We shall have that to-night (loud cheers). You are not satisfied with that (hear, hear). You are preaching the democratic doctrine, that this question must be referred to the people (hear, and a laugh). Now, I want to have well defined what you mean by public opinion. You will perhaps say, "We will abide by the decision of a numerical majority of this house returned at another general election," and you will consider that the decision of the country. Well, I totally disagree with all those who believe for a moment that you would obtain a numerical majority in this house in the event of a dissolution (hear, and cheers). I ought to know as much about the state of the representation of this country, and of the registration, as any man in the house (hear, and cheers). Probably no one has given so much attention to that question as I have done; and I distinctly deny that you have the slightest probability of gaining a numerical majority in this house, if a dissolution took place to-morrow. Now, I would not have said this three months ago (hear). On the contrary, at a public meeting three months ago, I distinctly recognised the great probability of your having a numerical majority in the event of a dissolution. But your party is since broken up. Though you may still have a firm phalanx in Dorsetshire and Buckinghamshire, what has been the effect of the separation from you of the most authoritative and intelligent of your party upon the boroughs, and among the population of the north? I told you, three years ago, that the Conservatives of the towns of the north of England were not the followers of the Duke of Richmond. They were, almost to a man, the followers of that section of the Government represented by the First Lord of the Treasury and the right honourable Home Secretary (hear, hear). Every one acquainted with the towns in the north of England will bear me out when I say that those Conservatives who follow the right honourable baronet (Sir R. Peel) comprise at least four fifths of the party, while the remainder may look up to the Duke of Richmond as their leader, and sympathise with the section below the gangway. That large portion of the Conservative party in the north of England has ever been in favour of Free Trade. The language they have used to Free Traders like myself has been this: "Sir Robt. Peel will do it at the proper time (hear, hear, and cheers). We have confidence in him, and when the proper period arrives he will give us Free Trade" (renewed cheers). Then I say, that in this state of your party, I wholly deny the possibility of your gaining a majority. But I will assume, for the sake of argument, that, in the event of a dissolution of Parliament, you obtained a numerical majority. Let us see of what that majority and of what the minority opposed to you would consist (hear, hear). There are 18 representatives in Parliament for this metropolis, and there are two members for the metropolitan county. We have the whole 20 (loud cheers). They represent 110,000 electors; they represent a population of 2,000,000 of souls (hear, hear)—the most intelligent, the most wealthy, the most orderly, and notwithstanding my acquaintance with the business habits of those in the north of England, I must add, with respect to business and mechanical life, the hardest working people in England (hear, hear). Do those people express public opinion think you? Why, this metropolis assumed to itself, centuries ago, the power and privilege of closing its gates in the face of its sovereign, a power which is still retained, and which is exercised on state occasions. This metropolis is now twenty times as populous, as wealthy, as important in the world's eye as it was then; and do you think it will be content that you count it as nothing in your estimate of public opinion (hear, hear, and cheers)? But turn elsewhere. What says the metropolis of Scotland, Edinburgh? Do you reckon on having a member for that city to vote in the glorious majority which you anticipate (hear, hear)? Turn to Dublin. Will you have a representative for that city with you? Go to Glasgow, Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, and Liverpool; take every town containing 20,000 inhabitants, and I defy you to show that you can reckon on a single representative for any town in the kingdom which has such a population. I tell you that you have not with you now a town in Great Britain containing 20,000 inhabitants ("oh, oh!" from the protectionists; some honourable members mentioning "Liverpool," and "Bristol"). No, no, no; you have neither Liverpool nor Bristol (a laugh). That shows you have not weighed these matters as you are bound to weigh them (laughter). Don't be led away by the men who cheer and hallo there, like the school boy whistling in the churchyard to keep up his courage. Examine these facts, for those who were formerly your leaders have weighed them already (hear, hear, and cheers), and there is none among you deserving to be your leaders unless they have well considered these important matters. I repeat that you cannot reckon upon any town of 20,000 inhabitants sending up a representative to vote with the great majority you expect to obtain. True, you will have your pocket boroughs, and your nomination counties (hear, hear). And I will say a word or two directly as to the county representation; but I now place before you broadly the situation in which you will find yourselves after a dissolution. I will assume that you have a majority, derived from pocket boroughs and nomination counties, of twenty or thirty members. But on this side you will see the representatives for London, for South Lancashire, for West Yorkshire, for North Cheshire, for North Lancashire, and the members for all the large towns of England, Ireland, and Scotland; nay, not one member will come from any town in Scotland to vote with you (hear). Now, what would then be your situation? Why, you would shrink agast from the position in which you would find yourselves. There would be more defections from your ranks, pledged as you are—steeped to the chin in pledges. So much alarmed would you be at your position, that you would cross the floor to join us in larger numbers than you have ever yet done (laughter). I tell you there would be no safety for you without it. I say that the members who came up under such circumstances, to attempt to maintain the Corn Laws, from your Ripons and Stamfords, Woodstocks and Marlboroughs, would hold those opinions only till they found it was determined by public opinion to repeal them. They could not hold them one week longer; for if the country found that they would not give way to moral force, they might think it requisite to place them in another Schedule A (laughter). Now, I have told you what, in my opinion, constitutes public opinion. Had there been such an amount of public opinion as now exists in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws, in support of the Pretender in 1745, the dynasty of the Stuarts would now have occupied the throne of these realms. That amount of public opinion is sufficient to change the constitution of this country; to alter your forms of Government; to do anything, in short, that public opinion is determined to effect. But you may probably tell me that though we have the electors of the great constituencies I have mentioned in our favour, the great mass of the people are not with us. This is a rather democratic sentiment (hear, and a laugh). You never heard me quote the superior judgment of the working classes in any deliberations in this assembly. You never heard me cant about the superior claims of the working classes to arbitrate on this great question. But you say the mass of the people are not with us. What evidence is there that this is the case? Will you shut your eyes to proofs? Will you go blindfold against a stone wall? You say the petitions presented to this house have not been honestly signed ("hear, hear," from the protectionists). I cannot disprove that assertion. It must go for what it is worth. But we have ten times as many signatures to our petitions for Corn Law repeal as you have to your protection petitions (cheers). You may assume that the signatures to those petitions are fictitious. Do so if you please. I will give you another test. I will challenge you to the old Saxon mode of ascertaining what are the opinions of the country, by calling public meetings. Now, if you really entertain democratic opinions, this is the way in which to elevate the working man to an equality with his master; aye, to an equality with the peer of the realm,—bringing them out into public assemblies, where every man has an equal vote—assemblies which make laws for the conduct of their own proceedings, and elect their own chairman. Call your public meetings to support the Corn Laws (hear, hear). I challenge you to call one anywhere. Why, it is not in the manufacturing districts alone that meetings have been held since the 1st of November last. Public meetings, convened by the authorities, have been held in every large town,—meetings not confined to a particular class, or consisting of men pledged to particular opinions, but convened to determine, aye or no, whether the people should petition for Free Trade or not. These meetings have not been confined to the manufacturing districts alone; they have been held at Exeter, Brighton, and Oxford, and the opinion of the people was as unanimous at those places as at Bolton, Stockport, and Manchester. Now, cannot you call a public meeting and test the opinions of the people? Would not one meeting, at all events, be something like a proof that you are practical men, and not disposed to be misled by the chimeras of those hot-headed, half-witted people who try to deceive you? I have seen some of your notices calling protection meetings. One was forwarded to me from Epworth, in Lincolnshire, by a gentleman who complained that the notice was so framed that protectionists only could attend, and that no amendment could be proposed (cries of "hear, hear"). Why, in the purely agricultural district of Haddingtonshire, in the centre of the Lothians, a protection meeting was called about six weeks ago. All the neighbouring nobility and landed proprietors attended; they talked of the British Lion, and of the nation being with them (hear). Soon after, another meeting was held, when it was proposed to petition for the repeal of the Corn Laws. The protectionists fled from the room, the largest room in the place; but it was quite full without them, and resolutions in favour of repeal were adopted. Was this evidence of public opinion (a cry of "no," from the protection benches). Was it not? Then what will teach you what public opinion is? Must you be tossed in a blanket (laughter)? Must you be swept out of this house into the Thames (a laugh)? What must be done to convince you that the feeling of the nation is not with you? You will be abandoned to fatuity and destruction if you are left to persons who have so little mercy upon you as to delude you on this question. I said that I would refer to the county representation. You are pluming yourselves on the result of recent county elections, and you are reckoning, no doubt, on the attainment of great strength from your purely agricultural counties in the event of a dissolution; but I beg to remind honourable gentlemen that the county representation under the 50*l.* tenant-at-will clause of the Reform Act is not the old county representation (hear, hear). We never heard, 20 years ago, of requisitions being got up to candidates by tenant farmers. The requisitions were then got up by freeholders (hear, hear). You introduced into the Reform Act, by a great mistake (cheers) on the part of those who then had the power to have prevented it, a clause innovating on the old constitutional custom, and giving tenants-at-will a vote for counties. Do you mean to tell me that the votes of these tenants-at-will are an evidence of public opinion? We heard a definition of tenant-at-will votes last night, which, with the permission of the house, I will read. The hon. member for Dorsetshire, (and I congratulate the Free Traders on his advent here,) told us with great naïveté, "He (Mr. Seymour), with his hon. colleague, came forward at the recent election for Dorset, in consequence of a requisition signed by the great body of the tenant farmers. Three or four of the largest properties in the county were in the hands of Free Traders, and naturally the tenants on those estates held back and refused to sign the requisition till they knew what were the wishes of their landlords (cheers), for it was notorious that English tenants generally wished to consult the feelings of their landlords. He (Mr. Seymour) did not think tenants to blame for that. Knowing that their landlords were Free Traders, the tenancies in question made inquiry, previous to signing, whether those landlords would object to their taking the course their conscience dictated; the landowners, very much to their credit, said, that this being a farmer's question, they would not interfere, and then, almost without exception, the farmers on those properties signed the requisition" (cheers). Yes, yes; it is all very well for those who get the consent of their landlords to vote, but recollect what the hon. gentleman says at the commencement of his remarks. He tells us that he and his colleague were put in nomination in consequence of a requisition signed by tenant farmers, that is, in consequence of a requisition got up by command of the landlords, and signed by the farmer (cries of "oh," from the protectionists). Now, I put it to you candidly,—is it not an understood etiquette in counties that one proprietor who is a candidate should not canvass the tenants on the estate of another till he has obtained the sanction of the owner ("no," and cheers). Am I to understand that the protectionist gentlemen in a body below the gangway contradict me when I state it as a point of etiquette in counties that one proprietor, who is a candidate, does not think it proper to canvass the tenantry on the estate of another proprietor without first intimating to the landowner his intention and desire to do so (renewed cries of "no")? Well, there are only two or three faint noises (laughter, and cries of "order"). I think the ayes have it (laughter and cheers). But, however, this point at all events is admitted, that as a rule farmers vote with the landlords: that the vote goes with the land; nobody denies that the farm carries the right. What right, then, have you to call this the opinion of the farmer? You cannot have it both ways. It cannot be both the opinion of the landlord and the opinion of the tenants. What becomes then of all those interesting romances in which the Duke of Richmond has indulged in public, about the bold, independent, and gallant yeomanry of the country (a laugh)? Why, these are the men who have not the right of using their suffrages (hear, hear). It is your own statement (cheers). This country certainly will not be governed by a combination of landlords and tenants (hear, hear). Probably you are not aware on what a very narrow basis this power of yours rests. But I can give you some information on the subject. There are about 150,000 tenants who form the basis of your political power, and who are distributed throughout the counties of this country. Well, let it come to the worst; carry on the opposition to this measure for three years more; yet there is a plan in operation much maligned by some honourable gentlemen opposite ("hear, hear," from the protection benches)—and still more maligned in another place, but which, the more the shoe pinches and the more you wince at it, the more we like it out of doors (hear, hear). Now, I say, we have confronted this difficulty, and are preparing to meet it. We are calling into exercise the true old English forms of the constitution (cries of "oh, oh," and cheers), of five centuries antiquity, and we intend that the ancient 40s. freehold franchise shall counterbalance this innovation of yours in the Reform Bill (hear, hear). You think that there is something revolutionary in this ("hear, hear," from the protection benches). Why, you are the innovators and the revolutionists who introduced this new franchise into the Reform Bill (hear, hear). But I believe that it is perfectly understood by the longest heads among your party that we have a power out of doors to meet this difficulty (hear, hear). You should bear in mind that less than one-half of the money invested in the savings' banks, laid out at better interest in the purchase of freeholds, would give qualifications to more persons than your 150,000 tenant-farmers (hear, hear). But you say that the League is purchasing votes, and giving away the franchise. No, no; we are not quite so rich as that; but be assured that if you prolong the contest for three or four years (which you cannot do); if, however, it comes to the worst, we have the means in our power to meet the difficulty, and are prepared to use them (hear, hear). Money has been subscribed to prepare our organisation in every county, and we are prepared to meet the difficulty, and to overcome it (hear, hear). You may think that there is something repulsive (hear) to your notions of supremacy in all this. I see a very great advantage in it, even if the Corn-Laws were to be repealed to-morrow ("hear, hear," from the protection benches). I think that you cannot too soon widen the basis of our county representation. I say, with respect to a man, whether he be a small shopkeeper or a mechanic, who by his prudence has saved 50*l.* or 100*l.*, and is willing to lay it out in the purchase of a cottage or land bringing in 40*s.* a-year as a freehold,—I say that it is to that man of all others that I would wish to intrust the franchise (hear, hear). Let it be understood that all this extraneous matter is not of my introducing; for your debate has turned on the question of dissolution. No one can complain of my having, on this question, been guilty of often introducing irrelevant matter. I generally keep close to the argument; but you have chosen to say now that you will not settle the question by argument, and by an appeal to facts and reason in this house; that you will have nothing to do with this house, but that you will go to the country (hear). I do not ask you to take my opinion for it; but, as mischief may be averted from yourselves, more from another place to which allusion has been made than from others—I do ask you to take these facts home, to study them for yourselves, to look over the registry, to count the population of the towns, and then to come down and say whether you think the public opinion of the country is with you or against you (cheers). So much of the discussion has turned on this extraneous question, and what little argument has been addressed to the merits of the case has been so abundantly answered by other persons (shouts of "oh, oh," from the protection benches), that it would be impertinent in me to trespass at too great length on the time of the house ("oh, oh"). Well, I will tell you what my thoughts were as I sat at home patiently reading these debates. As I read speech after speech, and saw the old protection fallacies which I had knocked on the head seven years ago re-appearing afresh, my thought was, what fun these debates will afford to the men in fustian jackets (hear, hear, and laughter). All these fallacies are perfectly transparent to these men, and they would laugh at you for putting them forward (hear, hear, hear). Dependence on foreigners (laughter)! Who in the world could have supposed that that long-buried ghost would have come again to light (cheers and laughter)? Drain of gold (laughter)! Wages rising and falling with the price of bread (continued laughter)! Throwing land out of cultivation, and bringing corn here at 2*s.* per quarter (cheers and laughter)! You forget that the great mass of the people now take a very different view of these questions from what you do (hear, hear). They formerly, seven years ago, did give in, to a certain extent, to your reiterated assertions that wages rise and fall with the price of bread (cries of "hear, hear"). You had a very fair clap-net against us (as we happened to be master manufacturers) in saying that we wanted to reduce wages. But the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government, and the right honourable baronet the Home Secretary, are not suspected by the English people of having such motives on these questions (hear, hear). The English people have no disinclination to defer to high authorities on these matters. They assume that men high in office have access to accurate information, and they generally suppose that that those men have no sinister motive for deceiving the great body of the people on a question like the present (hear, hear). You see, I do not underrate the importance of your leaders having declared in favour of Free Trade (hear, hear). On the contrary, I avow that that has caused the greatest possible accession to the ranks of the Free Traders (hear, hear). Well, then, the working classes, not believing that wages rise and fall with the price of bread, when you tell them that they are to have corn at 2*s.* a quarter, instead of being frightened, are rubbing their hands with satisfaction (cheers and laughter). They are not frightened at the visions which you present to their eyes of a big loaf, seeing that they expect to get more money, and bread at half the price (hear, hear, and a laugh). And then the danger of having your land thrown out of cultivation! Why, what would the men in smockfrocks in the south of England say to that? They would say, "We shall get our land for potato ground at a $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a lug, instead of paying 3*d.* or 4*d.* for it" (hear). These fallacies have all been disposed of; and if you lived more in the world, more in contact with public opinion and less within that charmed little circle which you call the world, but which is really nothing but a clique—if you gave way less to the excitement of clubs, less to the buoyancy which arises from talking to each other as to the effect of some smart speech in which a Minister has been assailed, you would see that it was a mere child's play to attempt to baulk the intelligence of the country on this great question, and you would not have talked as you have talked for the last 11 days (cries of "hear, hear," and laughter). Now, with respect to the farmers, I will not deny that you have a large portion of the farmers clinging to their landlords on this question (hear). They have been talked to and frightened by their landlords, as children by their nurses, and they dread some hideous prospect or some old bogie, ready to start up before their eyes (laughter). They do not know what is to happen; but they have not strict and implicit faith in you. They are afraid lest anything should happen to render them unable to make terms with the lords in the matter of rent; or otherwise they are perfectly easy and willing to receive Free Trade to-morrow (hear, and laughter). They are afraid of how the adjustment might be conducted; and the question, therefore, I have no hesitation in saying, is a landlord's question. On this subject the farmers have had some hints given them in the following paragraph which appeared some time ago in the Standard newspaper: "Under what head then is the farmer to look for relief? Under the head rent. The landlord must reduce rent; but the farmer knows, by rather bitter experience, the process by which this reduction must be effected. He must be first himself rendered unable to pay rent, and then the landlord will yield, and not before." This is the character given by the Standard newspaper of the landlords, and in this consists the great difficulty with the farmers. I do not think that the farmers generally believe all that you have told them. I believe that farms let as high now as ever they did. There is something remarkable in this. Since the right hon. baronet has proposed his measure, I have directed my attention to this point, because I conceive that it solves much of our difficulty. I have inquired of land agents, land proprietors, lawyers, &c., as to whether land has suffered any depreciation in value in consequence of the proposition on this subject made by the Government? Now, it is remarkable, that land seems to be the only commodity not injuriously affected by the proposed measures of the Government, that though French silks are for the moment rendered almost unsaleable, and though the proposed change has produced almost a paralysis in every trade touched, yet land is letting and selling for higher prices than ever (hear, hear). Now, I will give you an example. I will mention a case, and I am at liberty to mention the name. The hon. member for Somerset will corroborate what I am going to state. Mr. Gordon, a near neighbour of that hon. member, has made the tenants upon 60 of his farms an offer that he would take their land off their hands on equitable terms at Lady Day; yesterday was the last day for giving notice of accepting his offer, and not one farmer proposed to do so (hear, hear). I think it is not very complimentary to the hon. member for Somerset. Mr. Gordon is a near neighbour of his, and his tenants of course have had the privilege of hearing those eloquent addresses which the hon. member has made in Somerset, wherein he has told them that land will not be worth cultivation at all, or, at least, that there will be such an avalanche of corn from the Continent and from America as will quite supersede home cultivation, and yet these farmers seem to have so little alarm that they are willing to hold their farms at their present rents (hear, hear). Let me read you, too, the account that is given me by a gentleman in the city, an eminent solicitor, whom I have known for some years, and who is largely interested in landed property: "I have for many years been connected with the management of landed property, and with the purchase and letting of estates in several different counties, and am at this time negotiating for the renewal of leases and letting of lands in Bedfordshire, Herts, and Essex. In the latter county, the tenant who has occupied a farm of 500 acres for 14 years under a lease, and who has always spoken of his rent as somewhat high, and of his own farming as the best in his own neighbourhood, has now offered a considerable increase of rent (15 per cent.) for a new lease of 14 years, and to covenant to underdrain two-thirds of the farm, the landlord finding draining tiles, now acknowledging that the cultivation may be greatly improved, so as to meet the increase of rent. The farmer has another occupation, and is not therefore under any fear of being without a farm. He is a protectionist in words, and a supporter of Sir John Tyrrell. Under the ramour that this farm might be given up, there were eight or ten most respectable applicants for it. In Hertfordshire I am at this moment renewing leases upon two large farms, both with the offer of increased rents and with covenants for greatly improved cultivation, particularly as to underdraining. In Bedfordshire upon two moderate-sized farms the same has been the result, and on the application for one of them, which the farmer is quitting in consequence of age and infirmity, the following conversation took place on the application to me by an intelligent farmer for the farm:—I understand, Sir, that you have the letting of Mr. L's farm, as he is quitting.—I have.—I should like to have the offer of it. My name is —, and I can refer you to the clergyman of my parish, and to several gentlemen, for my character and responsibility.—You are, I presume, a farmer?—Yes, Sir, I have one farm, and I should like another to extend my occupation, as I have sufficient capital.—You know the farm, I presume, and the rent which the present tenant pays.—Yes, Sir, I know the farm and the rent; and as we are no longer to have any protection, and the Corn Laws must now be repealed, I hope you will consider that point in the rent.—Pray, as you say that the Corn Laws will be repealed, what in your judgment will be the effect?—Why, Sir, the first will be the waking up of thousands of farmers who have hitherto been asleep (cheers); and we must look to increased efforts and increased production (renewed cheers).—With respect to rent, I must have a small increase, and I must require covenants for better cultivation, more especially as to underdraining, which must be done very extensively?—Sir, my intention is, if I have the farm, to underdrain the whole of it, being allowed tiles.—Well, as you are a man of observation, and acquainted with different districts in Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Herts, tell me whether I am right (so far as your observation goes) in saying that under improved cultivation one-third more corn can be grown, and the sample much better?—I have no doubt that you are right.—Then, if I am right, what have you to fear from the abolition of the Corn Law?—Nothing at all, Sir (cheers).—This person has hired the farm at increased rent, and undertaken to underdrain the whole, if required by the landlord so to do" (cheers). Now, hon. gentlemen must, of course, be better able than I can be to judge from their own experience whether this be a fair statement of the case or not; but I would put it to them, are any of them prepared to sell their own estates for one farthing less now than they were twelve months ago (cries of "hear, hear")? But if farmers will take the land at the same rent, and if you will not take less than 30 years' purchase now upon the present rental, where are the proofs that you are in earnest in all that you predict as the consequences of the repeal of the Corn Laws (cheers)? Nay, this is a proof that there has been a system of mutual self-deception, or mutual deception between you and the farmers (cries of "order," "hear, hear"). You have preached doctrines which the farmers have affected to believe, but which neither of you has believed at heart ("order, order"). Either you have been doing this jointly, doing it that you might practise upon the credulity of your countrymen, or else you are now pursuing a most unworthy and inconsistent course, because, after telling the farmers at your protection meetings that wheat is to be sold at 30*s.* or 35*s.* a quarter, and that they cannot carry on their business in competition with the Russians and the Poles, even if they have their land rent free, with what fairness or consistency can you now let your land to farmers at the existing rents (cheers)? But the truth is, that you know—that the country knows—that there never was a more monstrous delusion than to suppose that that which goes to increase the trade of the country and to extend its manufactures and commerce—that which adds to our wealth, increases our population, enlarges the number of your customers, and diminishes your burdens by multiplying the shoulders that are to bear them, and giving them increased strength to bear them, can possibly tend to diminish the value of land (hear, hear). You may affect the value of silks, you may affect the value of cottons or woollens; transitory changes of fashion may do that—changes of taste; but there is a taste for land inherent in human kind, and especially is it the desire of Englishmen to possess land (hear, hear), and therefore, while you have a monopoly of that article which our very instincts lead us to desire to possess, if you see any process going on by which our commerce and our numbers are increased, it is impossible to suppose that it can have the effect of diminishing the value of the article that is in your hands (cheers). What, then, is the good of this "protection"? Why, the country have come to regard it, as they regard witchcraft, as a mere sound and a delusion (a laugh). They no more regard your precautions against Free Trade, than they regard the horseshoes that are nailed over the stables to keep the witches away from the horses (cheers and laughter). They do not believe in protection; they have no fear of Free Trade; and they are laughing to scorn all the arguments by which you are trying to frighten them (hear, hear). How can protection, think you, add to the wealth of a country? Can you, by legislation, add one farthing to the wealth of a country? You may, by legislation, in one evening destroy the fruits and accumulations of a century of labour (cheers from the protection benches), but I defy you to show me how, by the legislation of this house, you can add one farthing to the wealth of this country. That springs from the industry and intelligence of the people of this country. You cannot guide that intelligence; you cannot do better than leave industry to its own instincts. If you attempt by legislation to give any direction to trade and industry, it is a thousand to one that you are doing wrong; and if you happen to be right, it is a work of supererogation; for the parties for whom you legislate would go right without you, and better than with you (hear, hear). Then, if this is true, why should there be any difference of opinion between us? Hon. gentlemen may think that I have spoken hardly to them on this occasion; but I want to see them come to a better conclusion on this question. I believe, if they will look the thing in the face, and divest themselves of that crust of prejudice which oppresses them, we shall all be better friends about it (hear). There are but two things that can prevent it; one is, their believing that they have a sinister interest in this question, and therefore not looking into it; and the other is, an incapacity for understanding political economy (hear, hear, and a laugh). I know that there are many heads which cannot comprehend and master a proposition in political economy. I believe that study is the highest exercise of the human mind, and that the exact sciences require by no means so hard an effort. But, barring these two accidents—want of capacity, and having a sinister interest—I defy any man to look into this question honestly, and come to any other than one conclusion (cheers). Then why should we not concur in this matter? Why should there be any triumph for either? I want no triumph (hear). Come down to us, and let us hold a Free Trade meeting in our hall at Manchester; come to us now, protectionists, and let us see whether we cannot do something better for our common country than carrying on this strife of parties (hear, hear, and cheers). Let us once for all recognise this principle, that we must not tax one another for the benefit of one another (renewed cheers). Now I am going to read you an authority that will astonish you. I am going to read you an extract from a speech of the Duke of Wellington, in the House of Lords, on the 17th of April, 1832. It is his opinion on taxation:—"He thought taxes were imposed only for the service of the state. If they were necessary for the service of the state, in God's name let them be paid; but if they were not necessary, they ought not to be paid, and the legislature ought not to impose them." Now there, that noble duke, without having time to study Adam Smith or Ricardo, by that native sagacity which is characteristic of his mind, came at once to the marrow of this question (hear, hear). We must not tax one another for the benefit of one another. Oh, then, divest the future Prime Minister of this country of that odious task of having to reconcile rival interests; divest the office, if ever you would have a sagacious man in power as Prime Minister, of the responsibility of having to find food for the people! May you never find a Prime Minister again to undertake that awful responsibility! It belongs to God and to nature,—to those laws of trade which Burke says are the laws of God and of nature,—it belongs to them, and to them only, to regulate the supply of food, and of every commodity for the use of mankind. When you shall have seen that the abolition of these laws in three years is inevitable, you will, I feel assured, meet the wishes of the farmer by making the repeal immediate, and dissolve the League, as in good faith it will be dissolved (loud cries of "hear, hear" from the protection benches). I say that when you find it to be inevitable, as inevitable it is, you will come forward and join with the Free Traders (cheers and laughter); for if you do not, you will have the farmers coming forward and agitating in conjunction with the League (cheers). You are in a position to gain honour in future; you are in a position, especially the young members among you who have the capacity to learn the truth of this question, they are in a position to gain honour in this struggle; but as you are going on at present your position is a false one, you are in the wrong groove, and are every day more and more diverging from the right point. It may be material for you to get right notions of political economy; questions of that kind will form a great part of the world's legislation for a long time to come (hear, hear, and cheers). We are on the eve of great changes (cheers and counter-cheers). Put yourselves in a position to be able to help in the work, and so gather honour and fame where they are to be gained. We are the aristocracy of the human race—not the privileged aristocracy, but the aristocracy of improvement and civilisation. We have set an example to the world in all ages; we have given them the representative system. Why, the very rules and regulations of this house have been taken as the model for every representative assembly throughout the whole civilised world; and having besides given them the example of a free press, of civil and religious liberty, and of every institution that belongs to freedom and civilisation, we are now about to offer a still greater example; we are going to set the example of making industry free (cheers)—to set the example of giving the whole world every advantage in every clime, and latitude, and production; relying ourselves on the freedom of our industry. Yes, we are going to teach the world that other lesson. Don't think there is anything selfish in this, or anything at all discordant with Christian principles. I can prove that we advocate nothing but what is agreeable to the highest behests of Christianity. To buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. What is the meaning of the maxim? It means that you take the article which you have in the greatest abundance, and obtain from others that of which they have the most to spare, so giving to mankind the means of enjoying the fullest abundance of every earthly good, and in doing so carrying out to the fullest extent the Christian doctrine of "Doing to all men as ye would they should do unto you." (The honourable member sat down amidst loud and prolonged cheering).

Mr. SPOONER thought that if a stranger had entered the house during the last speech, he would have supposed that the debate was on the propriety of repealing the 50% clause, or of passing a new Reform Bill, but would never have imagined that it was upon going into a Committee on the Customs and Corn Importation Acts. He then proceeded to express the reasons which induced him to support the amendment in preference to the proposition of the Government; but the interruptions in the house were so frequent that it was impossible to follow the chain of his arguments.

Mr. P. BORTHWICK followed on the same side amid still greater interruptions.

Lord G. BENTINCK condemned the proposition of the Government as vicious in principle and likely to be deeply injurious not only to agriculture but to all the great interests of the country. Certainly it could not be carried in what he emphatically called a protection Parliament without a loss of honour to public men. The alleged change of circumstances in the state of the country, combined with the experience of the last three years, formed no justification for Sir Robert Peel in abandoning the whole course of policy he had pursued for the last 30 years. Accepting the challenge that had been thrown out to name any articles on which the repeal of prohibitory or protective duties had operated injuriously either to the consumer or producer, the noble lord adduced a variety of statistical details connected with the silk, woollen, spelter, and timber trade, for the purpose of showing that a relaxation of the protective system had, in those instances, signally failed. In fact, the Free Trade doctrine was an absolute delusion. The price of wheat was now actually lower than the average of three years before 1842. He contended that the rate of wages would fall with the price of corn, and the working-classes would be better off with undiminished wages and wheat at 70s. per quarter, than with corn at 45s. and reduced means of procuring it. The apprehension of famine was altogether a mistake. The crop was more than an average one, and in some parts of the country, in Scotland particularly, there was a positive repletion. The potato murrain was by no means so extensive as it had been represented; indeed, he complained that only one side of the question had been stated to the house. He had individually made some inquiries relative to the subject, and he discovered that in Roscommon there was no disease at all, while in Tipperary and Queen's County it prevailed but very partially. According to his noble friend, the Marquis of Clanricarde, one half of the evil was attributable to the conduct of the Government in sending commissioners to Ireland and creating alarm. The potatoes were dug up before they were ripe, and they rotted. The cry of famine was a mere pretence for a party object. The Duke of Wellington had admitted that there was no scarcity of food in Ireland, and Lord Cloncurry declared that there was a sufficiency of oats now in that country to feed the whole population. Never was there a change of so extensive a character proposed, on so slender a basis, and with so little just cause shown. He should not have objected to open the ports had that been necessary; but he could not see how the necessity alleged by Government could be met by Free Trade in corn three years hence. Much greater benefit would be derived by the public from a remission of the duties on tea and sugar, two of the main necessities of life, produced by countries favourable to commercial intercourse with England, and which came into no rivalry with our domestic produce.

The house divided at 20 minutes to three o'clock. The numbers were—

Noes	240

Majority against it 97

The main question was then put and carried.

The house then resolved itself pro forma into committee. The chairman was ordered to report progress, and to ask leave to sit again on Monday.

MONDAY.—FABRICATED PETITIONS.

Mr. C. BERKELEY rose to call the attention of the house to the petition which he had presented on Friday last, complaining that a petition had been forwarded for presentation to that house, ostensibly from Cheltenham, but in reality it was from Manchester. This, he believed, the house would agree with him in saying was a breach of its privileges; and, having laid the case before them, he would willingly adopt any course which might be pointed out for vindicating those privileges. He could prove that many of the signatures to that petition were forgeries, and that many names were added which were not on the original sheet. As a breach of its privileges, he would leave the house to deal with the case as it might deem proper. He was the more anxious that the house should take the matter up, because complaints were very general out of doors that the petitions of the people did not receive that attention from the house to which they were entitled; but this fact could not excite surprise in any one, from the manner in which petitions were got up in many parts of the country. If the house would give him a committee of inquiry, he would put the fact of the fabrication of petitions and the forgeries of signatures beyond all doubt. He would now move that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the presentation of certain forged petitions and signatures, and under what circumstances those signatures had been attached.

Mr. NEWDEGATE, in seconding the motion, said that the hon. member had very properly called the attention of the house to this subject, but there was another subject to which that attention should also be given. He alluded to the practices of the agents of the Anti-Corn-Law League in the manufacturing of votes at the registrations. He thought that the privileges of that house were in greater danger from such practices than even from petitions with forged signatures. He did hope, therefore, that if the committee should be appointed, its labours would not be confined to the one subject mentioned by the hon. member (Mr. C. Berkeley), but that it would also inquire into the proceedings of the Anti Corn-Law League at the registrations, by notices of objections which were utterly without foundation. It was stated to him that in one case 710 notices of objections had been sent by one individual. In the parishes of Birmingham and Edgbaston, such notices of objection were given and delivered later than the time allowed by law. In the statement to which he had referred, it was said that 30,000 notices of objections had been posted one night in Manchester. The hon. member was proceeding, when

Mr. HUME rose to order. The hon. member was entering on a subject which had no reference to the motion before the house. What had the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-Law League to do with the privileges of that house? If the hon. member would move for an inquiry into the circumstances to which he had referred, he (Mr. Hume) would support him, but he would put it to him whether, considering the important matters which were about to be submitted to its consideration, he ought to occupy the time of the house by matters which had no reference to the subject before it? He hoped the hon. member would take another time for his remarks.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said he was in the hands of the house, and would do as it might wish; but, whatever course he might take, he did not think he was out of order in stating that which could be put beyond all doubt, that the privileges of that house had been violated over and over again by the agents of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

The SPEAKER said, although the subject referred to by the hon. member affected the privileges of the house, it was not analogous to the subject of inquiry of the proposed committee, and therefore there would be a difficulty in making the addition the hon. member desired to the motion of the hon. member for Cheltenham.

Mr. NEWDEGATE then gave notice that he should move an instruction to the committee, if appointed, to the same effect as the proposition.

Mr. BRIGHT observed that he had offered the other night to second the motion of the hon. member for Cheltenham, but he had since received an explanation, which, perhaps, he had better submit to the house before the motion was disposed of. He had in his hand a letter from the Secretary to the Anti-Corn-Law League at Manchester, which he would read to the house:

"National Anti-Corn Law League, Manchester, Feb. 28.

"Dear Sir,—I see by the newspapers of to-day that you have had a stir in the house about a petition from Cheltenham, which was sent from this office on Tuesday last; and, as you have promised to second the motion of which Mr. Berkeley has given notice, I may as well put you in possession of the facts, as far as I know anything of them. You know that in January we sent out from this office a circular, of which copies were addressed to our Free Trade friends in all parts of the kingdom, suggesting the sending of petitions for immediate repeal. Among many hundreds of replies to that circular was one from Peter Vines, of Cheltenham, and of this I enclose a copy. In consequence of the request of Mr. Vines, I ordered copies of the printed form of the South Lancashire petition to be sent to him, with a few of the other bills he mentions, and we heard no more of the matter until last Tuesday, when we received (I believe by post) a number of sheets containing the signatures, which we had to paste together, and attach the head. Mr. Septimus Pruen, a respectable solicitor of Cheltenham, sent the sheets to us. As Mr. Berkeley is member of Parliament for the borough, I ordered Mr. Walters, our clerk, to send the petition to him for presentation. I can say nothing as to how the signatures were obtained, except that as Mr. Pruen and Messrs. Bishop and Vines had the management of the matter, I should have had the fullest confidence that all would be done honourably and fairly. I did not expect the sheets to be sent to us, but that the whole would be forwarded direct from Cheltenham to London, as has been done in almost all other cases. I have written to Mr. Pruen to-day, and requested him to inquire into the matter, and to communicate with their M.P. I ought to mention that four or five names which appear on the first sheet were copied from the head of one of the other sheets, and these five names as originally signed, were pasted over, and this was done by Mr. Walters by my direction.—I am, dear Sir, yours very truly, JOSEPH HICKIN."

From this fact had arisen the circumstance that there were only five names on the first sheet, and that they appeared to be written in different ink from the rest was a corroboration of the statement in the letter (hear, hear). The honourable member for Cheltenham had referred to the case of a gentleman named Perry, whose name appeared in the petition, although he had not signed it. On this subject he (Mr. Bright) had received a letter from Mr. Hennessy, a gentleman connected with the League at Cheltenham, written in consequence of having read what occurred in the house the other night:

"4, Essex-place, Cheltenham, Feb. 28.

"Sir,—The Hon. C. F. Berkeley is reported in the Morning Herald of this date, in presenting a petition from this town on the subject of the Corn Laws in the House of Commons, to have read a letter from his agent, in which the following passage occurs:—"I have seen Mr. Perry, the miller, of Alstone-mill, whose name is to the first sheet, he says he never heard of it before." I was present when Mr. Perry signed the petition in question, and believe his signature follows my own. I am sure he will remember it when I name the circumstance to him. I have deemed it right, as you promised to second Mr. Berkeley's motion for an inquiry on the subject, to put you in possession of the above fact, and believe the other signatures to be genuine. The fact is, no effort was made to obtain signatures to the petition, sheets were in the shops of two tradesmen, and an announcement stating the simple fact appeared in their windows, beyond which no further trouble was taken.

"I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

"J. Bright, Esq., M.P." "JOHN F. HENNESSY." He (Mr. Bright) thought it right to state to the house there was no charge against the genuineness of more than five of the signatures. The individual who changed them had acknowledged the fact, and although it was not one of the most prudent or regular things to do, yet it might have been done without any intention to infringe the rules of the house, or to substitute false names. He hoped the house would be satisfied with this explanation, and would not think it necessary to take any further steps; but if they did, he would be most happy to second the motion for a committee.

Mr. F. MACKENZIE inquired whether the petition itself, as well as the signatures, had been sent from Cheltenham, or whether it had been manufactured at Manchester?

Mr. BRIGHT had no doubt the petition had been written at Cheltenham, and sent from there, as the wording was not the same as that suggested in the circular of the League.

Mr. FERRAND inquired whether it was competent to him to move an amendment? He had received a letter from Sheffield, bearing out the statement he had made the other night as to the manner in which petitions were signed; and he had also an extract from another communication, referring to the same proceedings at Leeds, and there was actually in the Illustrated London News a drawing of the manner in which signatures are made to the London petition on London-bridge. Boys and children signed their names three or four times over. One letter he had received he would read to the house:—"If the following letter will be of any service to you in your opposition to the League—(an ironical allusion to the Opposition benches)—I will give you the names and residences of persons who were employed by the League to add signatures to their petitions, one of them to the tune of 14,000, without leaving his room; and the other to the number of 500, and there are more instances if necessary."

He (Mr. Ferrand) wrote to the person for a reference as to his respectability; he then went to him, and had a personal interview, and he found the whole of the writer's statement to be correct. He was in possession of the names of the witnesses whom he was prepared to produce before a committee, and he would therefore move as an amendment, that the inquiry of the committee should be generally as to the manner adopted by the League to obtain signatures to petitions to that house.

Lord J. MANNERS said, that as he was walking the other day down Grosvenor-place he heard a comfortable-looking baker's boy say to his companion, "I say, old fellow, have you signed the Anti-Corn-Law petition?" I have signed it three times" (a laugh). This was no isolated case (hear, hear). Such things had occurred daily in all the great thoroughfares of London (hear, hear). He regretted this the more, because they were bound to pay the utmost attention to petitions legitimately signed.

The SPEAKER said the hon. member's amendment must be moved as an instruction to the committee.

Mr. C. BERKELEY said he had certainly viewed with suspicion a petition from Cheltenham which came round by Manchester (a laugh), for he knew enough of the people of Cheltenham to believe that they would, as they had done for 14 years (hear), post their petition direct to himself; he also had received a letter from Mr. Hennessy, and, without wishing to say anything offensive to the natives of the Emerald Isle, he feared that letter would fully sustain their character for making blunders. The postscript of Mr. Hennessy's letter said, "If you will refer to the petition, I think you will find that my signature follows Mr. Perry's, or his mine." Now, he (Mr. Berkeley) had searched the petitions, and Mr. Hennessy's name was not attached to any of them.

Mr. ENTWISTLE inquired whether "transferring" meant cutting names off one sheet to add to another, or re-writing them?

Mr. BORTHWICK suggested that some rule should be made by which members could in some way vouch for the petitions they presented.

Mr. BRIGHT (unfolding the petition alluded to) said, that the five names referred to were still there, although they had been pasted over. Thus, though there had been irregularities, there was no fraud. There was the name, too, of Mr. Stephen Reid, who it was said had not signed the petition.

Mr. FERRAND moved, as an instruction, what he had previously moved as an amendment: He added that the honourable member for Cheltenham had stated that Mr. Reid had never signed the petition. Probably, all the signatures had been affixed at Manchester by some person employed by the League, who adopted the process of the person to whom he had referred, who had signed 14,000 names in his own room.

Mr. HUME did not see that the Anti-Corn-Law League had been connected at all with the matter. He would not, however, object to the instruction, if it were intended to include protection societies also (cheers).

Sir R. PEEL had no objection to a general inquiry into the practice complained of. But would it not be better to confine the committee to the specific case brought forward by the hon. member for Cheltenham, in which a petition had been presented as to which there appeared some informality and impropriety? There might be another committee for the general question. The second inquiry might be extensive and prolonged, while it might be necessary to report on this specific case at once (hear).

Sir R. INGLIS concurred in this suggestion, and with respect to what had fallen from the hon. member for Montrose, he would suggest that the protection societies could scarcely be put, in respect of these charges, on a footing with the Anti-Corn-Law League until some hon. member was able to stand up and pledge himself personally to bring forward similar charges against them.

Mr. NEWDEGATE gave notice that he would, to-morrow, move an instruction to the committee, if appointed, to inquire into the case of the North Yorkshire registration. He did not believe the case would occupy so much time as the right hon. baronet apprehended.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN recommended the hon. member for Knaresborough to withdraw his amendment. They (the protectionists) had been taunted by the hon. member for Durham, in his speech the other night, with not having presented enough petitions to that house. The difference was now explained. At least they had never been charged with presenting petitions the signatures to which were forged (hear).

Mr. HUTT was not aware that any allegations of forgery had been made against the protectionist petitions: but from the striking resemblance which they all bore to one another, in substance, allegation, and even in external shape, he suspected that, although they possibly came from the places whence they were said to emanate, they had certainly been previously manufactured in Bond-street (hear, hear, and a laugh).

Mr. CHRISTIE reminded hon. gentleman opposite that several petitions had been presented, complaining of the manner in which protectionist petitions had been got up. He protested against the assumption that any forgery had been committed in this particular case. At all events the expression of such an opinion had better be deferred till the committee had reported.

Mr. FERRAND apprehended there was no doubt forgery had been committed. The hon. member for Durham had himself admitted this (loud cries of "no, no"). There could be no difference between transferring signatures and forging them (loud cries of "oh, oh!").

After a few words from Colonel SIBTHORP and Mr. COLLETT, the instruction to the committee was withdrawn.

CORN LAWS.

On the motion of Sir ROBERT PEEL, the house went into committee on the Customs and Corn Protection Bill.

Mr. VILLIERS, pursuant to notice, brought forward, by way of amendment on the first resolution, his motion that "all duties on imported corn do now cease and determine," and in doing so said—I assure you, Sir, I do not rise for the purpose of making a long speech, nor is it my desire to trespass longer on the time and attention of the house than may be necessary in explaining the considerations which have weighed with me in inducing me to propose this amendment. Nothing can be possibly more remote from my intention than a desire to impede in the slightest degree the object which the Ministerial measure has in view, or to propose a hostile amendment (hear, hear). I had intended to have brought forward, at a later period of the session, a distinct motion, with a view to carry out the object which this amendment contemplates, namely, the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and to that intention I would have adhered, were it not that recent events and certain statements which I heard made in the course of the long debate, have induced me to believe that the wiser and more expedient course is that which I am now adopting (hear, hear). The house has very wisely resolved to take into consideration the protective system with a view to its ultimate abolition (so far as its operation on the supply of food to the people is concerned), and my amendment, admitting the principle of Free Trade to the utmost, has only reference to the period at which we are to enjoy the advantages of that measure. The Ministerial measure has distinctly recognised the policy of allowing perfect freedom of trade in the supply of the necessities of life to the people of this country; but it has postponed the full application of that principle until the 1st of February, 1849. In my opinion that delay is not called for (hear). It is my conscientious belief that the full advantage of the Ministerial scheme may be extended to this country at once, without danger or inconvenience to any class of the community; and it is because I hold this opinion, and am anxious that the country should be placed in the immediate enjoyment of the beneficial results which may be expected to flow from a sound and judicious policy, that I now propose this amendment (hear, hear). I do so in consistency with the motion to the same effect, which for some years it has been my practice to submit to the house in the course of every session. The measure which has united so large a number of the protective and industrious classes in its favour, has been for the immediate repeal of all obstructions on trade, and that proposition has not been made without consideration (hear). You cannot but be aware that from the day when the Corn Laws were first introduced, there has ever been in this country a large party who complained of their injustice and impolicy, and who have always been anxious for their removal; but of late years a question has arisen whether it is possible for us to remove them, and pass to a sounder, wiser, and more rational policy, without some danger of inconvenience in the event of the transition being immediate (hear, hear)? This question, I admit, I have ever regarded as well worthy of consideration, and I have accordingly given it the most serious attention. It was urged that such a panic would be created by the prospect of an immediate transition, that those who have invested their capital in the soil might be so much alarmed in contemplating the possible consequences of a Free Trade policy, that they might abruptly withdraw their capital from the agricultural interest, in fact, from the cultivation of the soil, and that this might be productive of results exceedingly injurious to the country (hear, hear). I admit that this consideration had great weight with me, and were it not that I have ascertained from the testimony of persons who, being themselves personally and deeply concerned in the welfare of the agricultural interest, ought to be best qualified to pronounce an opinion on the subject, that this apprehension is totally without foundation (hear)—that it is, in fact, altogether a mistake to suppose that you cannot pass at once, without danger or inconvenience, to a sounder policy—I repeat that if I had not had the most satisfactory evidence of this fact, I would not be instrumental in submitting to your consideration the proposition which is now before you. But I made it my business to obtain the most authentic information on the subject by consulting those whose personal interests were immediately involved, and having found by their testimony that there was no foundation in truth for the apprehension, I hesitated not to advocate the measure of total and immediate repeal. In the year 1843, when I brought this motion forward, I was strongly influenced to the course I adopted by the perusal of a pamphlet which had just then been published by a farmer, who expressly declared it as his opinion, that whenever the legislature should decide on the total abolition of those laws, it would be for the interest of the farmers and the agricultural community in general that the abolition should be immediate. I mentioned this fact in the year 1843. It was not the statement of one farmer merely, but that of a man who might not unfairly be considered to speak the sentiments of his class, or, at all events, of a very large section of them, for his opinions were universally looked up to with respect; and those in his own vicinage and the farmers of his own county, the county Down, gave a singular attestation of the confidence reposed in him by selecting him to preside as chairman over a meeting of their body (hear). I was induced, moreover, to advocate the proposition for immediate repeal, because I found that men of high rank and of the first order of intelligence, who were themselves intimately connected with the agricultural interests, were not opposed to it. For instance, Lord Spencer was of opinion that if the law were at once abolished, the effect would be to equalise the prices in this country, on the Continent, and in all those countries from which a supply of foreign corn might be expected (hear, hear). Lord Spencer did not at all share in the apprehension that if the price were to fall here and to rise on the Continent, there would be any such enormous influx as would blight the prospects of the farmer, and injure the agricultural interests. The same opinions I found to exist in other high quarters, and I was yet more strongly confirmed in my own views on hearing the voluntary declarations of two distinguished personages in the other house of Parliament, who are supposed to have the welfare of the British farmer peculiarly at heart. I allude to Lords Ducie and Radnor, who voluntarily declared their belief that it was for the interests of the farmers that the abolition of the protective system should be immediate; and who also stated that this opinion was shared in by their own tenants and by all the farmers of the adjoining districts (hear, hear). Their reasoning was this, that if the time for the abolition were to be postponed with a view to afford to persons whose capital was vested in the soil an opportunity of preparing for the transition, the postponement would fail of its object, because they might rest assured that preparation would never be made by the farmer, until the duty had been actually abolished (hear, hear). There would still be a delusive hope on the part of the landlords, that they might be able to retain protection, or to revert to the old law, and the farmers, with prospects so uncertain before them, would never think of going to the trouble and expense of making preparations (hear, hear). They argued, however, that exactly the reverse would be the case with the foreign grower, for that he would watch with a jealous eye the period for the opening of the markets, and proceed to make his preparations on so extensive a scale, and at so liberal an expenditure of capital, that the instant our ports were opened, he would pour in his supply in such profusion as would render it impossible for the native corn-grower to enter into competition with him (hear). This was my view of the question in the year 1843; and now let us consider whether in the present aspect of affairs there be anything to warrant us in adhering to the opinion with renewed energy. If there be any subject on which there has been complete unanimity of opinion, it appears to be the proposition, that if you are to repeal the Corn Laws at all, you should do so at once. I think that of this fact we have had ample indications in the progress of the debate. Honourable members who are hostile to the principle of Free Trade have, without any promptings from this side of the house, volunteered the statement, that if we are to have it, it were better to have it at once (hear, hear); and this they have given not as their own opinion only, but as the feeling and opinion of the farmers all over the country (hear, hear). It is not denied that certain personages who boast to be the farmers' friends, and who profess to have the agricultural interests especially at heart, immediately after the meeting of Parliament declared unshakenly to the world that it would be for the interest of the farmers that the Corn Laws, if repealed at all, should be repealed immediately (hear). I allude especially to the noble duke in the other house, who, the week after the opening of Parliament, volunteered the declaration that his opinion, and the opinions of the farmers generally (with which he was intimately conversant) was, that if we were to have repeal at all, it was desirable that it should come at once (hear, hear). The honourable member for Somersetshire, who is regarded by his party as an oracle in everything affecting the farming interests, made a statement, as you must all remember, to the same effect (a voice, "no, no"). I beg your pardon. The honourable member volunteered the assertion that the farmers, if they were put to their election, would prefer immediate to protracted repeal; nay, he pledged his honour to the fact; and turning round to the friends behind him, he asked them if it were true, and they answered by a unanimous cheer. There is no county in England which has been more forward in declaring in favour of protection than the county of Lincoln, and yet my noble friend the member for Lincoln (Lord Worsley) was, I believe, the very first to see the advantage of immediate repeal. Three months since he made the declaration in favour of immediate repeal (if repealed at all) so decisively, so unequivocally, that I had expected he would have originated some measure in favour of it (hear). So that from every quarter—from every authority from which you could expect to learn what is the opinion of the friends of the farmer, you learn it is for the immediate repeal (cheers). Sir, I do not exactly perceive upon what ground then it is that any party in this house should object to the amendment which I now propose, because the hon. gentlemen opposite, who represent the protection interest, are quite angry if any one distinguishes their interest from that of the farmer ("hear, hear" from the Opposition). I am sure they would be angry if I said they had, and I do not wish, on this occasion, to provoke their anger by saying, they have an interest distinct from the farmer, but I know it is said, that the landlords have an interest in this matter, which is distinct from that of the farmer (hear). I know it is said, that the farmer wants an adjustment, that the farmer wants an arrangement with the landlord, that the farmers want to come to some terms with the landlords on the subject as soon as possible, but that the landlords are unwilling to come to that adjustment or arrangement ("hear, hear" from the Opposition), that they do not despair yet of being able to retain protection and keep up some part of the sliding scale, that they are not willing to come to terms with the farmers but hope to keep up the prices by retaining the protection ("hear, hear," from the Opposition). If hon. gentlemen opposite desire to do justice to that interest about which they are apparently so solicitous, and about which they have been talking so much in this house, I do not think they can refuse to vote for this amendment after what has occurred in this house (cheers from the Opposition). There has been so much consideration of the general interests in the measure that has been proposed, that I am disposed to rest my proposition alone on this ground, that it is for the interest of the agriculturist—that it is for the interest of the farmer, and of those for whom alone there seems to be some consideration shown in urging the postponement of this measure (hear, hear). I cannot help remarking—I have remarked already upon the opinions of the agriculturists—I cannot help remarking upon the opinions of her Majesty's Government, and the position in which they stand with regard to the amendment I propose (hear, hear): I beg to say that I do not do that in any hostility to the measure that is proposed, or in forgetfulness of the difficulties the Government had to encounter in the matter. But I must call the attention of the house to the fact, that the right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government cannot entertain much fear himself respecting the instant suspension or abolition of the Corn Law (hear, hear). If I correctly understand his statement to this house on the 1st of No-member last, he considered that there was a very great apprehension of a want of food in England, and he conceived it would be safe and wise instantly to suspend the law, which would be practically to abolish it (cheers from the Opposition). I do not collect from the right honourable gentleman that his apprehension is less now than it was then (cheers from the Opposition). He apprehended a deficiency of food on the 1st of November in some parts of the United Kingdom, and deemed a suspension to be necessary. From what has fallen from him since the session commenced, it appears that his apprehensions have not abated (hear, hear). His fears are as great—quite as great as they were on the 1st of November (hear, hear). It certainly strikes me that the right honourable baronet has no fear himself of the consequences to the country or to the agricultural interest from the immediate suspension of the law, for he proposed that suspension as a mode of extending relief to those persons who were likely to suffer from an apprehended deficiency of food (loud cries of "hear, hear"). The right honourable gentleman seems to have stated very properly his reasons for permanently abolishing the law, and to have satisfied himself that at a certain time the trade in corn should be free, and those laws permanently abolished (hear, hear, and loud cheers). He seems to have reasons why he should immediately suspend the law, and to have reasons also why it should be permanently abolished (hear, hear). That is what I propose to do now. I propose that it should be immediately and totally abolished (cheers from the Opposition). The right hon. gentleman (if he supports the immediate abolition of the law), has only to look round the house, and he will see what he could not expect to see on other questions, friends on all sides of the house (hear, hear). If he looks to that bench (pointing to the protectionists), from which there has been a somewhat fierce opposition since the session commenced, he will find that he gets a sanction from them (cheers from the Opposition), a sanction indicating there is no danger to be apprehended, and no ground of alarm from immediately suspending the law, for they said that so far as an immediate abolition or instant suspension of the duty on corn they are ready for it, they believe it might be done safely—they urge it to be done. So we have it on the best authority that the immediate repeal will be attended with no evil at all (cheers from the Opposition). Well, then, if the right honourable gentleman will look opposite to him (to the Opposition benches) he will find the party, at the head of which is my noble friend, the member for London, who is perfectly ready, and on whom he can rely, to support the immediate abolition of the Corn Laws (cheers). My noble friend has expressed this view of the question, and entertains the opinion positively, and every person who knows him knows this—that when he expresses an opinion they may rely upon him (loud cheers). Therefore, if the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) will adopt the amendment I propose, which is for the immediate, total, and permanent repeal, he will find authorities on that side of the house (pointing to the protectionists) to assure him that it will be safe, and he will find the requisite support and strength on this side of the house (cheers). And it is impossible to avoid inferring, from what the right honourable gentleman has said himself, that he has no fears on the subject. The hon. member for Somersetshire has actually elicited his opinion on the matter. The right hon. gentleman stated what his own views were when he proposed for some time the postponement of the repeal of the law, and he stated, in answer to the member for Somersetshire, that he had been apprehensive of some panic and alarm being spread among the farmers, and he was desirous to give them time for some preparation for the change; but the right hon. gentleman must be relieved by the speech of the hon. member for Somersetshire, for he told him there was no ground for fear or alarm, and no need of preparation—the farmers were all ready (cheers). The right hon. gentleman has proposed the abolition of the law out of deference to the agricultural interest; but it would appear that they do not require the postponement. It is impossible that the right honourable gentleman himself is not in favour of the immediate and permanent abolition of the law. I cannot understand, then, why he should object to it, or why he has not come to that conclusion. Every person seems to be ready for it, there is no danger apprehended from it, and there is a majority in the house in favour of the amendment I propose (hear, and cheers). If, then, Sir, there are no objections to, or inconvenience attending the adoption of the amendment, are there not some advantages (hear, hear)? There is one that I should name before any other, that there would be then no impediment to the supply of food for the people in case of need (hear, hear, hear); and let me say that is a most important consideration this year, and perhaps more so than any other for many years past. There are several reasons why a deficient supply may be expected this year. The harvest has been bad in Europe—bad in the grain-growing countries, and also deficient in other states not usually dependent on other countries for supply; our own harvest has been deficient; there has been a failure in an important article of subsistence in Ireland, and there is an unusually great consumption of wheat in this country (hear, hear)—there is little to come from America this year, and we must expect less than usual from the Baltic. The prices are high in neighbouring countries, the ports are open for import, but shut for export. Already wheat, destined for this country, has not waited for the passing of this measure, but has proceeded to Antwerp, and found a market (cries of "hear, hear"). There was a profit to be obtained from the price, and there was no duty. We are then in a state to want food this year, and yet incur the risk of not obtaining it (loud, hear). We have no indication of the harvest yet for the coming year, and before three months are over we may be suffering from a deficiency—paying a high price, and the business of the country disturbed by it (hear, hear). Every sixpence of duty may tell upon the supply and the price this year. He asked if that was just towards the people, or if it was wise, after the admission that had been made of the errors and mischief of the law, and whether it was politic to let the people see so clearly the object and the cause of their suffering (hear, hear). This duty of 4s. might be as effective in excluding food a short time hence as the present duty of 17s. (hear, hear). It would not, perhaps, be fair to suppose that the Government had retained the duty from choice, and not to notice the supposed means of its retention. It is said that they have contrived their scheme with a view to its success, that they have secured a certain amount of support for the measure as it is, but if they were to alter it in this particular, they might risk the loss of the measure, and he understood that would weigh also with some of his own friends, who were anxious to see the measure safe. There might be prudence no doubt in this course, and he did not impugn their judgment; at the same time he felt it his duty to state the reasons distinctly to the house that he thought ought to weigh with it, and decide it to adopt the amendment. He was sure they were such that justified its being proposed (hear, hear). Before he sat down he could not help submitting one other consideration to the house bearing upon this subject. He referred to the statement made by his honourable friend the member for Stockport, during the last debate. He stated that that great organisation of the people of which he is at the head was formed and existed for the single and simple purpose of obtaining the removal of all obstructions to the trade in the necessities of life; and he answered for the good faith of those who followed him, that the day after this law was repealed that this association would dissolve (hear, hear, hear). Now it is not underrating the services which he (Mr. Villiers) considered the League had rendered to the country, to say that this would be a great advantage. He believed that the time would soon arrive when the service of the League would be fully and duly appreciated by the whole country; for his part he should always look back with satisfaction at having co-operated with it, and joined in their exertion as far as he was able (hear). They had sought to disseminate the views and opinions of those clear, calm minds who had enlightened the country on the difficult science of commercial economy (hear, hear). They had sought strength by appealing to the reason of those whom they addressed (hear, hear), and he honestly believed that they had, during the long period of their agitation, given as little real cause of offence to those opposed to them as any body of men that ever were united for a common purpose (hear). But, doubtless, it was an evil that such a combination should exist. It was impossible for them to proceed without exciting bad feeling and great animosities between classes (hear, hear). He for one, as he deeply regretted that result, so was he anxious that they should have no reason for the continuance of agitation (hear, hear). That could, as his honourable friend the member for Stockport said, be only effected in one way, for he knew that both he and his honourable friend the member for Dorchester were deeply bound to those who trusted them that they would not cease their exertions until the object was attained (hear, hear). He did not say that this ought to be binding on the legislature if any evil was likely to follow from it; but his case was, that there was no evil likely to ensue, nothing, indeed, but advantage to the interest in question, added to which would be the blessing that those classes who had been brought into collision would, after the repeal of this law, cease to struggle with each other, and only see their common interest in promoting the prosperity of each other, and of the community at large (cheers). He begged, therefore, to move this amendment, "That all duty should henceforth cease."

Colonel SIBTHORP had no hesitation in saying that he considered the honourable gentleman, the member for Wolverhampton, in the whole course of his conduct on this important question, as an upright, honest, and straightforward man, in comparison with the members of the Government (cheers and laughter). He had never deceived the public. He was straightforward in his declarations, and persevered in his objects; and whatever might be the result, he was bound to give him credit for a manly and honest course, and he wished he could say the same for others (cheers and laughter). He (Col. Sibthorp) would refer the house to a speech made by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) at a dinner given to him in the year 1839, in Merchant Tailors' Hall. There were present on the occasion (besides Sir Robert Peel) Lord Francis Egerton, Mr. Goulburn, Lord Stanley, Sir Robert Inglis, Sir James Graham; and the Marquess of Chaudos, now Duke of Buckingham, was chairman (hear, hear). [The gallant Colonel read along extract from the speech of Sir Robert Peel, on the occasion referred to, in which he recommended the formation of a great Conservative party, to get rid of the Whigs and their Radical and Repeal allies; and also that the strictest attention should be paid to the Parliamentary registration.] Such was the language of the right honourable baronet in 1831, when he was entertained with a dinner; and it was sometimes said in vino veritas, but he did not know how it was on that occasion (laughter). The truth was, that either the right honourable baronet wanted moral courage to resist agitation, or he was of the same opinion then that he was now. At any rate, he (Colonel Sibthorp) was sorry to say at that time he placed implicit confidence in the right honourable baronet which he should ever regret (cries of "question" from the Opposition). The honourable and gallant member, looking to the opposite side, exclaimed, "If you are tired of hearing me, walk out" (laughter). He would tell the right honourable baronet that the eyes of the country were upon him, and when it observed that he said a thing was white one day and black another, that no further confidence would be placed in him. With respect to the question, he thought that there was very little difference between the proposition of the Government and total and immediate repeal, and there was no confidence that the right honourable baronet would adhere to the three years. The honourable member for Wolverhampton said that it was for the interest of the farmer that there should be immediate repeal.

Now he heard the farmers were a shrewd and intelligent class of men, and they believed that neither the honourable member or the right honourable baronet cared anything about their interests (hear, hear). The country ought to know what were the solid grounds which induced the right honourable baronet to change his policy. Were they to believe that it was the fear of a deficiency of food? If that was the case, the noble lord (Lord G. Bentinck) near him had demonstrated, in his able speech the other night, that there was no reason for any such apprehension. He felt that, after all which had passed, he had a right to believe that the party to which he belonged had been grossly deceived and betrayed by the right honourable baronet. On that ground, as well as from a sense of duty to the country, he should take a firm stand in opposing the right honourable baronet on every occasion that he could do so. In the present instance, he felt therefore bound to explain, as he understood there would be a division on the amendment of the honourable member opposite, that on going out at the same lobby with the right honourable baronet, in opposition to the honourable member for Wolverhampton, he would do so from no attachment, from no affection, or from no regard to the right honourable baronet, or to any one member sitting on the Treasury bench (hear and laughter). Between two evils he should like to choose the least, and it was on that principle he would act. In conclusion, he cautioned the right hon. baronet to beware of now sowing the seeds of revolution, and cautioned him as to those with whom he associated (laughter); and not to neglect, until he would find it to be too late, the advice of the party who had hitherto been his friends and supporters (hear).

Lord WORSLEY said: As the hon. member for Wolverhampton had alluded to him, and to a statement which he had made on this question on another occasion, at a time when it was thought impossible the question could be met as a mere matter of compromise, and when he supposed that the House of Commons were to decide by a large majority, that no alteration of the Corn Law should take place, or else that there should be a settlement of the question either by a total abolition, or by such an arrangement as those who advocated total abolition would assent to, he wished to state to the house the grounds on which he intended to give his vote on the present amendment. It was now proposed by his hon. friend, the hon. member for Wolverhampton, that all duties on the importation of foreign corn should totally and immediately cease. On the other hand, it was proposed by her Majesty's Government that until 1849 there should be a continuance of the sliding scale, on a much lower rate of duty than that now in operation. His (Lord Worsley's) impression was that if the measure rested solely between the motion proposed now by the hon. member for Wolverhampton and that of her Majesty's Government, it would be much better that they should now decide in favour of immediate and total repeal than that they should be forced to remain in a state of constant uncertainty during a period of three years from the present time (hear, hear, hear). On those grounds, if the house had to decide simply between those two propositions, he certainly should be in favour of the proposition of his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton. But he had to look to the question in this light: he felt that if he were to vote in favour of the motion of his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton, and if that motion were carried by the house, he would thus aid in precluding himself from considering other amendments which were to be proposed by other hon. members on this question (hear, hear). It might be considered that in adopting this course he was not quite consistent in the opinion which he had before expressed in favour of a desire to set this question at rest, but he hoped he could satisfactorily explain to the house that the charge of inconsistency could not be brought against him, and that he was justified in taking the course which he adopted because he believed that the propositions to be brought forward by the hon. member for Anglesea (Mr. O. Stanley) would be a settlement of the question, and because he was anxious to give that proposition his support. The amendment intended to be proposed by the hon. member for Anglesea, was, that in lieu of the duties now paid on the importation of foreign corn and grain, there should be paid a fixed duty of 5s. a quarter on wheat, 2s. 6d. a quarter on barley, and 2s. on oats. Now, it might be said that those who had hitherto advocated a total repeal of the Corn Laws, would not be satisfied with that arrangement—that it would not come up with their expectations or desires—but, on the other hand, the persons who had hitherto supported them could not but feel that such a plan would not materially enhance the price of food, whereas it might afford some protection to the agriculturists of this country, and it would also supply that loss to the revenue which a total repeal would effect, and which should otherwise be made up by the imposition of some other burden (hear, hear). The hon. member for Wolverhampton must know better than he (Lord Worsley) did the opinions of the persons to whom he alluded, but it was not improbable that though they had asked so much, they would take less than they demanded (hear, hear). He remembered that before the Reform Bill had been proposed, they were told that nothing short of vote by ballot, and a considerable extension of the franchise would at all satisfy the country, and yet when a measure much shorter than these demands was proposed, it was admitted to be a greater step than it was thought possible to obtain (hear, hear). He did not consider that the amendment about to be proposed by the hon. member for Pontefract (Mr. R. M. Milnes), would prove a settlement of the question. That was, that the sliding scale, as proposed by her Majesty's Government in the present instance, and which, by the proposition of the right honourable baronet, was to cease altogether in 1849, was to continue after that period; that it was to be a permanent sliding scale varying from 10s. to 4s. a quarter on wheat. That proposition would not, he was convinced, be considered satisfactory by those who advocated an alteration in the laws; whereas, by adopting a fixed duty of 5s. a quarter upon wheat, as proposed by the hon. member for Anglesea, he considered the corn merchant would be satisfied, as he would then have a regularity in the payments he would have to make, while many who now opposed any alteration in the existing law would also give such an arrangement their support (hear, hear). The honourable gentleman the member for Bedford (Captain Polhill) had also given notice of an amendment which he thought he could show it would be utterly impossible to carry. The amendment was to the effect—"That, in the event of this house consenting to the change proposed by the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government in the duties on the importation of foreign corn for three years, the amount of such duties as received shall be appropriated as a fund to relieve or compensate such tenant farmers of the United Kingdom now subjected to certain rents, burdens, covenants, and obligations entered into under the present scale of duties, who may prove before a select committee of this house that they have been ruined, impoverished, or deeply injured by the lessening of the protection they now possess." He thought the house would agree with him that it would be utterly impossible to have a committee to decide who had been ruined by the reduction of protective duties, or who had not, and to hear the complaints of farmers, and ascertain whether the ruin of which they would complain might not be owing, not perhaps to the effect of a change in the Corn Laws, but to incautious or improper arrangements entered into by particular individuals. If the majority of the house should support the views of his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton, he should thereby be precluded from supporting any other proposition advocating a higher amount of duty, and he could not, therefore, give any assistance towards bringing about such a result. On the other hand, he thought there might be very serious evils arising from the course proposed by her Majesty's Government. How, for instance, could they avoid the difficulty which would arise when the anticipations which had been expressed, and which he understood it was generally believed out of doors would be carried into effect, namely, that an endeavour would be made on the part of the farmer and those by whom they were advised, to get back at the next election the protection of which they were now to be deprived, by returning to Parliament none but members pledged to support a Corn Law, and to get rid of the measure which her Majesty's Government were now prepared to carry—when such anticipations might be realised; and now, while such a course of proceeding was threatened, could those who were the advocates of the Anti-Corn-Law League be expected to persuade the members of that association to dissolve their body (hear, hear)? They could not expect that such a course would be taken; and in stating that, he would support the motion of his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton, if the question were simply between it and the propositions of the Government. He did so, because he was not one of those who would delude the farmers—he could not call it by any milder term (hear, hear)—with the idea that they could get back again the protection which was now proposed to be taken from them. If he were to hold forth that language to the farmers, he felt that he would be taking a dishonest part, because he did not think the agricultural interest had the least chance of ever recovering the protection of a Corn Law if it were once taken from them (hear, hear). He could not therefore give any vote that would hold out the least expectation of such an event taking place. If he opposed the motion of his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton, in order to support the measure of the Government, it might lead to an expectation out of doors, that he thought there was a chance of the agriculturists again getting the protection of which they were now to be deprived. He did not think there was the least probability of such an event taking place, and believing such to be the case, he could not do otherwise, acting as an honest man, than show by his vote the view which he entertained of the question. In voting against the amendment of his honourable friend, he wished also to show that he believed it was utterly impossible the agriculturists could ever again possess such an amount of duty as they at present enjoyed (hear, hear).

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said he was one of those who never entertained any sanguine expectations that those hon. members who advocated protection would support the motion of his hon. friend. He felt that when the proposition of immediate repeal was submitted to the house, those honourable members would find very good reasons for not giving it their support; but at the same time he was extremely glad to hear from the noble lord who had just sat down, that he did not withhold his vote from his honourable friend (Mr. Villiers), because he would wish to encourage the feeling among the tenant farmers that the protection which was now about being withdrawn from them could ever again be restored. His noble friend had told them that if he were to take such a part he would not be acting honestly—conscientiously believing, as he did, that protection once withdrawn could never be again conferred upon them. But such being the conviction of his noble friend, he would necessarily be perfectly justified in giving his vote in favour of the motion of his hon. friend. He thought his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton had taken a judicious course in submitting this measure to the house. He thought it was due to the country, to those who had acted cordially with him in this Free Trade movement, and due to the hon. member himself, to submit this proposal to the house (hear, hear). It was a proposal, as his honourable friend had very justly observed, which had been taken and adopted as the motto of the Free Trade movement after due consideration (hear, hear). It had caused some unpopularity to the advocates of Free Trade. It had been said that the question of immediate repeal of the Corn Laws was a proposition which overlooked the sufferings that might arise to the agricultural body from the immediate transition from monopoly to complete freedom of trade. All these things were taken into consideration, and formed the elements on which the gentlemen who had conducted the Free Trade movement had come to the decision that it was better for the agricultural interests, and for all the interests of the country, that this question should be settled by the mode of immediate and unconditional repeal (hear, hear). He thought that his hon. friend himself, having taken so prominent a part in the promotion of the repeal of the Corn Law, was entitled to be heard in respect to the settlement about to be made. His hon. friend must take a very large share of the responsibility on his shoulders, and on the shoulders of his friends must also rest much of the responsibility of the future consequences of this measure. Therefore he would say his hon. friend was entitled to have a voice in the settlement of the question (hear, hear). With regard to the allegation that they would endanger the plan of the Government by asking for something more than was proposed by the right honourable baronet, all he could say was that he did not think that danger would exist if they succeeded in inducing the House of Commons to carry his hon. friend's propositions. As to what would take place elsewhere, with that, he submitted, they had nothing to do. All he could say was, that there was not a single supporter of the right honourable baronet on his own side of the house, who had spoken during the late debate, who had stated that he gave his support to the measure, in consequence of the three years' grace that was afforded to the agricultural interests, while many opponents of the measure had expressly declared that they would prefer immediate to gradual repeal (hear, hear). Under these circumstances he could not perceive that any danger could possibly arise from pressing upon the committee the motion of his hon. friend. But when he took into consideration the present condition of the country, he felt that the case of his honourable friend was perfectly irresistible. It was the only case that met the circumstances which had been stated by the first minister of the Crown. The first minister had told them that he had two objects in view; one to settle permanently the question how the future commercial policy of the country should be conducted, and the other was how at the present moment they were to avert a great national calamity. Now, his hon. friend had reminded the house that in November the right hon. baronet had thought that no measure short of opening the ports and a complete freedom of the corn trade would satisfy the present emergency, and he had also contended that nothing short of total repeal would be a final adjustment of the Corn Law question. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him that there was no course which the House of Commons could in common reason and with consistency adopt at the present moment but total and immediate repeal. Nothing short of such an adjustment could meet the present exigency in Ireland, and he would beg to remind the right hon. baronet that, though he might grant these three years' grace to the agriculturists, it was a question whether, considering the accounts which were received from that country, he could maintain this degree of protection even until the month of July next (hear, hear, hear). How could he, when he knew that famine and fever were making progress in Ireland in consequence of the want of food—how could he possibly maintain any duty on the importation of foreign corn (hear)? He would ask, if it were right to open the ports in November last, how could a maintenance of the duty be defended at the present moment, especially when he considered that the circumstances which justified the opening of the ports in November had become more and more pressing at the present moment (hear)? His noble friend had touched on the duty on wheat, but they should also look to the effect of the duty on barley and oats. Taking the present prices of barley and oats, the scale of the right honourable baronet would amount to an actual prohibition (hear, hear). No barley or oats could be now introduced into the country, and sold at the present prices, if they had to pay half-a-crown duty. How then could they for a moment suppose it was possible to maintain a duty to the proposed extent under the emergency at present existing in Ireland? The duty of 2s. upon oats and barley was, after all, 10 per cent. upon the value. He believed, that taking the price of barley in this country at the present moment, it could not be imported and pay duty at a profit. Those duties would cause considerable supplies of oats and barley to be thrown into the English market, and to be diverted from foreign markets, and this when we were told that every grain of corn that could be imported into this country was necessary to avert the calamity with which we were threatened. That immediate, instead of deferred, repeal was better for the agricultural interest, there could be no doubt. He himself did not believe the farmers cared anything about the Corn Law question (cries of "no," from the protectionists). He declared, positively, it had struck him as something most remarkable, when he was in the country, to find that as a matter of business the tenant-farmers did not appear to care one straw about the repeal of the Corn Laws (loud cries of "hear, hear," and cheers). As a matter of politics they might have some concern upon it; as a matter of opinion they had not ("oh, oh," from the protection benches); but if gentlemen opposite were right in saying that the farmer was entitled to a reduction of rent in consequence of the withdrawal of protection, when the farmer came to ask them for an adjustment, what would be their answer (hear, hear)? Would they not say, "Wait, and see what the effect of Free Trade will be?" His honourable friend the member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden) had informed the country that prices would not be affected by the repeal of the Corn Laws; and, therefore, they (the protectionists) said to their tenants, "Wait till the 1st of February, 1849, and see whether it will then be necessary to make a re-arrangement of rent, or to lay out capital in particular improvements." He (Mr. Gibson) believed that the change impending over the agricultural body till 1849 would cause many improvements to be postponed till that period, which, if the repeal took place now, would be carried into effect before (hear, hear). If a man was ordered to be executed this day three years, did the house suppose he would occupy the interval in preparing for eternity (cries of "oh")? Nothing of the kind (a laugh). He would be calculating how he could avert the sentence. The position of the protectionists was exactly the same. Protection had been fairly put upon its trial; it had been found guilty of high crimes and misdemeanours, and condemnation had been passed upon it by that house. All that was asked for now was its speedy and immediate execution, and no respite. A respite instead of being a kindness would be a cruelty; and he called upon the house to adopt, as the best measure for the agricultural interest, as the most in accordance with the justice of the case, and the most equal to meet the pressing emergencies of Ireland, the amendment proposed by his hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton (hear, hear).

Mr. B. ESCOTT said if no danger could be proved to arise from the amendment of the honourable member for Wolverhampton he would vote for it; but if anything occurred in the course of the debate to make him seriously believe that the eventual success of the measure proposed by her Majesty's ministers would be endangered by the amendment, however much he might respect the honourable member (Mr. Villiers) for an advocacy of this cause—and no one could honour him more for it than he did—then, upon the principle laid down by the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) at the commencement of the session, in order to save that great measure, he should vote against the amendment. The question he asked himself, as determining the principle upon which he should give his vote was this: Under the existing circumstances of the country, is it right and just that the price of the food of the people should be increased by restrictive laws? He had attended a meeting of his constituents in November last, and he told them that in his opinion the only justification of the ports being closed was the fact, then supposed to exist, that there was no Government responsible for the affairs of the country (a laugh). The statements made by the First Lord of the Treasury during the late debates fully supported him, when he said, "at that time there was no Government responsible for the affairs of the country," and it was notorious that his right honourable friend could not open them, in consequence of certain disagreements. Had anything happened since to make him (Mr. B. Escott) believe that there ought to be no restrictions on the importation of food? He thought everything had happened to make the unrestricted importation of food more necessary than it was before; and under these circumstances he should vote for the amendment, unless he found that by so doing he should endanger the great measure of her Majesty's ministers. One word with regard to the farmers; they said they wanted to have done with agitation, and there was but one way to accomplish that, which was, to repeal the Corn Law for ever. There was but one member on the benches near him who would tell the farmers differently; but it was more difficult to tell them anything else. This being the case, he asked whether it would not be better for the interests of the farmers, for the interests of trade and commerce, and for the credit of the House of Commons, to repeal the Corn Laws at once (cries of "no, no," from the protection benches).

Mr. R. COLBORNE, not having had any previous opportunity of expressing his opinion on this subject, wished to state the grounds on which he should give a cordial and sincere support to the amendment of the honourable member for Wolverhampton. He had given his support to the right honourable baronet, not because he believed that all the details of his proposed measure were perfect, but because the measure itself was right in principle. The arguments and reasoning of the right honourable baronet had clearly proved Free Trade to be right in principle; but, notwithstanding this approbation, he (Mr. R. Colborne) reserved to himself the right of voting against whatever parts of the measure he might think proper. That measure was a Free Trade measure, but it would have to do later upon the country if it had included the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The noble lord (Lord J. Russell) had told the house it was not his wish that the amendment should be carried for fear it should endanger the ministerial measure; and on this point he would allude to one subject upon which he feared there would not be found many to agree with him. He referred to a dissolution of Parliament upon this question. He believed if Parliament were dissolved, the cause of Free Trade would gain; but when he heard the noble lord say they dared not oppose the measure, because he thought if there was a dissolution upon it there was not sufficient spirit to carry him through, he (Mr. R. Colborne) would ask what stronger proof there was of it than the arguments urged by honourable gentlemen opposite in favour of an appeal to the country. Before this measure was finally settled there must be a new Parliament, for it was impossible to call the doubt and hesitation of three years a settlement. There must, in short, be a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, otherwise the question would be agitated again and again. The only chance of carrying the ministerial measure to the satisfaction of the country, was to make the repeal total and immediate (hear and cheers). Honourable gentlemen must get ready to fight the battle (hear, hear, and cheers), and as the battle must be fought, he urged upon the house to adopt the principles of total and immediate repeal that evening. He did not urge this with any object of party triumph over the right honourable baronet, but because he wished him to have the satisfaction of carrying a great and important measure. Before he sat down he wished to refer to one point upon which he was personally concerned. In one of the newspapers of yesterday he had been mentioned as a political apostate. He was not an apostate, and the editor had apologised to him for the expression, and there the matter ended. He mentioned this circumstance because it had always been his opinion, notwithstanding the eloquent speech of the honourable member for Wolverhampton, that protection affected the landlord alone, and not the tenant; but at the same time he believed the landlords were prepared to make all reasonable sacrifices. He had voted in favour of the noble lord's proposition (Lord J. Russell's) for a fixed duty; but it was not his opinion now that a fixed duty would be the best, because sacrifices must be made where the food of the people was concerned. He was in favour of an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, but without applying the principle to every other article. If they were to do away with all import duties, and to throw the whole burdens of the country upon direct taxation, he should be opposed to Free Trade. There was one direct tax from which the country would be glad to be relieved, and there would not be a more cordial supporter of that object than himself; and there were certain articles the duties on which might not be relaxed, but additional revenue obtained. The right honourable baronet has boasted that although he had taken so many taxes off there had been an increase of revenue. Why did he not apply that principle to the consumption of tea, sugar, and coffee? If they were to legislate let them legislate for the labouring man who toiled from morning till night to earn a scanty support for his family—legislate for the artisan, and all the good expected by the right hon. baronet would arise (hear).

Mr. GORING, who was very imperfectly heard, said he should give his strenuous opposition to the amendment. He could not see the grounds for the preference of a 4s. duty on corn to the 8s. duty proposed by the noble lord (Lord John Russell). After the speeches which he had heard from the Treasury benches, he really was astonished that the right hon. gentlemen on those benches should go down to that house, and ask the landed gentlemen to make sacrifices. The house must remember, however, that it was not the large landed proprietor who would be injured by such a measure as that proposed by the Government; for he, by the extended use of machinery, and the application of capital to the cultivation of the soil, might be enabled to meet the difficulty; but the small landed proprietors it was, with encumbered estates, with rent charges and mortgages, who must inevitably suffer (loud cheers and laughter from the Opposition). Hon. gentlemen might laugh, but that was the fact (hear, hear). The tithe-owner and the farmer also, he contended, would be considerable sufferers if the proposed measure were carried into effect, and he should, therefore, give it all the opposition in his power.

Mr. BRIGHT: I rise principally with the view of making a few observations upon the speech of the noble lord the member for Lincolnshire (Lord Worsley). The noble lord said he was of opinion that even now the imposition of a fixed duty of 5s. would settle this question. Now I have here a speech delivered by that noble lord in Lincolnshire, and as he, upon one occasion, amused the house with long extracts from the speeches of members of the Government, perhaps he would not object to hear read a short extract from one of his own, delivered as recently as three years ago (cheers and a laugh). At a meeting held in Lincolnshire, the noble lord said—"Something had been said about compromise. About a year ago he thought something like compromise might have been effected, but that day had gone by. There was at present only one ground of compromise, and that was a final settlement of the question, whereby agitation would be for ever stopped. It was agitation on this subject that was doing all the injury, and the stopping of that was the only compromise that could be for a moment entertained. Some had supposed that it was the intention of Sir Robert Peel to propose a fixed duty with a descending scale, to go down gradually until it vanished altogether.

That would not stop agitation. It would go on as violently as ever until the last shilling of duty was removed." He then gives a dissertation upon the peculiar burdens on land which it is not necessary for me now to quote. I quite agree with the noble lord that there can be no cessation of the agitation of this question until all the duties upon the importation of corn are finally abolished (cheers); and I am sure that he who thinks differently must have formed, indeed, an imperfect idea of that amount of public opinion which is now concentrated in one universal demand for the total and immediate abolition of the Corn Laws (renewed cheers). The honourable member who preceded me has referred, and I wonder at his imprudence, to the mortgages and incumbrances upon the property of landed proprietors (cries of "oh!" from the protectionists). Now I hope that the time has nearly come when the landed proprietors in this house will not subject themselves to such imputations as have with some justice been heaped upon them, by again bringing forward their own extravagancies or imprudence, their mortgages and incumbrances, as the justification for a law to raise the price of food in order to secure to them a rent for their property which, in reality, it is not worth (cheers and "oh!" from the protectionists). I recollect in one of Mr. Dickens' works that he gives an account of an election for the dignified office of parish beadle, on which occasion the walls were covered with placards, with "Vote for Scroggins and eleven small children" (a laugh). Why, there is scarcely even in that anything more pitiable than it is to witness the great landowners of this country coming here and talking of the incumbrances upon their estates, or of the necessity of providing fortunes for their grown-up daughters (hisses and groans from the protectionists, cheers from other parts of the house). To come, however, to the question more immediately before the house, That question is now greatly narrowed, and it is no longer whether we shall have protection or not, but whether protection shall be immediately abolished, or shall linger on for three years more. Now, I do not like to say anything which may appear in opposition to the ministers (hear, hear, and a laugh), because in the speeches which they delivered in the last debate upon this question I have observed so much of what I believe to be perfect honesty and sincerity in the course which they are now pursuing, that I feel unwilling to say anything which might make it appear that in my opinion they are falling short of the duty which at this important period they owe to the country (general applause). But I must say that her Majesty's Government have admitted all our case (cheers); and if there be any man on either side of the house who, in consequence of the speeches of the members of the Government, have come to the conclusion that protection should be abolished, I can't think it possible that such a man would say that he should wait for three years before that abolition took place (hear, hear). I think that every argument offered by the gentlemen in justification of their measure, justifies still further our proposition for the immediate repeal (hear, hear); and I think it would be a condemnation of the arguments of the Government if we now stopped short of immediate repeal. The impending famine in Ireland is either a reality or it is not (cheers and counter cheers). The Government tells us that they have established stores for the accumulation of grain, to be sold to the people at a moderately low price. Both the right honourable gentlemen who have spoken said that they could not come to this house and call for a vote of public money whilst there was a law in existence imposing a duty of 16s. or 17s. upon the admission of foreign corn. I would ask him, could they come and demand 200,000*l.*, 300,000*l.*, or 400,000*l.*, as they may be obliged to do in the course of this session, and ask the clergy and the public generally to subscribe money in charity to feed the people of Ireland, while this house maintains a law which imposes a duty which narrows the circle whence our supply of food can be drawn, which must make prices higher here, and must limit the whole supply from the people of the United Kingdom can be fed (cheers)? The right hon. gentleman said he could not propose to allow maize and the inferior grains for the food of pigs and cattle to be admitted at a nominal duty, whilst there was a heavy duty upon the nobler grain—wheat, which was more especially the food of man. I know not, then, how he can reconcile the imposition of a duty varying from four to ten shillings on the food of man in this period of great scarcity, whilst he allows maize, the inferior grain, to be admitted duty free (hear, hear). The reasons for the delay in removing the duty stated by the Government were curious. One of them was, that the right hon. gentleman thought that the measure might meet with rather less opposition. Now I suspect the right hon. gentleman has found out by this time that that idea was altogether erroneous (hear, hear). I believe it would have been impossible, whatever were the measures proposed, even if they had come directly from the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, that they would have met with a more determined resistance than they have already encountered, or than they are about to encounter, both in this and the other House of Parliament (cheers). The right hon. baronet, in his speech the other night, almost said that he was willing to accept of immediate repeal; and I believe every one must feel that there are no honourable members in this house, not even amongst those who sit on this side of the house, who are more firmly of opinion in their conscience that the immediate repeal is the best thing for this country in every way than are the members of the Government themselves (cheers). The protectionists can scarcely have any objection to it, for they have always said that it was a farmer's question, and not a landlord's question. If it is a farmer's question, then, why not settle it as the farmers wish it to be settled (hear, hear)? There cannot be a doubt of their opinion upon the subject (cheers, and cries of "oh, oh!" from the protectionists). Then, if there be, I challenge honourable gentlemen opposite to point out one case in which any number of farmers have agreed that three years' delay previous to the removal of protection would be preferable to the immediate abolition which we propose (hear, hear). You say that the agitation of this question is the worst thing that can happen. The noble lord the member for Lincolnshire says so distinctly. What guarantee have you that you will not have as much agitation now as if the law had not been altered in the least? I am afraid that honourable gentlemen opposite are still clinging to the gains of that protection. I believe that you cling to the three years' delay because you fancy you can gain something from it. As far as I am associated with the Anti-Corn Law League, I can assure you that that agitation will go on till the question is fairly settled. We are bound by hundreds of pledges to bring this question before the house, and still more are we bound to do so by a firm conviction of the necessity and the justice of the measure we propose; and I am sure that the Free Traders throughout the country will thank my honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton for giving the house this opportunity of deciding once for all upon this question (cheers). If the house pass this measure, it will have again to discuss it before this session is over, and if we do not gain the immediate repeal this session, we shall have to discuss it every session until the law has been fairly abolished. We commenced our agitation with that object—we have carried it on for no other—and you may rest assured that we shall continue to persevere in the principles which we believe to be right, and to press them upon this house and the country until this great question is finally and fairly settled (cheers).

Sir ROBERT PEEL said: I presume it is not wished by honourable gentlemen on either side of the house, that the debate, which has already occupied twelve days in discussion, should be much longer continued (cheers). There are many points which have arisen in the course of the debate—some, at least, on which I should be anxious to offer an explanation; but I think it probable that there will be an opportunity in the future stages of the bill—the second reading, for example; and if that be so, I would rather postpone any explanation which I may wish to make till that period (cheers). Therefore in what I have to say now, I shall certainly confine myself to the question before the house, which is, whether the repeal of the duty upon the importation of foreign corn should be immediate, or whether the duty should continue as proposed by her Majesty's Government for the period of three years? Now, Sir, I am bound to say, if you look simply and abstractedly to the emergency which exists in Ireland, that I cannot deny that I think the preferable measure would be the immediate suspension of all duties—that is, if there were no other questions to deal with than the emergency existing in Ireland (hear, hear). Suppose I took the course which has been taken in former years, and suspended the duty of the Act of Parliament for a period of eight months—till August or September next—there would then be an absolute repeal of all duties, or the maintenance only of a nominal duty; but what would Parliament do in the interval? What provision should be made with respect to the period when the suspension would expire (hear)? Those who contend for the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws would, of course, be perfectly satisfied with the immediate repeal. It would provide for their permanent object, and it would also provide for the removal of all duties during the apprehension of scarcity in Ireland. But that is not the universal opinion. There are many who think that the Corn Laws ought not to be repealed (loud cheers from the protectionists). Her Majesty's Government, however, having to decide this matter on the 20th of December, when they were again recalled to office, thought that there might be at the same time an opportunity of making provision for the emergency in Ireland, and of laying the foundation for a final settlement of the Corn Laws (cheers). I have frankly admitted that the provisions which we have made to meet the present emergency are not quite so complete as they would be if you removed the duty altogether; but what her Majesty's Government had to consider was, on the 20th of December, as I have already stated, how they could best effect the double object of providing for the emergency in Ireland, and at the same time of trying to gain the assent of the legislature to laying the foundation for the total removal of all duties; and in the hope of reconciling those two objects in the best way possible, her Majesty's Government framed the proposition which is now under the consideration of the house (hear, hear). With respect to the apprehensions of scarcity in Ireland, we certainly do not altogether remove the duties on grain, but we propose to remove the duty altogether on Indian corn; we propose to remove altogether the duty on rice; and though not, perhaps, so nearly affecting the people of Ireland, we propose to remove it also altogether from cattle and meat. With respect to wheat, too, we place that in a very different position to what it was in before, and we materially reduce the duty which at present absolutely prevents you taking out of bond that superior description of wheat, which is most important for the purpose of mixing with the inferior descriptions which enter into the market generally and affect the price of the other (hear, hear). I have before me a memorial signed by the whole of the millers of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and they state that the general weight of the bushel of corn in ordinary years averages from about 61 lbs. to 63 lbs., whilst in the present year it is not above 58 lbs. They say it would be of the utmost importance if they could have access to the better qualities of wheat, which are in bond, for the purpose of mixing with the inferior wheat, and they, therefore, now pray for immediate repeal. The duty at present upon that wheat, however, is 17s., and as there is a great quantity of inferior wheat in the market the price appears to be low, and the duty consequently remains high, so high as to operate almost as a prohibition to taking out of bond that quality of wheat which it is of the utmost importance to have for mixing with the inferior wheat (hear, hear). The present proposal of her Majesty's Government certainly does not remove the duty on wheat altogether, but it will considerably reduce the present duty of 17s. And it will do more; it will give a guarantee that in no one case can the duty rise above 10s., and there must be a very rapid fall in the price of wheat, which cannot be calculated on, to bring the duty up to 10s. The maximum duty at present is 20s. Under the proposal of her Majesty's Government the maximum would be 10s., and it is not probable even if the price should fall to some extent, that it would be more than 5s. or 6s. for some time to come (hear, hear). That is the proposal of her Majesty's Government with respect to wheat. Then with respect to barley. The present duty is 7s.; we propose, certainly not to reduce the duty to a mere nominal one; but we believe that it would not exceed 2s. instead of 7s. The duty upon oats is now 6s. Under the proposal of her Majesty's Government it will not exceed 2s.; but both in the case of barley and oats the guarantee which is given as an encouragement to importation. In barley there would be a guarantee that the duty should not rise above 5s., and in the case of oats not above 4s. a quarter. The duty on rye is at present 8s. 6d. Under the proposal of the Government it will be reduced to 2s. The present duty on beans is 6s. 6d., which will also be reduced to 2s. On peas, I believe, a similar reduction will be made. I am speaking now of the apprehension of a scarcity of food in Ireland, and I admit that the proposal is less perfect than if the duty had been altogether removed. But I say that, in the present state of public feeling in this country, you cannot look at this question abstractedly (cheers). I think it would be a very inconsiderate course, at the present moment to propose a mere suspension of the duty, to endure for eight months; for we should make no advance by such a suspension towards the final settlement of the question. At the end of that period the difficulties in the way of dealing with the question would be just as great as ever, the public feeling would be equally excited; and I confess I cannot see at all how a suspension of duties for eight months would lead to a satisfactory settlement of the question, which is by far of the most paramount importance, of the footing on which the Corn Laws shall hereafter stand (loud cheers). My opinion is decidedly that it is for the public interest that the Corn Laws should be either at once settled, or that the foundation for a settlement should now be laid, and that there should be a certain assurance on the part of the country that at no remote period the duties upon the importation of foreign grain should cease. The proposal of her Majesty's Government gives that assurance. I was certainly impressed from what passed the other night, that the honourable gentlemen on this side of the house were inclined to prefer the immediate repeal (cheers from the Opposition, and expressions of dissent from the protectionists). When I use the word "repeal," I mean the reduction to a nominal duty. The honourable member for Somersetshire certainly did declare positively in favour of immediate repeal (cheers and dissent). I may be erroneous in my impression of the degree of assent which the honourable member gave to the immediate repeal—I speak merely hypothetically; but when the honourable gentleman spoke, his declaration was certainly received as implying a preference of immediate repeal, nor was any dissent then expressed by him (hear). Her Majesty's Government have proposed a suspension of the repeal for the period of three years, partly from the impression that that proposal was preferable in itself to the immediate repeal, partly from a hope that it would be more acceptable to those who represent the agricultural interest (hear, hear), and it was under the impression that the immediate repeal was viewed by many, as I know it is, most decided friends of the agricultural interest and the main advocates of their rights, with the same approbation which I attributed to the expressions of the honourable member for Somersetshire, that I said, as I now repeat, that if the representatives of the agricultural interest—if those best acquainted with the feelings and wishes of the agriculturists should really prefer immediate repeal to a suspension of the repeal for three years, I have no doubt whatever that, under those circumstances, by uniting their forces with those of the honourable gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the house, they would be enabled to carry that proposition (cheers). The paramount object being to lay the foundation of an adjustment of the repeal of the Corn Laws, I shall accept the amended proposal of an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws (cheers from the Opposition). But, at the same time, my own opinion in favour of the gradual removal of duties proposed by Government remains unchanged. Well, the hon. gentleman, the member for Durham, threatens us with a continued agitation. Sir, I am very sorry for it (ironical cheers from the protectionists). I think such an agitation will be unreasonable (cheers from a large part of the Opposition). I cannot answer for the agricultural party as to the course they would pursue in case a great change of this kind were carried, but I don't think an attempt would be made by them to disturb a settlement when once made (this appeal to the protectionists was received in silence). But if there were a general acquiescence in the measure, I must say that the continued agitation of the Anti-Corn-Law League—considering that there would be a Parliamentary assurance that the duty would cease at the end of three years, and that during the interval there would be no duty as compared with that which now exists—I must say that an agitation for an immediate repeal would be unreasonable (protectionist cheers), and further, I do not think it would be successful (loud cheers from the same quarter, and from some on the Opposition side). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bright) says, that year after year the motion for an absolute repeal would be made, but as year after year the time for absolute repeal became nearer, I cannot see that very much interest would attach to that motion (cheers). I think a great number of persons would withdraw from the ranks of the Anti-Corn-Law League; that a great number of men would say that our proposal was not an unfair one, considering the differences of opinion which exist, considering the prospect there is of the duty expiring in three years, and that every day we are advancing towards a total repeal of the duty, which, after the proposed reduction, would be much lower than at present. My belief is, notwithstanding the necessities of agitation, that there would be still greater opposition to our measure if it proposed at once a total repeal. That proposal for total repeal is received now in a very different spirit from that in which it would have been met if the Government had not made another proposal. I am confirmed in that view by the demand of the hon. member for Somersetshire for an immediate repeal instead of a gradual repeal. I cannot help thinking, if we came forward in the first instance with a proposal for the total repeal, the measure would have encountered such a degree of opposition that we must have abandoned all hope of ultimate success. Another proposal has been made, partly from a preference to its abstract merits and partly from a sincere desire to conciliate the wishes and to meet the feelings of the more immediate representatives of the agricultural interest. If the measure be carried—that is, immediate instead of deferred repeal—I shall accept the amendment (though my conviction of the policy of my measure remains unchanged), and yield to the opinion of the majority of this house, though it is totally impossible I can answer for the effect of such a change in the passing of the measure. I prefer the deferred to the immediate repeal on this, among other grounds, that the Government intend to accompany it by other measures. I am told that, at the end of three years, we shall have a panic. I don't see any panic now at all events (loud opposition cheers). I am strongly of opinion that our protracted debates have had a great effect in depressing the price of wheat (renewed opposition cheers). I have a very strong impression that every quarter of wheat which is now sold, is 1s. 6d. or 2s. less than would be received for it if this measure was once carried,—it being quite notorious that there is no great amount of supplies in other parts of the world, and that since we began this debate the exportation of grain in those countries was prohibited. I can't help thinking that the tenant farmers will have to look forward to a degree of competition, which will be very limited, and when once the mind of the legislature is declared, and that we have a settled trade in corn, there will be an immediate increase of price (cheers from the Opposition). Considering, too, that we accompany this measure with another for affording facilities for the drainage of land (a cry of "they won't be accepted from the protectionists"). There is no compulsion to accept them, but if they are accepted, there will be an opportunity in cases of settled property of raising money for improvements on more moderate terms than it can be produced at present. I cannot help thinking also, that as there is a knowledge there is to be a competition at the end of three years, the minds of landed proprietors and of tenants will be directed to the improvement of land, and that at the end of three years, partly by the aid of public money, and partly by the exertions of individuals, we shall place ourselves in a more favourable position to compete with the produce of foreign countries than if we opened the ports immediately with the possibility of a good harvest all over the Continent before us. We don't think there will be the panic some apprehend at the end of three years. If the foreign corn grower thinks he can overwhelm our market at a duty reduced from 4s. to 1s., I think he will be very much mistaken. If there should be a great demand here, the result will be a rise in the price of land in foreign countries, a consequent rise in the cost of production, and diminished advantages to the foreign producer. These were the general reasons which induced her Majesty's Government to introduce this measure. They will do what they can to carry it; but, again, I say, if another proposal is approved of, they will not from pique or mortification abandon their own measure, but will give effect to that so amended by those who are the best judges of the plan most conducive to the agricultural interest (cheers).

Mr. G. PALMER thought the ground for proposing the Government measure untenable. It chiefly rested on the failure of the potato crop in Ireland. Some of the witnesses said that crop was one half, others one-third below the average. Now, if we take the mean, it would give us a crop only one-sixth below the average. The right honourable gentleman condemned the threatened agitation of the honourable member for Durham. Was there a doubt that agitation would never cease whilst a change remained to be demanded (protectionist cheers)? The right honourable gentleman assumed the protectionists were in favour of immediate repeal. The only ground for this assumption was, that the agriculturists demanded, if sentence of execution was pronounced against them three years hence, they should prefer it to be executed at once. But he was totally opposed to the repeal of the present protection, let the proposal come from what quarter it might (protectionist cheers). Still further was he from wishing that the agriculturists should become their own executioners. The honourable gentleman proceeded for some ten minutes, but the chorus of groaning kept up by the Opposition, and the counter cheering from the ministerial benches, prevented one sentence from reaching the gallery.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: If the committee will allow me, I will attempt, without discussing that question which has been discussed so many times, and which may be discussed again on the second reading of the bill, to state to the committee my views on the various propositions now before us. I will take this course, because reference has been already made to one of those propositions, and I think it may be most convenient, under these circumstances, to take a view of the whole of the amendments in question. But before I do this I am anxious to explain, with regard to a statement of the hon. member for Somersetshire, to the effect that I had maintained that the agricultural party were not willing to allow that there should be a suspension of the Corn Laws during a time of scarcity. Now, I never said so. My statement was, that supposing that famine was not so near as had been anticipated—supposing that the potato crop had not failed, as was imagined, that there now existed a good opportunity for the settlement of the question of the Corn Laws, and that we ought not to wait for a time of greater scarcity. That is the view with which I looked upon this proposition. I do think that we are at a time when it is most desirable to obtain a settlement of this question (hear). Now there are various propositions made as amendments upon the plan brought forward by the right honourable baronet. Among the rest, the noble lord member for Lincolnshire (Lord Worsley) has alluded to a plan to which I was attached, the plan of a fixed duty of 5s. per quarter. Now, I do not think that the objections which have been made to a fixed duty on its own merits are objections fatal to that proposition. I have never considered if we had a duty of 5s. or 8s. per quarter that the prices would be raised in the same proportion. I rather lean to the opinion of the hand-loom commissioners, to the opinion of such men as Mr. Senior and Mr. Jones Lloyd, as being nearer the truth, when they state that a duty of 5s. on imported wheat would probably raise the price about 1s. per quarter; but I should not wish to vote at the present time for a proposition which would not be a settlement with respect to the Corn Laws. I do think that a fiscal duty of even 8s. in 1841, or a fixed duty of 5s. during the last year, would have been a settlement for a number of years. I believe there would have been a regular trade in corn, and such large importations that those who complain of the present law would have been satisfied with that arrangement. But I would not permit myself to vote for a proposition at the present time which would be likely to continue agitation, and keep the farmers in a state of prolonged uncertainty (hear, hear). Having been told in 1842 that the act of that year was a final settlement of the question, and having been told in 1846 by the authors of that act that it was a complete and signal failure—that the sliding-scale, far from being a scale which, as it was once represented, would provide for years of scarcity as regularly and exactly as for years of abundance, was, on the contrary, in the very first year of difficulty found to be a sliding-scale which would not slide at all, and therefore one which must be abandoned—after that had taken place, if any plan of protection were to be introduced as a plan of perfect settlement, and they saw, as they would see, the League reinforced by numbers who would consider it as the conquering cause—the triumphant flag—the farmers, still more anxious and uncertain, still more ignorant in what manner to make bargains with the landlords, still more doubtful as to what would be the probable scale of prices for a number of years were all these effects to follow, as they would follow such a course, you would have but a renewal and a continuance of violent agitation (hear, hear, hear). Therefore, while I regret that my noble friend did not in former years concur with me that a fixed duty should form the ground of settlement of the question, I cannot say to him, or to any one who is now convinced that that should effect the settlement, that it would be advantageous to the agricultural, or indeed to any other interest. I need not, of course, notice the proposition for the continuance of the modified sliding scale for three years. With respect to the proposal for the continuance of the duty beyond three years, I think it is liable to the same objections as those I stated to the fixed duty. It would continue agitation; it would be the cause from this time to the general election, and from the general election for a long time afterwards, of disunion, heart-burnings, and discord between the different classes of the community; and we should have little chance of seeing honourable gentlemen arrive at that consummation so much to be desired of a general acquiescence in, if not a general agreement on, a plan of settlement (hear). I next come to the proposition before the house—the proposition of the hon. member for Wolverhampton—who now proposes that the duties on corn should forthwith cease. Now I must say, comparing the two propositions as they were made by two independent members of this house, that I should consider the proposition of the honourable member (Mr. Villiers) both more wise as an abstract and more effective as a practical proposition than that of the right honourable baronet (Opposition cheers). I consider it so, because I do think that instead of that which has been and may again be the condition of the country—when the home harvest has been abundant, and plenty of low-priced corn could have been brought in from abroad—that the present time, foreign stores being almost exhausted by the great demand upon them from Belgium and other countries, and the harvest of last year being not of a quality so good as to make it likely that there would be any great depression of prices during the present year—that such being the case, I repeat that I do consider that at the present time, were the Corn Laws to be immediately repealed, no panic would follow that repeal (hear, hear). The right honourable baronet said, and most truly, that there had been no panic in consequence of his proposition, and yet his plan would let in corn, for some months at least, at a duty of 4s.; and I, for one, do not think that that amount of duty would make the difference between panic and no panic (hear, hear). If there be no panic at the prospect of a duty of 4s., there could not be any panic at the prospect of immediate repeal (hear, hear). But if you had that repeal, there would be no longer any question on the subject; the farmers would at once apply their minds to that which your present laws have prevented—to the consideration of the means of drawing from the soil the largest amount of produce by means of the utmost exertion of intelligence, of activity, and skill, and all those qualities which we know it is the effect of monopolist, restrictive, and protective laws to relax and enfeeble (hear, hear). But if there is to be protection, varying from 10s. to 4s. the quarter, I think it is not likely that there will be the same amount of exertion, that that protection will be counted on for a time, and that there will be speculation, nursed and kept aloft, as to what may happen in 1849, some speculating upon that being a period when there will be a great influx of foreign corn, and the delay and anticipation giving rise to endless irritation and excitement (hear, hear). For these reasons, and others—because there are others which I will not trouble the committee with—for these reasons I think as a proposition, taken by itself, the proposition of my honourable friend to be abstractedly the best. But the case I have now to consider is the case of a Government proposing a plan for the settlement of a great question on which hitherto there has been a great resistance on the part of this house, and on which there may still be some resistance and opposition on the part of the majority of the other house of Parliament (loud and significant cheering from the protectionists). I am not aware of the view which the other house may take of this subject. I must listen, therefore, to what is said by the Prime Minister, and to his plans for the settlement of the question. He has undertaken it, and did he bring forward a mere abstract scheme, were it objectionable, I might favour an amendment, and demur to the proposition. But he has undertaken it in such a way as that three years will produce a certain and complete settlement of the question. He has told us that he had reasons which induced him to prefer his own proposition. I own I do not think that these reasons are conclusive. For example, he talked of his plan being more favourable than total and immediate repeal to the landed interest. I will not say what view the landed interest may take of it, but I more and more concur in the opinion that the farmers do not at all value the three years' reduced protection. I think the reasons which the right hon. baronet gave in respect of the Canada corn bill only confirm the view which we took at the time of the impolicy and danger of introducing a bill to confer a monopoly on a single colony, which it never had before, and which you could not withdraw without leaving the feeling rankling behind that injustice had been committed. But, Sir, quite apart from these minor considerations, the right honourable baronet makes another statement: he says that, although, were the house to decide by a majority in favour of immediate repeal, he would then use his best efforts to promote the success of the measure so amended, yet he asserts that he will not answer for the result, and he states likewise, and a most important statement it is, that in his opinion if he had brought forward a project of immediate repeal, instead of the measure which he has introduced, that he should have failed in his endeavour to settle the question (hear, hear). I never think it right to vote in this house for any measure or resolution which I should not wish to see succeed (hear). The proper way to consider any motion I take to be, to ask oneself the question, "Should you desire to see this succeed?" Now, if the honourable member for Wolverhampton should have a majority, and I should be one of that majority, I should have in terms a better settlement of the question than the right honourable baronet proposes (cries of "hear, hear"). But looking at the comparative advantages of the two courses, I, for my own part, say that I will not incur the responsibility of assenting to the motion of the honourable member for Wolverhampton (hear, hear). It is far better, in my opinion, to promote the measure of the First Minister of the Crown, and I believe if the house carried it by so great a majority as voted for the committee, that the Upper House will accept it more readily as a measure of that Minister. I feel, too, that it will be regarded with a degree of confidence which would not have been extended to the other measure, which must have been regarded as in some degree objectionable as being the offspring of the Anti-Corn-Law League. I consider the carrying of this measure by the present Parliament without any conflict of interests, as of the greatest possible advantage. I believe that after it has been carried there may be some excitement in the country, which will, however, subside, and the different classes of society will be better reconciled afterwards than they have been for many years past (hear, hear, and cheers). Speaking, besides, on the Corn Law to any one who possessed a feeling for the institutions of the country, that was a most important consideration, because it is impossible not to see that a great political agitation prevailing on this subject for a length of time, may extend itself to other matters, and be directed to other purposes. I wish, most certainly, to see the question settled in the best possible manner, and I think on the whole that the way most conducive to its best and most effectual settlement, is to support, against every amendment, the proposition of her Majesty's Government (cheers). I do not consider that the question should be looked on in an abstract light alone, but that its settlement should be regarded with due reference to the time and to the circumstances of Parliament. I beg leave, however, to notice the statement made to-night by the right honourable gentleman opposite; who said that if he proposed the immediate repeal he thought the proposition would have failed. I understood him on a former night to state his regret that I had not undertaken to make that proposition (hear, hear). I was surprised to hear that statement, for though I believe the right honourable gentleman would have given me every support to any measure I brought forward, which he conceived to be for the public good, yet I think he must have heard, since that time, objections and statements strong enough and numerous enough to have convinced him that those who would have followed him, and supported me in office, on such a proposition, would have been a very small number indeed, as compared with the 112 members who have now voted with the right honourable gentleman (hear and cheers). I must fairly say that I do not believe there would have been more than 40, or perhaps 50, members to have voted with me (loud cries of "no, no, not so many"). Some honourable members say I am making an exaggerated estimate of the number even at fifty; but, at all events, be that as it may, I do not believe if all the members of the present Cabinet had given me their support, there would have been a sufficient number to have obtained for me a majority on my first proposition for going into committee (cheers from the protectionists). My honourable friend stated to-night that he understood me to say that I should be very sorry to see a dissolution of Parliament, because I believed a dissolution would not have given us a majority for the repeal of the Corn Laws. My honourable friend has not rightly understood me. I said I thought, as I still think, it desirable there should be no dissolution of Parliament on this question. I think all the statements which have been made to the effect that this House of Commons is not competent to decide the question of the Corn Laws, are founded on ignorance and misapprehension of the principles of our constitution (cheers). I consider that when a Parliament has been elected, it is to provide for all the most important affairs of this country, whether foreign or domestic, according to the best of its judgment and discretion (hear, hear). I cannot conceive any assertion to the effect that this Parliament is not competent to decide the question of the Corn Laws, which would not lead to the doctrine that the house was not competent to decide any question of great importance, unless it had been expressly elected by the people for the purpose of settling it (cheers). That would be a most democratic doctrine, and it would almost lead to annual Parliaments at once (cheers), and to the conviction that unless elected with that object, members of the house were not justified in giving their votes on any great question whatever (hear, hear). I speak now of the general powers of the House of Commons, the exercise of which for greater objects is undoubted and undeniable. A great question arose after the settlement of the House of Hanover on the throne, and the Parliament elected for three years considered itself justified in prolonging its existence to seven years, for the purpose of saving the country from confusion and anarchy (hear). Will any one say that the House of Commons, which could prolong its existence from three to seven years, could not settle such a question as the Corn Laws (hear)? The question which arose on the union of Scotland and of Ireland were cases in point equally analogous. As to the question of engagements of particular members with their constituency, and with regard to considerations affecting their private honour and public character for consistency,—I will not meddle with the matter; I am now merely speaking of the principles of Parliament. It is my view that this house, as at present constituted, is perfectly competent to settle the question of the Corn Laws, and unless there were very great and very general national feeling evinced on the subject, I believe that no person is entitled to contradict that assertion. If I am asked, why I think it desirable there should not be a dissolution, I reply, that I think it desirable to avoid it; not that there would not be a Parliament in favour of the Corn Laws—for my belief is that there would be a majority in favour of repeal—but that I believe that majority would be obtained by the greatest collisions of opinion, and by the exhibition of much angry feeling at the elections (hear, hear, hear). I think, Sir, a majority so elected would hardly have the weight with the other house of Parliament which the majority of the present house is likely to exercise. I think the whole question, in the event of a dissolution, would be made, much more than it is at present, one of discordance between all classes; that many more men would be prepared to stand to pledges they had given in defiance of their better and more calmly considered opinions, and that the country would be plunged into an agitation highly injurious to its best interests (cheers). For these reasons, Sir, I am going to take that course—the only course which it seems to me, after deeply pondering over this matter, and reflecting over it to the best of my abilities, that I ought to take which I believe to be my duty to my country—namely, to vote with her Majesty's Government against the present amendment (cheers); and not only against this amendment, but against any other to be proposed hereafter in committee (loud cheers). I shall be prepared to vote with her Majesty's Government not only on this but in every stage of the bill; and I think the interests of the country deeply involved in the immediate, complete, and tranquil settlement of this question (loud cheering from both sides of the house).

Sir WILLIAM JOLLIFFE rose for the purpose of saying a very few words with regard to the vote which he was going to give. He had always consistently voted against the propositions of the hon. and learned member for Wolverhampton, and it was still his intention to vote against him, but without some explanation of the opinions which he (Sir W. Jolliffe) held on the subject might be misrepresented. He still cherished the hope that the measures brought forward by the Government might be defeated, but at the same time he could not help asking whether, if any change was to be made, the time was not now come when it could be made without the least danger to the country. At present the farmers were in a flourishing, and, he might say, a happy state—a state which was about to be overturned in a gradual and insidious manner. He should vote against the hon. member's proposition, because, although the Government measure had neither justice nor common sense to support it, there would be greater advantage in defeating the scheme of the hon. and learned member for Wolverhampton than in defeating the Government on such a question.

Mr. HUME hoped that the speech of the hon. member who had just sat down would show those who were about to divide the Liberal ranks the risk of such a division. He thought that, whatever opinions those of his own party might entertain, they ought, under existing circumstances, to support the measure of her Majesty's Government.

Mr. BORTHWICK (amid loud cries of "oh, oh," which rendered him almost inaudible) said, that as many hon. gentlemen were anxious to address the house, he should, without further preface, at once move the adjournment of the debate (great uproar).

The Marquess of GRANBY would only say a very few words. The noble lord the member for Lincoln had said that the house was in a situation to settle this question. Now the noble lord had admitted that if he had undertaken the Government he would not have been enabled to have carried the present measure through the house by a majority of above 40 members. The noble lord, therefore, was not in a position to have carried the measure without an appeal to the country, and he asked the house whether the opinion of the house or of the country was satisfactorily ascertained under existing circumstances? He maintained that neither the opinion of the house nor of the country was properly collected at present, and therefore he considered that some other steps must be taken to ascertain it.

After a few words from Mr. BORTHWICK, Lord WORSLEY rose to explain. He feared his noble friend (Lord John Russell) had misunderstood what he (Lord Worsley) had said in an earlier part of the evening, when he declared his intention of supporting the proposed duty of 5s., not as a measure of protection, but as one from which a revenue would be obtained. He would also take the opportunity of declaring that he saw nothing inconsistent in those opinions, or in the vote he was about to give, with the speech quoted by the hon. member for the city of Durham, Mr. Bright (hear).

The Earl of MARCH said that the house was in such a state of confusion that they seemed to have forgotten the question before the committee. He understood that his hon. friend the member for Evesham had moved that the chair man should report progress and ask leave to sit again.

A vote was then taken on the motion for adjournment.

The numbers were—
For the motion 70
Against it 227
Majority 157

Lord J. MANNERS reminded the noble lord the member for London of a time when the Whig government of a former day was afraid of an appeal to their constituency. He knew not what were the noble lord's opinions as to the popular constitution of this house; but should the noble lord, in his anxiety to prolong the life of that Parliament, wish to propose a decennial duration, he (Lord J. Manners) should be one of the first to vote against him. If the private honour of 150 or 200 members of Parliament was compromised, could it be hoped that by a constitutional fallacy their public honour as a public assembly could be maintained (cheers)? If he had wanted any justification of the course which the great minority of the House of Commons had adopted, he should find it in the speech of the noble lord; and he would ask the house, after such a speech, after such arguments, whether they could refuse to adjourn for any number of nights that hon. members might choose to discuss the question ("oh, oh," and cheers)? He could conceive no such arguments in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Evesham, as those which had been heard from the noble lord; and after such a speech as that of the noble lord, so long as the hon. member for Evesham chose to divide the house on the question of adjournment, he (Lord J. Manners) would divide with him (hear, hear).

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said he was sorry he had incurred the displeasure of the noble lord (laughter), but really the penalty of adjournment seemed too heavy for merely a speech of his (Lord J. Russell). There might, however, be one advantage from such a course, for according to the published opinions of the noble lord, so far as he could collect them (loud cheers, which drowned the conclusion of the sentence). The noble lord had formerly considered protection as necessary and beneficial, but the noble lord on being elected into a new Parliament, had then considered it his duty to vote that protection an evil. But now the noble lord, to judge from a letter he had published, was of opinion that it was good, and that the Corn Laws, instead of being changed, should be maintained (hear, hear, and laughter).

Sir A. BROOKE complained that several Irish members had waited for 13 nights, wishing to speak on this question, but never getting an opportunity. This night, the whole time had been occupied by the hon. members for Durham, Manchester, and Wolverhampton, by the noble lord the member for London, and the right hon. baronet the first Lord of the Treasury, so that those who were in favour of protection had been prevented from speaking. Under these circumstances, he thought the call for a division very unfair, and should move that the house do now adjourn (laughter)—that this debate be now adjourned.

Sir R. PEEL said, if they came to a vote now, it would not close the question on the resolution. There were other amendments before the house, but probably the best course would be to dispose first of the amendment of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FERRAND said he was prepared to justify the course they were pursuing that night, by reference to a speech of the right hon. bart., delivered on the 31st of January, 1840 (laughter, and cries of "oh, oh"), in the debate on the vote of want of confidence in ministers. Substitute the name of Stanley for that of Howick, and the exactness of the application was perfect. The hon. member then read the passage referred to, to the effect that Lord Howick had quitted the ministry of Lord Melbourne, because he had no confidence in its principles or professions. He concluded by moving that the chairman do now leave the chair.

Lord J. MANNERS assured the noble lord that if he would have the kindness to refer to his published letter with greater care than he seemed to have done, he would perceive that the inferences he had drawn were not justified.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL thought it too bad they should have nothing but quotations from former speeches. What had a speech on a vote of want of confidence to do with the question that the chairman report progress? He should not protest against it, but that he felt the character of this house would be lowered in public estimation. Let not hon. gentlemen opposite pursue this course, or their compact minority would speedily dwindle into a contemptible band of 70.

Mr. G. BANKES protested against the manner in which the observations of the hon. member for Essex had been received.

After a few words from Lord C. HAMILTON,

Mr. FERRAND said he was ready, not only with one quotation, but with fifty (great laughter). He was determined to proceed, and hold up the hon. bart. to the scorn and derision of the country.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL remarked that the discussion now going on did not bear upon the question of the immediate or deferred repeal of the Corn Laws. He would suggest that the motion be withdrawn, and the chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again, by which course hon. gentlemen would have an opportunity of expressing their sentiments.

The Chairman then reported progress, and the debate was adjourned.

TUESDAY.—ALLEGED FRAUDULENT OBJECTIONS IN THE REGISTRATIONS.

Mr. NEWDEGATE rose to submit the motion of which he had given notice, but, owing to the information which he had since received, he was induced to alter the terms of his motion, which would now stand thus:—"That it be an instruction to the Select Committee on the petition from Cheltenham, presented on the 27th of February, that they do inquire into the alleged organised and extensive system of fraudulent and vexatious objections to the votes of a great number of duly qualified electors for the northern division of the county of Warwick, the northern division of the county of Stafford, and certain divisions of other counties, to be returned on the registration of the said counties." His complaint was, that this organised system was not only practised in one, but carried to an immense extent in many counties, to the great annoyance and expense of the parties against whose right to vote the objections were made. Those whom he represented had been attacked, apparently more for the purpose of putting them vexatiously to expense than for any other object, and as a committee had been moved for by the honourable member for Cheltenham, for an analogous purpose, he did not think there was any impropriety in his endeavour to include this subject in their inquiry. That house had always considered fraudulent interference with elections as a breach of its privileges, and tribunals were created in the house to try such cases. How much more necessary was it to inquire into the interferences with the registrations! They had the highest authority for the opinion that the battle of the constitution was to be fought in the registration courts (hear, hear). He had already, on a former evening, stated to the house the ground of his present proceeding. A great number of objections to the votes of electors for North Warwickshire had been served, which were all signed by one person, a resident at Coventry, and the greater part of which altogether failed on their merits. The most remarkable instance of these objections had, however, occurred at Birmingham, where, in two parishes alone, no less than 700 notices were served, all signed by the same person who had signed them at Coventry. As he had already stated, the postmaster of Manchester had had no less than 30,000 notices of objection posted in his office in one night. He (Mr. Newdegate) believed that he should be able to trace a connection between these cases of the service of notices and certain gentlemen who were members of the Anti-Corn-Law League; he could mention in particular the names of Messrs. Ackland, Morris, Beswick, and Bury (as we understood); and he thought he should also be able to show that the League had employed a person not of the best character to sign a great number of notices, he being a voter for North Warwickshire. It was observable that in most of the instances of which he complained, the parties served with notices were persons of large property, and those were selected who were resident at the greatest distance from the northern division of Warwickshire, and on whom, therefore, the greater expense and inconvenience would be entailed. The person used as the instrument of this organised annoyance was named Worthington, a person of no property, and who was almost labouring for the means of subsistence; but after a great number of his objections had been tried, and an immense number of persons had been obliged to appear (200) notices having been served, the agent of the League ordered their objector to leave the court, and said he would not pay any more expenses (hear). It was manifest that if such a system as this was to be pursued the franchise could never be maintained; year after year persons would be brought from great distances (some in the cases he referred to came from Wales and the Isle of Wight) for the purpose of defending their votes against these objections, and they would then find them abandoned, while they were themselves unable to obtain even the small compensation which the law allowed for expenses (hear). The hon. member then proceeded to state that the party he referred to, William Worthington, who had signed these notices of objection, had been examined in court as to the genuineness of his signature. He swore to it in several cases; but that afterwards, on a man named Stafford being produced, who stated that he himself had written the signatures under Worthington's direction, Worthington retracted his former statement (hear, hear, hear). A similar system of organised vexatious objections to that he had referred to as existing in North Warwickshire had been pursued elsewhere, and he pledged himself to trace it to the Anti-Corn-Law League. The hon. member for Stockport the other night said that the interference of the League with the franchise was a benefit, inasmuch as it extended the ancient franchise; but how came it that their new qualifications were given exclusively to those who favoured them, while their wholesale objections were made to those who were opposed to them? The system was, in fact, one of a most grievous character, and if it was intended by the Anti-Corn-Law League that it should be pursued in those counties which had been threatened by the hon. member for Stockport, it could only end in their utter disfranchisement (hear, hear). He hoped that the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government, after what he had said the other night, would offer no opposition to such an inquiry. It behoved the right hon. baronet to show that there was no collusion between himself and the League; but out of doors a deep impression prevailed that the Government had not been altogether uninfluenced in their recent course by an agitation which had been maintained by such practices as he had described. He trusted, therefore, that the right hon. baronet would not lend himself to the avoidance of this inquiry. It was no question between the protectionists and the Anti-Corn Law League; but it was a question between the house and the League, whether the house would allow its franchises to be tampered with by that association. The hon. member concluded by proposing his motion.

Mr. FERRAND seconded the motion.

Mr. R. YORKE thought the committee should have its attention confined to the inquiry which it had been specially appointed to conduct.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE was of opinion that the house could not adopt the motion. He perfectly agreed with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) in thinking he had no light case, that case consisting of charges of perjury and the prosecution of a system of annoyance to electors. But what had the house to do with that or the committee to which the honourable gentleman proposed the investigation of his charges should be referred? That committee was appointed to inquire into a breach of privilege which had taken place by the addition of signatures, alleged to be fraudulent, to a petition presented to that house. But he did not see how this was a breach of privilege. A man committing perjury in a revising barrister's court was amenable to the law. Neither was the alleged annoyance to which electors were subjected by the service of notices a breach of privilege. He knew not under what denomination of offences it would come. It was, no doubt, very harassing to electors. But it was part of the whole system of registration (cheers) with which he had so often found fault in that house, though he could not get hon. gentlemen to agree with him—they were so proud of the existing law. Now, however, they began to feel the inconvenience of a system which had been pursued in reference to elections in boroughs, by urging objections on the score of nonpayment of rates and taxes. Now it was beginning to fall on the counties, on the tenants-at-will; and hon. gentlemen were now complaining. There was no case of breach of privilege, and no occasion for interference. The hon. gentleman might, if he liked, move for a committee to inquire into the whole system of registration, and take steps for amending the Reform Act; and he (Mr. Duncombe) would be happy to assist him; but he did hope the right honourable baronet (Sir R. Peel) would not give his support to the motion of the hon. gentleman. His (Mr. Duncombe's) name had been put down on the committee to which it was proposed to refer this additional matter for inquiry; but if that course were adopted, he should certainly decline serving upon that committee.

Mr. NEWDEGATE begged to state, in reference to the suggestion that proceedings might be taken at common law on a part of the case, that he and his friends had no wish to prosecute the unhappy tool of the Anti Corn Law League, in carrying out the system it had organised. (Cries of "Spoke, spoke.") The committee, on which had been imposed the duty of instituting inquiry into the forgery of signatures to a petition traceable to that association, seemed best suited for pursuing a further inquiry relating to the same body and its interference with the elective franchise.

Mr. ADDERLEY thought there was an analogy between the subject which the committee had been appointed to investigate, and that to which it was proposed its inquiries should be extended. He had himself observed a similar invasion of the privileges of electors in the northern division of Staffordshire. Encroachments on the privileges of electors had a close resemblance to attacks on the privileges of the house. A bill had been drawn up on the subject by a friend of his, and he hoped some investigation would take place before its introduction. A petition had been entrusted to his charge in which the electors by whom it was signed complained that parties who had been for a number of years on the register, and whose right admitted of no dispute, had been served with notices, and that no fewer than 2000 of these had been issued this year, signed by an inhabitant of the county, but posted at Manchester (cheers).

Mr. WAKLEY considered the present system of registration a bad one. Under it the most fraudulent practices frequently took place. But the matter was certainly of too much importance to be incidentally referred to a committee to consider another subject with which that of the system of registration had no legitimate connection. He trusted the motion would be withdrawn. The question which had been raised was of great importance. The Government, he was sure, would feel prepared to lend their aid in the correction of the system, which could not be effected in the clumsy way now proposed. The honourable gentleman dealt very hardly with the Anti-Corn Law League. He had charged a man with forgery, and yet adopted the testimony of that man (cries of "no, no"). Yes, he took that testimony as sufficient to warrant him in accusing and condemning the League; and so lightly and delicately had they dealt with that man, that though he is charged with atrocious crimes, they had done nothing to bring him to justice. He (Mr. Wakley) could not take such testimony. The question with reference to the registration system was one which he trusted the Government would take up on some early occasion, and into which it would be of advantage to institute an inquiry by a committee.

Sir R. PEEL: When this question was brought under the notice of the house, I stated that in my opinion it was not advisable to devolve on the committee appointed yesterday any other inquiry than that which had been specially referred to it, but that it would be infinitely better that the committee should direct its attention exclusively to the alleged breach of the privileges of this house. That opinion I still maintain. It is very easy for the hon. gentlemen to make an insinuation of collusion between a Minister of the Crown and an honourable gentleman a member of the house (hear, hear). There is not the slightest foundation for the honourable gentleman's remark, which is of such a kind as to place an individual in my position in this situation, that I am obliged to give it an answer, or pass it by, though were I remaining silent there may probably be persons who would in these times draw injurious inferences. And, therefore, rather than such inferences should be drawn, I tell the honourable gentleman, that neither on the subject of the Corn Laws, nor on any other public subject, or private subject, had I any communication, direct or indirect, with the Anti-Corn Law League, or with any member of the Anti-Corn Law League, so far as I remember (hear, hear). The honourable gentleman founds his surmise upon what passed the other night, in consequence of a reference made by the honourable member for Shrewsbury (Mr. D'Israeli) to an imputation from which I thought at the time I had relieved the honourable member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden). At any rate there could be no concert between myself and the members of the Anti-Corn Law League, for it was on the hon. member for Shrewsbury's allusion to the circumstance that spontaneously, and as any gentleman would (cheers), I rose to declare the fact that I had long before stated that the imputation did not rest on the hon. member for Stockport. That is the circumstance on which the hon. gentleman founds his insinuation. I repeat again that I do not recollect holding any communication with any member of the Anti-Corn Law League. I now come to the real merits of the question. I understood the hon. member for Staffordshire to state that some person not connected with the county objected to voters upon the list. I thought it a gross abuse. If it is alleged that the party in question objected indiscriminately to some thousand or two voters, the tendency of such a practice is to interfere with the privileges of the electors; and the Anti-Corn Law League, or any other body that employs such party, in giving its sanction to such proceedings, pursues a course which ought not to be pursued (cheers). I retain my objection to the transference of this inquiry to this committee; but if, as I understand, the right hon. gentleman has a petition on which his allegations are founded, it may be a question for him whether or not he may not propose the appointment of a committee of inquiry into that matter.

Mr. SPOONER said, the person who had been described as the agent of the League in the registration courts, had his costs paid by the League in all the cases that were given against him, and therefore no doubt could be entertained of the character in which he acted. The man who signed the objections lived in a very remote part of Birmingham, but every one of the objections applicable to that district came through the post-office at Manchester (cheers). They were posted at Manchester so late, that they could not be forwarded in time for delivery before the last legal day for service expired; though the notices were good in law, if posted in such a manner. This was a matter which required investigation. He had been objected to himself, and had only time enough left to give instructions to his solicitor to appear for him in defence of his franchise.

Sir G. GREY hoped the inquiry if gone into, would not be narrowed to the facts alleged (cheers). It should extend to the whole working of the Registration Act. He had before expressed the opinion that the provisions of that act exposed voters to very vexatious proceedings. Objections of much force had been stated from the Opposition side of the house; but there was no remedy. He thought it but a just arrangement that those parties who had once established their right to vote should not be liable to have their right challenged from year to year. The evil was then more felt by hon. gentlemen on that side of the house (cheers). The shoe now pinched on the other side. He trusted this inquiry, when instituted, would be carried out with a view to remove the sources of vexation, which parties of different political opinions avail themselves of not for honest purposes, but for the mere sake of annoyance (cheers).

Mr. D'ISRAELI wished, as his name had been very unexpectedly brought into the discussion, to say a few words in explanation. It had been stated, that some observations which fell the other evening from the right hon. gentleman (Sir R. Peel), were called forth by an allusion he (Mr. D'Israeli) had made in the course of discussion—as if in something he had said he had been ripping up old grievances. He had made an allusion in the most legitimate spirit of debate. The hon. member for Knaresborough (Mr. Ferrand) was accused of charging the Anti-Corn Law League with abetting assassination. The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Bright) intimated, that if they could have fixed that charge on the hon. member for Knaresborough, they would have prosecuted him. On hearing this statement, he (Mr. D'Israeli) reminded the house that a similar charge had been made in that house by the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel). He had read that the hon. member for Stockport, considering the charge unretreated, had declared it utterly impossible that he could hold communication with the Prime Minister (cheers). Therefore the house would see that he (Mr. D'Israeli) had not been ripping up old grievances. The right hon. gentleman said to-night that he had taken the first opportunity of putting himself right, it having been supposed that he had thrown out such an imputation. But he (Mr. D'Israeli) begged to remind the right hon. gentleman, that he referred to the very same circumstance last year, under circumstances, too, of excitement. The right hon. gentleman did not then show that extreme alacrity in putting himself right for which he had taken credit.

Sir R. PEEL said—I wish to refer to what I did say on that occasion. The hon. member for Stockport had stated, "in what I said, I intended—and I believe everybody understood what I meant—to speak of the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government; I used the words 'individually responsible,' as the right honourable baronet uses the personal pronoun when he says, I passed the tariff, and you supported me. I treated the right honourable baronet as the Government." I followed the hon. gentlemen in the debate, and I then said, "I am bound to accept the construction the hon. gentleman puts on the language he employed, but he uses the words in a marked manner, and others put a different interpretation upon them, and thought that by 'individual' he meant 'personal.' I admitted at once my error, and if any one at the time had intimated to me that my reparation was not sufficient, I would at once or on some other day, have taken the opportunity of stating what I did mean; the facts of the case justified me in the impression, that I meant at the time to withdraw the imputation.

Mr. W. ELLIS said, the system of making objections had been acted on for many years past; he had himself been objected to during the last year. On inquiry it would be found that no less than 2000 had been so objected to, and all the objections proceeded from the Conservative party (hear, hear). If the Anti-Corn Law League had adopted the same system, they had only acted on the example of the other party.

Lord SANDON said the system was an improper one, and he did not care with which party it originated. At present every man was bound to be at his town or country residence a certain time of the year to protect his vote; if absent, it was endangered. That was an unconstitutional impediment to the free enjoyment of the elective franchise. In Lancashire, 2000 objections had been sent, and they all came through the Manchester post-office (hear, hear); they were scattered over a period of three weeks, and the result had been that many gentlemen of undoubted property had been struck off the list. He hoped this system would be put an end to.

Mr. LAWSON said the right hon. baronet had told them that he was of the same opinion to-day as yesterday, and appeared to think that such an assertion would hardly find credit with the house, for he had repeated it twice. ("Oh, oh!" and laughter). He hoped, on other occasions, the right hon. baronet would be holding the same opinions as on the day before. ("Oh, oh!" and "Question"). He was glad to hear the right hon. baronet deny that he had any connection with the Anti-Corn Law League; but, from what they had seen this session, he thought the hon. member for Warwickshire had some cause to imagine such a connection might exist; but as it had been denied, of course he and other gentlemen were bound to believe there was none.

Mr. BROTHERTON said, formerly the hon. gentlemen were the objectors; in his own borough 700 objections had been served, his own vote being among them. He had been objected to for four years successively. He should be glad to see the system rectified; indeed it had rectified itself to a considerable extent. When it was found by gentlemen on this side of the house that they could get no redress from the house, they adopted the same policy. "When bad men combine, good men must unite" (hear). He thought the Anti-Corn Law League had done much service by the exertion they had made; they had also endeavoured to create a constituency in the different counties, and they might depend that if the League was not put down, by enacting the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, it would go on to an extent that honourable gentlemen opposite would not like. The right honourable baronet had shown more foresight as to the mode in which the League was to be put down. The upper men in the employ of the manufacturers of Lancashire were purchasing cottages and freeholds, and felt pride in having a voice in the representation of the county; they would send up men who would enact such laws only as were just, and for the good of the whole community. No part of the quarter of a million fund was expended in anything connected with the purchase of freeholds; they were bought by persons who had saved money to do so, and who had as great a right to the franchise as the owners of the largest estate (hear).

Mr. FERRAND said they did not quarrel with making good votes, but to sending objections to votes known to be good before, which was quite the reverse. The same system of objecting had been carried on in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the noble lord (Morpeth) was returned in consequence of the wholesale objections that had been made against the voters of that district; his vote had been objected to for four years in succession, and he could get no redress till he threatened to bring an action against the objecting party for the costs he was put to. The same system had been carried on in every county, and if the League was permitted to pursue this course, in a few years they would swamp all the bona fide voters, and be able to return members who would not represent the honest electors, but would be returned by a minority, the majority of voters having been destroyed by a wholesale system of perjury and forgery.

Mr. F. MAULE said, the members on his side of the house had for years tried to get this grievance remedied; but as the shoe did not pinch their own feet, they could get no assistance from the other side. Now the system came home to them, and he hoped an inquiry would be made into it, both in Ireland and Scotland, as well as in England.

Mr. PACKE said, in the county he represented (Leicestershire), 1500 objections had been made in this manner.

Mr. C. BULLER said he differed in opinion from hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house. He did not see the necessity for this inquiry at all (hear, hear). They had arrived at a stage far beyond inquiry. Every person on both sides of the house was quite convinced of the enormity and extent of the evil, and was perfectly prepared to give a favourable reception to the remedy. He did not know whether it would be a proper amendment to move upon the motion of the hon. member for Warwickshire, but he confessed he felt inclined to move that leave be given to the hon. and gallant member for Staffordshire to bring in the bill he had got in his pocket (hear, hear, and laughter). There were, no doubt, cases in which inquiries of this kind were necessary to lay the foundation of legislation; but they had often seen them entered into for the purpose of preventing legislation (hear, hear), and the house might fall into this evil on the present occasion. The abuse was acknowledged to exist, and to exist on both sides; they had followed the laudable example set them by the gentlemen opposite. The extent of the abuse had often been deplored by them, yet, year after year, when they brought in measures to prevent these abuses, the gentlemen opposite, as much those below the gangway as above it, denied the evil and opposed the remedy (hear, hear). He was delighted to see that the example set by the hon. gentlemen behind the Treasury benches was imitated by the hon. gentlemen below the gangway; they did not blush to get up and repeat, as their own, the very doctrines those around him had formerly asserted. Now, let them have no more recrimination (hear, hear); there had been a great deal of sinning on both sides, from the time of the Charles-street Society down to that of the Anti-Corn Law League (hear, hear); the tactics of that society had been only perfected by the agency, agility, and capital of the League; but as it was a bad practice, imitated from each other, let them put an end to it; it was a practice detrimental not to party alone, but to all representative Government and the best interests of the country. He believed they would find in the bill of the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) an attempt to remedy this abuse, and as it was the fashion to adopt their measures on the other side (hear, hear), he could not recommend a better course than to adopt that measure and put an end to the evil.

Lord INGESTRE perfectly concurred in the observations of the hon. and learned member for Liskeard; the effects of the abuse were fatal to the constituency at large. He thought a name once placed on the list and properly proved ought to remain there.

Mr. C. WOOD said, the hon. member for Knaresborough had complained of the objections served in the West Riding of Yorkshire, but the hon. member had been himself as great a sinner in this way as any one (hear, hear). On one occasion a great number of notices of objections were sent, signed by the hon. member himself (hear, hear), and one of them was delivered to his own uncle (hear, hear, hear, and laughter) whom he knew to have as good a vote as any one in the West Riding.

Mr. FERRAND.—When?

Mr. C. WOOD could not say in what year; did it signify in what year it was? The fact was so, and he did not suppose the hon. gentleman would deny it, for an hon. gentleman was present to whom a notice was sent, signed by the hon. member (hear, hear). He thought the hon. member should be more cautious in the accusations he brought against others. With regard to the West Riding, it was not true that the objections were made by the Anti-Corn Law League; there were registration societies in that district, conducted by respectable men, belonging to both parties, and they made the objections and defended them. The system of registration had become such, that it could only be worked by such bodies; a single voter could not defend his franchise unless he belonged to one or other of the great parties. This was a great practical grievance which called for a remedy.

Mr. FERRAND begged the indulgence of the house while he replied to the personal attack just made on him by the hon. member. When the hon. member talked of what took place several years ago, he should have said that he had just been prompted by some one within the last half-minute; the hon. gentleman would not deny that.

Mr. C. WOOD: I do deny it most distinctly (hear, hear).

Mr. FERRAND: The hon. gentleman had insinuated that he had been objector-general to votes in the West Riding; that he had made objections to a great number of votes. In that division he was, as chairman of the Registration Committee, called upon, and he did sign notices of objection; but at all times when doing so he had stated distinctly, that nothing should induce him to be a party to the objecting to votes unless good grounds were shown for the proceeding. He had objected to the vote of the hon. member for Bradford, his (Mr. Ferrand's) relative, and he had done so for this reason—that a person for three years in succession had objected to his (Mr. Ferrand's) vote, had received a silver teapot for his services, towards the payment of which his relative had been a subscriber (Great laughter). He (Mr. Ferrand) had then, incensed at this, declared that if he received in the fourth year another objection, he would, in retaliation, object to his relative's qualification (laughter). It was on that ground alone that he had so acted, and he considered that he was fully justified (hear, hear, and laughter).

Mr. WORTLEY was enabled, fully, to confirm the statements of the hon. member for Halifax touching the system which was being carried on in the West Riding of Yorkshire. He (Mr. Wortley) had his own vote objected to three years running; on the last occasion, the notice being signed by a person bearing the name of Ashworth, and coming from Manchester, and emanating, it might therefore be concluded, from the Anti-Corn Law League. ("No, no," from Mr. Bright and others). So totally unjustified, and so vexatious were these notices, that he had at last threatened to bring an action against the interfering parties to recover the costs of defence, and if he had not himself been a member of the bar, such was the course which he would have adopted. It would give him great pleasure to see an end put to the system and facilities given to recover the expenses of the defensive litigation. In dealing with the matter, the house should not lose sight of the subject of the creation of votes (hear, hear). The West Riding had recently been the scene of an experiment in that way, and it had been so far successful, that by the means of the Anti-Corn Law League some 2000 new votes had been added to the previously existing registration. Were these, as he did not say they were not, bona fide votes, there could be no dissatisfaction, but the prevailing opinion in the district affected he could assure the house was, that directly the reverse was the fact. Such a case as this had been, it was rumoured, of frequent occurrence. A gentleman, having influence over a body of workmen, and who lets cottages to them to rent, persuaded them to enter conjointly into the purchase of a covenant, the agent of the Anti-Corn Law League being called upon to negotiate the transaction; the proprietor of the cottages lent the necessary funds to the workmen, took a promissory note for the payment, and stopped the interest from the weekly wages. Such a system as that could not be got in the revising barrister's court, or at any rate not without extreme difficulty. To the truth, however, of the report, he was far from wishing it to be understood that he pledged himself.

Mr. BRIGHT desired to assure the hon. member for Bute-shire (Mr. Wortley), that Mr. Ashworth, of the Anti-Corn-Law League, had taken no part in the signature of the objection which it was mentioned had been received by the hon. member. With respect to the creation of freeholds, he (Mr. Bright) was enabled with equal confidence to declare that the Anti-Corn-Law League had not only never recommended the creation of such votes in the way alluded to, but had consistently, both in the speeches of its lecturers and in its authorised writings, given the public to understand that such votes were untenable, unjust, and in defiance of every fair principle of registration founded upon the possession of property (hear, hear, hear). He knew of no instance of such a vote having been obtained through or with the approbation of the Anti-Corn Law League. The advice of the League always had been, and still was, with the view of inducing every man to save as much money as would qualify him, by a bona fide purchase of a sufficient amount of property; and he (Mr. Bright) defied any man in the house or elsewhere, who cared for the spirit of the institutions of the country, so far as these were valuable, to say that a freehold, possessed on that principle, was injurious, or could, in any degree, be interfered with (loud cries of "hear, hear"). It was refreshing to see that when hon. gentlemen opposite were in extremis as to the Corn Law, they found some consolation for that which was gone and passed away in a testy examination of the organisation of the League. The case which the hon. member for Warwickshire spoke of had been dealt with in the newspapers, and had even been dilated upon in the speeches of the hon. member; but since that, the hon. gentleman, either at Willis's Rooms, or at 17, Old Bond-street, had joined in the adoption of a resolution, by which the protectionists declared that they would fight the League with its own weapons (laughter). The hon. member for Knaresborough, with not an unusual lack of caution, had made a statement relative to the West Riding. He (Mr. Bright) could only say, that if the hon. gentleman went to the proper offices, and consulted the proper papers of the registration for the West Riding, of protectionists and Free Traders, he would find, that in the last year the monopolists made a far larger number of objections to Free Traders, than the Free Traders did to monopolists. [Mr. Ferrand.—What did they do the year before?] The hon. member could not deny that. He (Mr. Bright) had once been called from Northumberland and once from Scotland to defend his vote. The agricultural party had well obeyed the injunction of the right hon. baronet to register. As had been said by the hon. member for Shrewsbury, "How we did register!" (laughter)—and how could they find fault with the League for acting in self-defence (hear, hear)? He had been told that the other day a noble duke, through his agent, put four sons of a farmer, with the farmer himself, into one lease, with the object of gaining so many more votes; and he had also heard that in Scotland another noble duke had taken the means to give nineteen persons the power of voting on one farm. So long as the monopolists were fighting a battle against the country, and so long as they thought there was a chance of obtaining power, there was nothing which went against the spirit of registration which they would not do—no conduct too unscrupulous they would not practise. Now the tables were turned, and the game was up (hear, hear, and cries of "Oh!") They had warred against the general interests and common sense, and now they were a broken party. The Free Traders, on the contrary, were a compact body, with an invincible principle which they were determined should be the basis of legislation, and to secure the presence of a majority in the house to vote for the abolition of the Corn Law, there were no means which the law allowed, and which justice sanctioned that should be left untried (hear, hear). They had made up their minds to do that, but they would go with the Government in any proposition to give the proper advantages and defence to the honest elector. By every new change which was to make the system a better system the Free Traders would gain. Hon. gentlemen might seek to revenge themselves on the League, but the fact had gone forth to the world that the law was as good as dead, and not all the spee-ches they could muster—not even those of the hon. member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), solemn as they were, would ever wake from the grave that which, with all due ritual, had been buried (laughter).

Mr. S. O'BRIEN regretted that anything had occurred to disturb the celestial serenity of the hon. member who had just spoken (laughter). The evil to which attention was being drawn was a plain one, and should be dealt with. None could deny the existence of an extensive association, with enormous funds at its command, one of the great objects of which was systematically to interfere in the registration of every county in the kingdom. The effect was to marshal every county into two parties—to fight the battle of registration by subscription—and to injure most deeply, as a necessary consequence, those who were unwilling to go to extreme lengths, either on one side or the other, in politics (hear). The matter was not introduced at the present moment, because, as the hon. member had facetiously said, the Corn Law was dead, but they brought it forward to the notice of the house because they saw an association, a vast money-power, such as he had described, interfering in an unconstitutional manner with constitutional rights, and which was either to be left to its evil operation, or to be effectually encountered, to be met by a similar association, thus perpetuating a similar evil (hear, hear). They asked the house to decide the case between them. That was the question before them. As to the resolution passed at Willis's rooms, he had not heard any hon. gentleman on that (the ministerial) side of the house, propose or approve of the adoption of any such system as the creation of false votes (hear, hear). The contest was unfair; on the one side an enormous money power at work, and on the other no such thing (hear, hear).

Mr. E. ELLICE, Jun., understood hon. gentlemen opposite to complain not that it was necessary a battle should be fought, but that the weapons provided were unequal (hear, hear). In the county with which he was connected, the system condemned so loudly existed in full force, but practised by the party in whom the complaint originated. There a Conservative registration association was formed by all the county men, the end sought after being to destroy, as far as was possible, the preponderating power of the reformers,—a wealthy party attempting to suppress freedom of opinion in the district boroughs, which were composed of the poorer classes (hear, hear). The evil was in Scotland incalculable, for unless assistance was afforded to the poor voters to go 20 miles to the Sheriff's Court, and defend his qualification, his name was struck off the list. If the hon. member for Bute-shire doubted the existence of fictitious votes, he had only to examine the evidence taken before a committee of the house, asked for some years ago by the hon. member for Cokermouth (Mr. Horsman), to convince himself of the fact being as had been stated. It would give him (Mr. Ellice) great gratification to see a corrective measure emanate from the Government.

Mr. BORTHWICK thought that an interference with the registration, in the manner in which the League interfered, could have but one object; that object was, most unquestionably, unconstitutional, and justice demanded that a check should be given to the system. If the electoral body were left alone, its opinions would be more clearly expressed; as it at present was, an unnatural amount of opinion on the wrong side was induced (laughter).

Mr. O'CONNELL wished to say one word only—one word for Ireland (hear, hear). He understood the complaint was that frivolous and vexatious notices of objections were served, necessitating the taking of long journeys by the bona fide voters, for the purpose of proving the qualification. Now in Ireland, by the Irish law, it was not necessary to serve such objections, for every voter must go and state his case without any notice whatever. He must travel 20 miles, and in the county which he (Mr. O'Connell) represented, 50, to put his case on record, and if he failed to attend and personally prove his qualification, he could not exercise his right to vote. There was no necessity for any notice of objection; if any body questioned the vote, the case must be heard to the satisfaction of that individual.

Mr. FERRAND.—Is that annually?

Mr. O'CONNELL.—No, not annually; and that was another grievance; for the consequence of the registration system in Ireland was to afford facilities to the committing of fraud; so that the thing was worse. In the county which he represented, in three or four populous parishes there was not a man who could register a vote without travelling fifty miles or more, first, as in a case of ejection, to substantiate his right. And what was the result? He represented a county with a population of 735,000, and only 2300 were on the registry. He stated these things as useful to know in an inquiry. They were evils which, years ago, he had urged in vain to gentlemen on his side of the house. He was not aware if he might entertain a hope of meeting with better success from the powerful party (laughter) on the opposite side; but, if not, he would content himself with having exposed what was, practically, a grievance (hear, hear).

Mr. M. MILNES said, he should not have risen but for the assumption of the hon. member for Liskeard (Mr. C. Buller), who had attempted to lay down the position that the guilt had been equal on both sides of the house, or, if possible, greater on his (Mr. Milnes's) side. This position he disputed. If the protectionist party had chosen to avail themselves of such means, they could have beaten the Anti-Corn-Law League out of the field. One nobleman, in the county in which he lived (Lord Harewood), alone could have done so. But he rejoiced that the laudroids of England had never encouraged so unworthy a practice. The true spirit of the constitution, as to county registration, did imply residence; and he could only say that, if the large sums collected by the Anti-Corn-Law League were devoted to the sole purpose of enabling the farmers of England to give Anti Corn Law votes, it would prove rather an expensive proceeding; it would be difficult for the League to accomplish this object by their half million or quarter of a million of money. It was alleged that this money was to be spent only in facilitating the obtaining of votes. They all knew what facilitating votes was; that it could not be certain that the agents appointed throughout the country would carry on their operations in a legal way; and how the 2000 votes, could have been added to the register of the West Riding of Yorkshire by a fair means he could not understand. He trusted that a remedy for this evil would be provided by the legislature, for in his opinion it was only by a legislative proceeding that any good could be done, and he thought the proposition of his honourable friend the member for Staffordshire would rather embarrass than lead to any good result.

Lord J. RUSSELL said, he had always thought that the serving of hundreds of objections to votes, without inquiring whether there was a ground of objection or not, was a very great abuse, and some years ago he had introduced a bill into the house, providing, as he thought, a remedy—that, wherever an unsuccessful objection was twice made to a vote before the registration court, that vote should not be liable to be again questioned, unless some alteration had been made,—as that the amount had been diminished, or the freehold had been parted with. That was his remedy, and he considered that it was an abuse which ought to be remedied by Parliament. He did not see that it made any difference whether this was done by the Anti-Corn-Law League, or by any other persons. Would hon. gentlemen say that this ought not to be done only because the Anti-Corn-Law League did it. He would not say that this was wrong if done by the Anti-Corn-Law League, and leave it to be done by any other political party. He thought, with the honourable and learned member for Liskeard, that there should be a general remedy, to prevent any party, for any purpose, from interposing vexatious delay and expense, which had the effect of unjustly disfranchising a great number of voters. The hon. and learned member for Bute (Mr. S. Wortley) had alluded to the creation of fictitious votes, and he (Lord J. Russell) believed the practice prevailed nowhere to a greater extent than in Scotland, where men not worth 5s. a year in land voted as if possessed of 10l. a year, and many elections had been carried by such votes, and not by the property in the county. That was a practice which ought to be corrected, and he hoped that whatever remedy should be applied would be a general remedy, and not for any particular purpose, or directed against any particular body. As to parties being encouraged by the Anti-Corn-Law League to purchase freeholds, and to become voters, if, as the hon. member for Bute stated, in Yorkshire, men who had no real property in the county had votes, that was a fraud, and ought to be stopped; but, on the other hand, if a man gained 50l. or 60l. by his own industry, and chose, at the instigation of the Anti-Corn-Law League, or any other body of men, to purchase land, and established his right to a vote, he (Lord J. Russell) said that such a vote was as good as any other (hear). The honourable member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) had said that freehold votes implied residence; but he (Lord John Russell) denied this, and the right hon. baronet would recollect that, in considering all the points which arose in the discussion on the Reform Bill, that point was well considered, and it was deliberately determined that the right of non-resident voting had been exercised at all times, and he (Lord John Russell) was always opposed to any plan for disfranchising non-resident voters.

Mr. M. MILNES, in explanation, said he had not denied the right of non-residents to vote, but had said that it was not a constitutional exercise of the franchise.

Mr. HUME said his vote had been objected to for three successive years. He hoped the time had come when there was a disposition in both parties to look fairly at the subject, and that they might have as many votes as possible who were honestly entitled to the franchise; for he was anxious to create protectionist as well as Free Trade voters. With this view, he hoped that, as the matter was before the house, the Government would bring in a bill, as they had ample evidence before them.

Mr. AGLIONBY said, with respect to the crimination and recrimination upon this subject, he thought one party had been as much to blame as the other. The only question to be considered was, whether they should proceed by inquiry, or by bringing in a bill. He hoped that the admissions made on all sides would preclude the necessity of a committee; both sides seemed anxious that a bill should be brought in. But he warned whoever brought in that bill never to attempt to tamper with the registration, which would not remedy the abuse. Much might be done by simplifying the suffrage, and more by extending the suffrage; they would do little good if they did not largely extend the suffrage, stopping not much short of household suffrage. He agreed with the noble lord, that the moment a created vote was actually made it was as good as any other; but supposing the Anti-Corn Law League—he put the supposition in their case not by way of complaint, but of illustration—supposing that or any other body, with large funds at command, were to employ them in procuring votes to a great extent throughout the kingdom. They did not purchase votes, but they persuaded people to purchase votes; so far, so good; but suppose some great body persuaded people to purchase votes, they would get a set of machines for their own purposes. Their object might be good or bad; he believed the object of the Anti-Corn Law League to be a good one: but if it might be employed for a good purpose, it might be abused for a bad one. Every voter so made would be, pro hac vice, a mere machine in the hands of the makers, for there could be no guarantee. Was it to be believed that a voter so made would immediately turn round (hear)? Any large body, with money, going through the country, employing their funds for a bad purpose, might put a set of tools upon the register (cries of "no, no")—he did not mean to use the word "tools," and he retracted that word; he meant merely to say that such persons would vote as they were desired to vote. He would legalise votes so largely that there could be no motive to create votes.

Lord EBRINGTON rejoiced to hear what had fallen from the honourable member who had just spoken. He had been anxious to state, with reference to the question of the Corn Laws, a burden which fell upon real property. It was necessary that associations should be formed to defray the expenses which offered an impediment to a poor man buying real property, consisting not only of stamps to the revenue, but lawyers' expenses, owing to legal formalities. An association was obliged to be formed to enable a poor man to obtain what all were desirous he should get.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said he begged to withdraw his motion.

The motion was accordingly, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. C. BERKELEY moved that the following members be upon the select committee on the petition from Cheltenham in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws:—Mr. Craven Berkeley, Mr. Bright, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. T. Duncombe, Mr. Ferrand, Mr. R. Colborne, Sir R. H. Inglis, Mr. R. Yorke, Mr. Repton, Mr. M. Gibson, Mr. F. Mackenzie, Mr. C. Villiers, Major Beresford, Lord Worsley, and Mr. Bankes. The hon. member begged the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, who were members of the house, to understand that he was influenced by no motive of hostility to them in moving for this committee. He thought it was a rule, not only in private but in public life, that where fraud or imposition was alleged, it ought to be traced up. Long diatribes had been directed against him, charging him with being actuated in moving for this committee by general hostility towards the honourable member for Durham, because he had moved for a committee on the Game Laws, and other allegations much too contemptible to mention. He utterly denied that he was influenced by hostility to the gentlemen of the League, or to any other person whatever.

Mr. BROTHERTON recollected that another committee, which had done little or no good, had cost the country from 300l. to 400l., and he was afraid that this committee would cause expense without any good whatever.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The house resolved itself into committee of the whole house, Mr. Greene in the chair, and the adjourned debate was resumed.

Mr. G. BANKES said the right honourable baronet had, in a late speech, made an allegation and drawn an inference, in both of which he had reason to believe the right honourable baronet was entirely mistaken. The right honourable baronet had alleged that the honourable member for Somerset (Mr. W. Miles) had said in his place, that he was decidedly in favour of the immediate and entire abolition of the Corn Law in preference to the proposition of the Government. He was not in the house himself at the time when his honourable friend spoke, but hearing that such an inference had been drawn, he asked his honourable friend whether such was the fact, and had been told directly the contrary, and that his honourable friend had not used any words from which such an inference could fairly be drawn. The right honourable baronet proceeded to say that no one of those who sat near the honourable member for Somerset had expressed any dissent from that allegation, but of course they could not have expressed any dissent, if no such allegation was made. His hon. friend was at this time absent, he was happy to say, on account of a joyful occurrence in his family; but with respect to the other absence to which the right hon. baronet did allude, and alluded in the absence of his hon. friend, he was sure the right honourable baronet—who had spoken apparently with some humour as to his having shown the tactics of a skilful leader—would be sorry to hear that it was caused by the death of his nearest relative. He was sure the right honourable baronet was quite unaware of the cause of his honourable friend's absence on the occasion referred to; nor could the right honourable baronet have made the attack on his honourable friend with respect to the part he had taken as to the remission of the duty on grease, if he had remembered all the circumstances of the case. The right honourable baronet said there would be a great advantage to Ireland in the immediate abolition of the Corn Laws. If that were so, he could not understand why the right honourable baronet, when he found such general assent in that house, did not proceed to open the ports at once, and thus secure the means of affording greater relief to Ireland. The right honourable baronet had said that the reason why the ports were not opened in the first instance was, that if they had been he would not have had the power to shut them again. Why the right honourable baronet should have thought he would not have had that power, with such a majority at his back, he (Mr. G. Banks) did not see. But, at all events, if it were really the fact that Ireland would derive so much greater benefit from such a course, why not open the ports now? The honourable member for Wolverhampton said all the corn that might have been entered for consumption had now been re-exported; but he had made inquiries on this subject, and from a letter he had received from a member of one of the most eminent commercial firms, it appeared that the amount of corn in bond on the 5th of January was 1,075,000 quarters, while at the expiration of a month, on the 5th of February, that quantity had been increased by 168,000 quarters, making a total of 1,243,000. The letter further stated, that the arrival of supplies in this country continued, while the shipment to foreign ports was very trifling. He wished to allude to a statement made by the honourable member for Durham in a former debate, to the effect that the Duke of Rutland had paid, for damages done upon 389 acres of land, the enormous sum of 1000*l*. He had the best authority for saying that this was entirely incorrect, and that the sum was really paid for damage done upon a large estate. Last night the noble lord the member for London, when answering some of the allegations of that (the protectionist) side of the house, with respect to the propriety and expediency of passing this measure in the present Parliament, had, by altering the terms of the argument, gained a great advantage, because he had assumed that the protection party had questioned the competency of the house to deal with this subject. Now that was a very different thing. It might be difficult to question the competency of the house, when it appeared in the elementary books of the constitution that Parliament was omnipotent. But the propriety and expediency of a Parliament dealing with a measure for which there was no necessity might very well be questioned, and particularly when there were circumstances which rendered it inexpedient and improper for the existing Parliament to deal with the measure. If the noble lord would take the words as they were spoken, confining them to expediency and propriety, not competency, it was probable that the noble lord himself would not differ in opinion as to the impropriety of a measure like this being carried by a large majority, every one composing which was pledged to the opposite course (loud cheers, and cries of "no, no"). Well, he would give them the odd number between 97 and 112, and perhaps that would be as many as were specifically pledged. The noble lord had alleged that the peers would regard with greater attention a measure passed by the present Parliament; but how that could be, he (Mr. Banks) could not perceive, when the House of Lords were cognisant, by the votes of the Commons, how often they had recorded an opinion adverse to the measure. He could find no valid reason against the dissolution which had been so often demanded; it would appear indecent in the eyes of the country that the measure should be passed by a majority which had changed their opinions, and he trusted the House of Lords would insist upon appealing to the people, to ascertain whether they really and truly desired the measure, upon the ground that they (the Lords) might be sanctioning that which the constituencies of the country might hereafter repudiate. He preferred even the scheme propounded by the Government to the proposal of the honourable member for Wolverhampton, because, before the proposed term of three years should have expired, an appeal to the constituency would be had. For his own part, he should be satisfied when the voice of England had been really and unequivocally declared (hear, hear); but considering the immense majority that had been sent to Parliament against the principle involved in this measure—larger, he believed, than upon any specific question before—he had no reason to suppose that the people had changed their mind—unless, indeed, he was to be guided by the petitions; and the house had already had specimens of the manner in which they were got up (hear, hear). The honourable member concluded by expressing his sense of the importance of the alteration proposed to be made in the law of settlement, which he hoped would very shortly be laid on the table.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said that there was one part of the speech of his honourable friend which had surprised him very much. In the course of the few observations he (Sir Robert Peel) had made the other night, he had assumed that the honourable member for Somerset had intimated the opinion that immediate repeal, if the Corn Laws were to be altered at all—not expressing that opinion abstractedly in favour of repeal, but assuming that the Corn Law was to be extensively altered—was preferable to deferred repeal. He (Sir Robert Peel) had assumed that, first, because he thought he had heard with his own ears the honourable member utter that opinion (hear, hear), and had observed him turn round to honourable gentlemen in his neighbourhood, and receive, as he (Sir R. Peel) thought, their assent. He had assumed this likewise, because he had put that construction upon the speech in the presence of the honourable member for Somerset himself. He (Sir R. Peel) had spoken two nights after the honourable gentleman had put that construction upon his words, and the honourable member permitted him to do so without dissenting in the slightest degree from that construction, nor had any other honourable member intimated that there was any mistake in it. Those were the circumstances, and yet he now heard that he had made a complete mistake, for not only had the hon. member for Somerset not expressed his preference for immediate repeal, but was in favour of the Government measure. He owned he had never been in greater error.

Mr. BANKES shortly explained.

Mr. BRIGHT repeated his statement regarding the sum paid by the Duke of Rutland for damage done by game; adding that the estate to which he had alluded was near Bakewell, in Derbyshire, and comprised about 3700 acres.

Mr. C. W. HOWARD shortly expressed his intention to support the Government measure. He had no faith in the predictions of injury to result to the farmers; and he had that reliance upon the skill, industry, and perseverance of those in the north of England, which assured him that they would find in the general prosperity of the country a better protection than any the legislature could give. With respect to the question immediately before the house, he regretted that the right hon. gentleman had not taken the advice of the noble lord, for he thought that farmers had now had sufficient experience of attempts to raise their prices, and that there never was a time more favourable for the repeal of the Corn Laws (hear, hear).

SIR JOHN HAMMER strongly deprecated the protraction of the debate, as being most prejudicial to the country (hear, hear). If he could look upon the question purely abstractedly, his vote would be for total and immediate repeal; but he was bound to look at the practical position of the Government in dealing with the subject; and therefore, although his constituents were most anxious for total repeal, and he had presented petitions from the town he represented, from their town council and chamber of commerce, for that measure, he felt it right to dissent from them in this respect, and he should give his cordial support to the Government (hear, hear).

Mr. MOFFATT said he had no explanations to give, having been recently sent to that house to support every relaxation in the Corn Law. He warned the protectionists against the course they were taking in delaying this question, as being detrimental to their own interests as well as those of commerce. Let them look at the corn markets of the kingdom, and they would see everything now paralysed, and a vast amount of capital locked up. He put it to them if they were acting wisely.

Mr. FINCH did not mean to say that he approved of the Government proposal, but he preferred it to that of the hon. member for Wolverhampton, for he would, at least, maintain the three years' modicum of protection, for if during that time any great distress should occur, the legislature would have the opportunity of retracing their steps. He contended that under the protective system the agricultural interests had prospered to a most remarkable extent in this country, and that the practice and science of agriculture had of late years progressed to an unexampled degree. He ventured to assert, and he said it advisedly, that in the whole world there was no other country so well cultivated as England (hear, hear). The English breed of cattle was decidedly the best in Europe, as was attested by the fact that the agricultural societies of Belgium, Prussia, and France were continually in the habit of sending over to this country for animals to improve their own stock; and our soil was tilled with a degree of taste, science, and skill, no parallel to which was to be found in other lands (hear, hear). All this was the work of the industrious tenant farmers of England; and he must say that he thought it was a little too hard that not only were their interests to be disregarded, but that their reputation should be run away with as it had been by honourable members on the other side of the house, and that they should be spoken of as though they were nothing better than lazy drones (hear, hear, hear). With respect to the contemplated abolition of the protective system, he would convey his opinion of it in a very few words, by observing that he regarded it as the most ruinous measure that had ever been introduced into that house. Its consequences would prove to be most disastrous to the farmers; for let hon. gentlemen disguise the fact as they might, there could be no doubt but that the immediate and inevitable result would be to throw our ports open for such an inundation of foreign corn as would completely glut the market, and render it impossible for the home grower to enter into competition with the farmers of the Continent (hear, hear). He regarded the ministerial scheme as objectionable enough in all conscience, but he was yet more strenuously opposed to the proposition of the honourable member for Wolverhampton. The indecent haste with which, even under the ministerial system of proceeding, they were hurrying the measure for the abolition of the Corn Laws through the house, had already excited the indignation of the country (loud laughter); but if the honourable member's motion for immediate repeal were carried, the consequences would be yet more calamitous, and the indignation of the country still greater. What a moment they had chosen to propose this measure, when the question of peace or war with America was trembling in the balance ("hear, hear," from the protectionists). When it was important to secure the loyalty of the Canadian people, they treated them with injustice and contumely; and it would not be surprising if they should exhibit towards this country a measure of indignation greater even than that expressed by the insulted British agriculturists (cheers from the protectionists). He complained of the manner in which this measure had been hurried on. He conceived that, in the first instance, they should have the financial statement laid before them. From the language held by the right honourable baronet in former times, it was to be expected by the agriculturists, if a change of this kind took place, that the malt tax would be abolished (hear, hear). It was desirable, therefore, to see the financial statement, to ascertain whether these hopes could be realised (hear). If compensation to the extent of 500,000*l*. was to be given to the agriculturists—if 500,000*l*. were to be voted to the navy—if money was to be granted for Ireland, and about half a million more for other purposes—he did not think, when they came to wind up the accounts of the next quarter, there would be a surplus of two and a half millions of revenue over expenditure. Therefore, there was a greater chance that there would be an increase of taxation at the end of three years, than that an expectation could be held out that the malt tax would be taken off ("hear, hear," from the protectionists). It should be recollected that they were in a precarious state with regard to America, and he conceived it to be one of the maddest schemes that ever was thought of to propose to open the ports and establish a Free Trade with the chance of a war taxation (hear, hear, from the protectionists). The consequence would be that they would have a ten per cent. property-tax, a house-tax, and a beer-tax (hear). However, if a measure of the kind were to be passed, he would prefer the measure as brought forward by the right hon. baronet to the measure proposed by the amendment (hear, hear).

Mr. WARD was understood to say, that not one syllable of the speech of the honourable gentleman who had just sat down, with the exception of the last sentence, bore on the question before the house (laughter). This was particularly hard on the house. The hon. gentleman had an opportunity of being heard in the course of the debate; but it would seem that he then forgot one-half of his arguments, that the other half occurred to him afterwards, and that he took this opportunity of inflicting it upon the house (laughter). Some of the honourable gentleman's commercial principles were so untenable and so unsound, that it was impossible to avoid giving them a reply; but in referring to them, he (Mr. Ward) should abstain as much as possible from going at present into any other part of the subject. When the honourable gentleman talked of the repeal of the malt tax as a boon to the agricultural interest, let it be recollected that ninety-nine parts of a hundred of that tax were paid by the consumer at present. But if they repealed the malt-tax, they must substitute a property-tax, and let them recollect how much of that would go out of the pocket of the farmers ("hear, hear," from the Opposition.) Yet that was one of the boons that the farmers' friends wished to confer on them (cheers from the Opposition). There was a Spanish proverb, "God preserve me from my friends;" and it might be said by the farmers, God preserve us from the friendship of the honourable gentlemen who talked of the repeal of the malt tax as a boon to us (Opposition cheers and laughter). The honourable gentleman had said that this Parliament was utterly incompetent to decide this question. Now, what the Reform Bill did for the rotten boroughs the present measure would do for the Corn Laws. There was, however, this difference between them; for six years this question has been discussed; now facts were every day forcing themselves upon the common sense of both sides of the house, leaving the Parliament free to legislate on this subject (hear). He (Mr. Ward) would now come to the question of his honourable friend (Mr. Villiers), and he would confess that he never gave a vote on any subject with more difficulty and doubt than he felt on this subject. He entirely concurred in every word of the wise and statesmanlike speech that was delivered on the preceding night by his noble friend the member for London (Lord John Russell). If he (Mr. Ward) thought that his vote would endanger the present bill, or that by giving it he would run any risk of depriving the country of the great benefit which had been placed within its reach by the measure of the Government, he would not vote for his honourable friend's amendment (cries of hear, hear, hear). He told him in the first instance, if the right honourable baronet said he would be no longer responsible for the success of the measure if an amendment of this sort for immediate repeal were carried, he (Mr. Ward) would, for one, take the measure of the Government. He had no sort of influence pressing on him from outside, for his constituents were satisfied with the measure which the Government had proposed, and were anxious to see it carried out. But he (Mr. Ward) formed his opinion solely on grounds that had presented themselves to him in that house. If he saw, on the part of honourable gentlemen opposite, the slightest disposition to meet on a middle ground, and not to carry on the most factious opposition that he had ever seen during his experience in that house (hear, hear, from the Opposition)—if he saw any intention on their part to regard the decision of the other night as a final decision on this subject, then he would say he would give the measure of the Government all the support he could. But when he looked to the conduct of the honourable members opposite, he found a justification for voting for the amendment of his honourable friend (Mr. Villiers), for he saw they looked upon the decision of the house as nothing, and that they would be satisfied with nothing less than a fresh appeal to the constituencies (hear, hear, hear). Had those who concurred with his honourable friend any right to abandon one half of the position they now occupied when such extreme opinions were urged by gentlemen on the opposite side of the house (hear, hear)? When they said that for three years this was to be the constant theme of agitation, and that nothing but an appeal to the constituencies would satisfy them, those who concurred with his honourable friend (Mr. Villiers) were bound to keep the ground they had at present (cheers from the Opposition). And though his (Mr. Ward's) noble friend, the member for London, acting on a high and honourable feeling, felt himself bound, after what had passed with an august personage, to take the Government measure in preference to any other, he (Mr. Ward) held that, as an independent member of that house, who concurred with the Anti-Corn-Law League, and thought they had done inestimable service to the country—he was equally bound to follow his honourable friend (Mr. Villiers) in the course he proposed to take to make the repeal immediate (cheers). He (Mr. Ward) did not pass the whole week in that house. He passed a portion of the week in a less heated atmosphere than he breathed there. He mixed with men in the country who had nothing to do with their party questions, and he could say that the tenant farmers in many parts of England—men who differed with him for the last 10 years on this question of protection—were now all rejoicing at the largeness of the majority by which the question was decided; for they said they hoped this would settle it (hear, hear). They said they trusted they would not have an agitation kept up for three years—that they would not have to endure that protracted uncertainty, but that they would be looking—not to a dissolution, or to a new battle to be fought—but to Michaelmas next, like practical sober men as they are, to enter into new arrangements with their landlords to meet the new state of things that had arisen from the proceedings in that house (cheers from the Opposition). That was the general feeling that prevailed almost everywhere through the country, amongst men who were not tainted by the atmosphere they breathed in that house, who did not spend their time in clubs discussing those questions, or in ransacking Hansard for quotations from speeches, to prove a thing that was admitted, that the opinions of public men on the Corn Laws had undergone a change (hear). It was said by some of the honourable gentlemen opposite, "If we are to have the repeal, let us have it at once." A great many of them said so; he had the pleasure to hear that opinion generally expressed; but "a change came o'er the spirit of their dream" (laughter), and they did not now recollect the sentiments they had expressed but a few weeks ago (loud cries of "hear, hear"). If they would consult their own interests, get rid of the party feeling that influenced them, and look at the question in a plain and practical point of view, they would see that the worst service they could do themselves, as landowners, was to keep this question open (hear, hear). By doing so they had been literally cutting their own throats, and the result would prove that those with whom he (Mr. Ward) acted were right, and that the gentlemen opposite were wrong. Let honourable gentlemen opposite remember, that in all their future arrangements with their tenants their own speeches would be quoted against them (laughter and cheers from the Opposition). For instance, their tenantry might hereafter say to the members for South Durham and Somersetshire, and to other honourable members—"You told us that we should be all destroyed; root and branch, that we had no chance of competing with the Poles, and other foreigners—that English capital and science would go for nothing—how then can you expect men to enter upon a competition which you yourselves proclaim to be so unfair that the race is decided before it is run" (hear, hear). From his (Mr. Ward's) experience, he felt convinced that the people were inclined to say let bygones be bygones; and were desirous to have this question settled without any unnecessary or protracted delay (hear, hear). That was the plain question on which they had to give their votes, and that was the ground on which he would give his vote in favour of his honourable friend's amendment. He did not think he risked the measure of the Government by giving that vote. If he thought so, he would vote in favour of the Government measure, for he thought it would be a great boon; but it would better answer its own ends if it at once came into operation (hear, hear). He, therefore, would record his opinion in favour of the amendment of his hon. friend (cheers).

Mr. LIDDELL said, the two grounds on which the proposition of the honourable member for Wolverhampton were sustained were these:—first, that there was an impending famine in Ireland, and that an additional supply of food was necessary for that country; and secondly, that considering the state of the corn in the whole universe, and that no superfluity of corn existed anywhere, and also considering the failure of the potato crop, and that the price of the Continental market was more equalised with the market in this country than at any other period, it was a safer thing now on the part of the agricultural interest to consent to the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws than to wait for three years, when they would have greater difficulties to contend with, and when greater preparation would be made in the foreign market to send in supplies of corn to this country. Now, with regard to the question of the alleged impending famine in Ireland, he (Mr. Liddell) said, for himself, and he might say the same thing for those who surrounded him, that if the Government came forward and said it was necessary to provide against that danger, the gentlemen on his side of the house would have no objection to suspend the Corn Law, for the purpose of removing that danger (hear, hear, hear). He was sure they would consent to any modification or suspension of the law that would have the effect of removing evils of so disastrous a nature as were said to be apprehended in Ireland; but the Government, on whom the responsibility rested, had taken a different view of the subject, and they had not called for the suspension of the law or the immediate repeal of the law on any such ground (hear, hear). They considered, no doubt, that in calling for a supply of public money to be expended on public works in Ireland, and taking the measures they had adopted to give an additional supply of food to the people of that country, they had done their best to guard against the impending evil (hear, hear, hear). He could not consent to an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws from any apprehension of the danger of famine in Ireland. With regard to the second point, as to the deficiency of a supply of corn in the Continental markets, and the assimilation of prices which now existed in the markets of this country and the Continent, he would only say that this point, considered by itself on this narrow ground, would, per se, be a strong argument in favour of the motion of the honourable member for Wolverhampton. This consideration, however, no doubt received the attention of her Majesty's Government, because they adopted their present proposition of moderate protection. But no one would tell him that they could not get a large supply from those countries at low prices in average years. He had been informed that they could get as much wheat shipped from the Baltic at the lowest possible freights, and, as an instance of this, he had been informed that wheat had been conveyed from Bremen to Newcastle at a shilling a quarter (a cry of "No"). He had this from unquestionable authority, and he was satisfied that the statement was true. The reason of this low charge of freight was, that coal was taken out to the Baltic, and wheat was brought in return, rather than let the ship return in ballast. He did not attempt to derive any important consequence from this, but he merely stated it as a fact. Under all the circumstances of the case, he thought that it was proper that before repeal there should be two or three years experience as to what would be the character of the foreign corn trade, so that ample opportunities would be afforded of making arrangements between landlords and tenants, and above all for the sake of those of the latter class holding leases. He should also oppose the amendment, as the Government proposition appeared to adhere more nearly than that did to the principle of protection.

Mr. HUTT wished to correct a geographical error into which his honourable friend had fallen. His honourable friend stated that Bremen was on the Baltic, whereas it was much nearer to this country.

An Hon. Member on the protectionist bench asked where it was.

Mr. HUTT replied, that if he was rightly informed Bremen was situated on the Elbe, which fell, not into the Baltic, but into the North Sea or German Ocean. If such a proceeding as had been referred to had taken place, the ship must have been on a voyage of discovery, and was glad to take in any cargo. He must, therefore, congratulate his hon. friend on the discovery of a mare's nest.

Mr. PETER BORTHWICK was anxious that this debate should be protracted, as he wished to hear more reasons from the Treasury bench than he had hitherto heard, which operated to induce the Government to make such a great change. He had the authority of Mr. McCulloch, in his work on taxation, published in the year 1845, for stating that the injurious influence of the Corn Laws had been most stupidly and factiously exaggerated. Before hon. gentlemen had asked him to agree with them in favour of Free Trade, they should have shown him that other countries with which Free Trade was proposed to be established were as heavily taxed as England. It was said that the principle of Free Trade was common sense, but while he admitted that such was the case in the abstract, he felt that this country was placed in such a highly artificial state that such abstract principles could not be made applicable to her. The trade of Great Britain stood shackled on the right hand by domestic taxation, and on the left by foreign tariffs. There never was a grosser insult to the doctrines of Free Trade than the assertion that the abolition of protective duties by England under her peculiar circumstances, while they were maintained by other European nations, was deserving of that name. He would rather be convinced by one year's practical experience, than by all the arguments which he had heard from the right hon. baronet, and he would therefore have given his support to the Government if the proposition had been an immediate but temporary opening of the ports to meet the distress existing in Ireland. The hon. member for Stockport had told them (the protectionists) to study political economy, but he found that there was not a single writer on that science who sanctioned the present policy of the Free Traders. They all agreed with the noble lord the member for the city of London, that it was absolutely necessary for every sound and wise government to sustain a preponderating influence in favour of land. Absolute Free Trade was a dogma of the Anti-Corn-Law League alone, and until some other authority was shown to him in its favour, he should decline recording his vote in favour of it.

Mr. HUME, amidst some cries for a division, said he must say a few words in reply to the honourable member who had just sat down. The honourable member for Durham (Mr. Bright) had congratulated himself that protection was dead and buried; but it seemed to have risen again, not exactly like a giant refreshed, in the person of the honourable member for Evesham (laughter). That honourable member, amongst many other curious observations, had said that not one of the writers upon political economy, had written upon the policy of the right hon. baronet. How the deuce could they write upon it (laughter)? The right hon. baronet, much to his (Mr. Hume's) satisfaction had come forward with a most comprehensive plan, and he did not at all wonder that the honourable member had not been able to find in his library (a laugh) any authority upon the subject. Protection, said the honourable member, was considered robbery by no one. He (Mr. Hume) asserted that protection was robbery; and that the landed interest would never have been able to have imposed additional and unnatural prices upon the food of all the other classes in the state, if the House of Commons had not formerly been composed of agricultural proprietors (hear, hear). Until a few years ago no individual could sit in that house unless he had a qualification in land; and it was not to be wondered at that agricultural proprietors should have established the doctrine when the power was exclusively in their own hands. This, however, was not the question. The question was, whether the laws of this country should be equal, and whether there was any justice in permitting one class—those who possessed the land—to tax all the other classes. This was the effect of protection; and therefore he denied the justice of protection. The whole object of the right honourable baronet's policy was to remove this injustice, and to give to all classes equal rights with regard to food. This measure would not lower prices, but it would equalise them all over Europe. Ninety years ago, when the ports of Holland were free, the average price of wheat was upwards of 47s. 6d., from which there was not much, if any, variation in England. He had a right to expect that as improvements took place, prices throughout the world would be cheaper; and why should not England be placed in the same situation? He did not believe they would fall more in England than elsewhere, and he was certain we should have our food at the same prices as other countries. And why should we not? Was it just to see every year fifty millions of exports, created by our artisans, and those artisans obliged to pay higher prices for their provisions than those of any other country in the world whose products came into competition with theirs in foreign markets? The artisans of England, of France, of Belgium, and of America, would, by this measure, be placed as nearly as possible upon the same footing as regarded food. The labour of our workmen, therefore, would find its reward in neutral markets: thus the country would be benefited, whilst our artisans would not suffer from inequalities in the price of food (hear, hear). The late debate had exhibited, as it appeared to him, an amount of selfishness which he did not suppose to exist among gentlemen on the opposite benches. The house had heard of nothing from them but an anxiety for the landed interest, as if they paid all the taxes necessary for the support of Government, whilst they paid only a fraction. But he would ask whether it was becoming in them to wish to put their hands into the pockets of every other class, which he contended they did. He might be told that this was an unfair statement; but he was prepared to support it. The income tax of five millions annually was assessed upon 200 millions of property. Of those 200 millions, the whole land of England was assessed at only 32 millions, manufactures at 41 millions, and trade at 50 millions. Yet, although the land was assessed at less than trade or manufactures, the claim was made that all the other interests should pay to it a higher price for their food. He would now come to the immediate question, as to how he should vote, this evening. He looked upon the measure of the right hon. baronet as a comprehensive scheme. It was not confined to corn, but it embraced the whole tariff, except a few articles. It was a greater, more extensive, and more useful scheme than he had anticipated, and he was not willing to risk, in any way, its failure. He had, therefore, determined to vote with the right hon. baronet, whose measure he would take now, and see how much more he could get afterwards (derisive cheers from the protectionists). He advised his hon. friends near him to adopt the language which was used when the Reform Bill was before that house, and take the measure, the whole measure, and nothing but the measure (hear, hear). He was sorry he could not on this occasion vote for the amendment, but he should not be considered the less a Free Trader, for he had supported every proposition made for the abolition of the Corn Laws. He still believed also that total and immediate repeal would be the best course in every way; but fearing that any attempt at interference might risk the whole arrangement, he should give his support to the measure proposed by the right hon. baronet.

Lord G. BENTINCK said the honourable gentleman (Mr. Hume) had asserted the landed interest could not be content with their fair share in the Government of the country. If they had their fair share of it, there would be very little doubt how the measure now under discussion would go in that house (protectionist cheers). If the honourable member meant to say the landed interest wished not to bear their share of the burdens of the country, he (Lord George Bentinck) could easily show that so far from not bearing their fair share of the taxes, they bore a much larger proportion than their fair share (cheers from the protectionist benches). The honourable member said the landed interest was assessed to the income-tax at 32 millions. He (Lord G. Bentinck) believed it was assessed at more, and that 37 millions was the amount. Then it paid fifty-two hundredths of all the poor rates, whilst the others paid but forty-two hundredths. With regard to the motion now before the house, whether they should consent to an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, or accept the proposal of her Majesty's Government, he took leave to say that his honourable friends around him had been much misapprehended on this subject. It had been alleged that his honourable friend (Mr. Miles) had stated on behalf of the agricultural interest, that the farmers of England would prefer an immediate repeal to a repeal in three years, as proposed by the right honourable baronet. This was correct, but his hon. friends did not consider repeal quite so certain at the end of three years (cheers from the protectionists). They might receive "a heavy blow and great discouragement" in the desertion of their leaders. They had been told by the noble lord (Lord John Russell) that if he had accepted the Government, he would have been in a minority of 40. He could assure his noble friend that he (Lord G. Bentinck) cordially concurred in the accuracy of that statement, for being in London during the short interregnum which had occurred, he must say that this was just the sort of sentiment of many gentlemen who voted differently now, whose support his noble friend would not have received. And, perhaps, if the country were appealed to now, gentlemen would be returned of the same mind as when her Majesty made the appeal in 1841 (protectionist cheers). They (the protectionists) had received a check, and had been repulsed for a moment, but they did not think themselves half beaten yet. Napoleon used to say the English army never knew when it was beaten; and he (Lord George Bentinck) trusted the same result would be found with his honourable friends (much cheering from the protectionists). It might be through ignorance, but it was still their intention to fight the battle from pillar to post; and if they were defeated again, as they were on Saturday morning, they would retreat and rally their forces (cheers). They would carry this question before the country; they would keep in the minds of the constituencies the manner in which honourable gentlemen round the Treasury bench had discharged the trust reposed in them; and he thought, before they had done, they should drive her Majesty's ministers to have recourse again to the opinions of the people (renewed cheers from the protectionist benches). They did not despair of eventual success (hear, hear); and this was the reason why it was perfectly consistent with the opinions of the farmers and the landed interest of England that it was better to have an immediate repeal than total repeal at the end of three years. They knew that in the interval the members of that house must be returned to the people, and they hoped to restore things to what they were before (protectionist cheers). With respect to the prices of corn, which had been referred to, he would quote a few figures from Porter's tables derived from the Prussian Royal Gazette. For the 18 years, from 1820 to 1837 inclusive, the average price of corn in the ports of Prussia was 25s. a quarter; and if the freight to London was taken at 6s. more, the price would be 31s.; but in the course of that long period there were five consecutive years, from 1833 to 1837, when the average price was but 29s., and five other years, from 1823 to 1827, when the average price was 20s. 1d. (cries of "hear, hear"). These figures (said the noble lord) show that wheat can be imported at a very low price when the Corn Laws are entirely repealed. I have other communications, one from Mr. Taylor, from Yorkshire, who has been 40 years in the corn trade, and whose respectability, I have no doubt, my noble friend opposite (Lord Morpeth) will confirm. He says he has purchased beans at 10s. 6d., oats at 7s. 6d. to 8s., and wheat at from 18s. to 23s. a quarter at Hamburg. Another statement, in confirmation of my honourable friend, the member for Northumberland, is from Mr. Goater, who has been 40 years in the trade (hear). He says he has purchased in Holstein several thousand quarters of good wheat, as fine as could be grown, at prices varying from 18s. to 21s. 6d. Freight was 3s. 6d. a quarter. Taking the highest price at 24s. 6d., it will be clear to the farmers at what sort of price wheat can be brought into competition with his. There is another paper from Norfolk, from Messrs. Reardon and Co. In the very last year they say they purchased 807 quarters in Hainault, at 26s. 4d. Taking all expenses at 6s would give the price here at 32s. 4d.; and that is the price at which, in June last, wheat weighing 62½ lbs. to the bushel was imported into the port of London. If gentlemen will take the trouble to add the present duty of 17s. to the cost of that corn at Mark Lane, they will find the importers can afford to pay the 17s. duty, and clear 14s. profit (cheers from the protectionists, and cries of "no, no," from the Opposition). I challenge any honourable gentleman to disprove that statement. Well, then, is not that a pretty strong proof that, according to the measure introduced by the Government, who think so much of taxing the people, and who pretend that even if the people of Ireland were starving they could not think of coming to this house and asking the people of this country to pay 17s. a quarter on foreign wheat, it is clear into whose hands the difference between a 4s. and a 17s. duty will go (protectionist cheers)? I am going now to refer to a fellow labourer of mine, one of your committee, who, to get up a little diversion (though I can't exactly see what it has to do with the subject), stated the damage paid for by the Duke of Rutland on the score of game. It is right I should inform the house that the witness in question was a Quaker (much laughter). I entertain no disrespect to the order of Quakers; but so great was the aversion of this gentleman to shedding blood, that he went even farther than those gentlemen at Reading, who were disinclined to thank the British army for their services in India (expressions of disapprobation). Though this gentleman admitted the Duke of Rutland to be a kind man, that he would not allow a poor man on his estate to want for anything (protectionist cheers), though he admitted he was a nobleman who could not find it in his heart to turn off a farmer, though he was a bad one, because his ancestors had long been on the estate (renewed cheers)—but still this gentleman had such an aversion to bloodshed, that he could not for the life of him understand what possible delight could be taken in spilling the blood of partridges and pheasants (laughter); and such was his prejudice on the question of damage, that he could not see anything in the true light, for he went the length of saying that the damage done by game, even to meadow land, was 30s. an acre (renewed laughter); and when I took the liberty of cross-examining him I found that the land itself was letting for 25s. an acre (cheers from the protectionists). I can inform the honourable gentleman also, on the authority of my noble friends the sons of the Duke of Rutland, that he was not satisfied with a valuation of 9541. in 1848, and of 9541. in 1841, and having appointed new valuers, they set down the damage at 200l. or 300l. I trust, then, I have answered my fellow labourer in the game committee as to the charge which he brought the other evening (loud cheers from the protectionists).

Mr. COBDEN—The speech of the noble lord illustrates the narrow spirit in which this debate has been conducted; for half of it was consumed in showing how cheap corn would be if the present duty was abolished, and the other half in reference—I believe a disorderly reference—to the proceedings of a committee which has not yet reported (hear, hear). I pass over the very courteous reference to my honourable friend the member for Durham, and I shall say again, what I before urged as to the first part of the noble lord's speech, that those announcements will be received by the people with great exultation, mingled with some indignation at the present amount of injustice which has been practised on them by preventing them hitherto from having the corn they want as cheaply as it could be supplied (Opposition cheers). The noble lord says foreign corn can be imported at 31s. to 32s. a quarter. But he is underbid. The hon. member for Sunderland says he purchased it for 25s. (hear, hear, and a laugh). And I believe there is not a railway navigator who is not now determined that when corn can be imported free of duty he will have all his supplies from the honourable member for Sunderland (much laughter, in which Mr. Hudson joined). Now, Sir, the question before the house is a very narrow one, and I promise not to deviate from the strict discussion of it—it is whether there shall be an immediate repeal of all duties, or whether they should be abolished at the end of three years. Now I would say, in reference to the motion of my honourable friend the member for Wolverhampton, that I think it unfortunate he should have brought it forward at this time; but I believe there is no other way, consistently with the forms of the house, in which it could be brought forward—it must be taken now or not at all (hear, hear). I believe if this discussion had come at a period when the temper of the house was in a better state for calmly considering the proposition, and when those below the gangway are more reconciled to the inevitable passing of the right hon. gentleman's measure—I believe there would be an unanimous feeling in favour of immediate, as contradistinguished from deferred repeal (hear). I don't include amongst those who would receive such a proposition with satisfaction, the land agents. Most of the men paraded at various protection societies as farmers are land agents ("No," from the protectionists). I have paid some attention to your proceedings, and I repeat that the generality of your speakers have been land agents or auctioneers. I have been at meetings in almost every county, and when I have asked one of your professed farmers whether he was not a land agent, the burst of laughter which followed instantly, confirmed my suspicion (hear, hear). Land agents and auctioneers have a sinister interest in delaying the immediate settlement of this question, for from the failures and embarrassments amongst the farmers they derive some of their emoluments. But I challenge any honourable gentleman, who is a representative of farmers in this house, to get up and say that the farmers do not prefer immediate to postponed repeal (cheers). Then what is the ground for resisting this motion put forward by those opposite—that the question is not to be settled by the division we are now about to take? If anything could justify my honourable friend's motion it is the assertion that the battle is not now decided (hear, hear, hear). The noble lord says his party is not thoroughly beaten; that they will keep up the fight from post to pillar, and from pillar to post. The noble lord says that Napoleon exclaimed as to the English, "they know not when they are beaten." But I must remind the noble lord that it is by Englishmen and not Frenchmen that he and his party have now been beaten (much Opposition cheering). This declaration, then, is a strong confirmation of the motion of my honourable friend. What is the object of that motion? That we should keep the same position, the same impregnable position by which we have been enabled to beat, and soundly beat, the noble lord and his party (cheers). The honourable member for Montrose chides us for supporting this motion, and says that we are thereby disuniting our friends. On the contrary, that motion is founded on the bond of our union (cheers). I say this with deference; for no man has more right to speak on this question than my honourable friend the member for Montrose, who fought the battles of Free Trade in this house long before it was the fashion to do so; and I for one can never consent to rob him of the laurels to which he is justly entitled. But I ask him now to say whether the question of Free Trade would ever have occupied the position in this house it now does, if it were not for the Free Trade organisation out of doors (cheers and counter cheers)? The honourable gentleman must have too keen a recollection of the unseemly sounds which greeted his ears when he ventured to utter the name of corn, not to be satisfied that it is only by the powerful organisation, founded on open discussion, out of doors, that the question of the Corn Laws ever obtained a fair hearing in this house. And now, if we depart from the principle which we have hitherto maintained, and which alone has enabled us to hold together, if anything could arise which would have the effect of disbanding and dispersing us, that the people should lose their confidence in those who hitherto guided them, and that that wholesome pressure from without which regulated the views of many in this house, were withdrawn—I ask, if such a state of things were to arise, what chance would there be of your carrying your Free Trade measures to a successful issue (hear, hear, and cheers)? Well, then, my honourable friend is entitled to the thanks of the Free Traders out of doors for having brought forward this motion, and everything which has occurred in the debate has justified his determination. It was already said by the honourable member for Dartmouth that everybody who had spoken approved of the motion. All are about to vote against it—some on one ground, some on another—but not on the ground that we are wrong. Now, I say, when we are right in principle, we can never be wrong in the eyes of the country (loud cheers). The noble lord the member for the city of London takes exception to this motion, because he could not do anything that would endanger the measure of the right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government (hear, hear). In the first place, I don't see there is any such danger, seeing all the gentlemen opposite (the protectionists) are in favour of the retention of the duty for three years, avowedly on the ground that they hope to keep it on in perpetuity or to recover their last protection. Now I beg to ask my friends around me, has the right honourable gentleman given us any guarantee that he will secure his proposal shall pass into a law? I perfectly understand the cautious hint thrown out at an early part of this discussion, that the right hon. gentleman is less able now than he might have been at a former period, to predict what will be the fate of the measure in another place, and if I understand the language of those below the gangway, they look to the rejection of this measure elsewhere. Now, seeing the right hon. gentleman does not and cannot give us any guarantee that the measure will pass into a law, we are not in a position to entertain the question of surrendering up the principle which has united us out of doors, and enabled us to occupy the position in which we now stand (cheers). I admit the measure of Government to be very little inferior in principle to that which we advocate. I will not for one moment attempt to undervalue its importance (cheers). I have stated out of doors what I now repeat, that it gives us 17s. 6d. in the pound, and that we have good security for the other half crown. I said that neither the Free Traders nor their leaders desired the least obstruction to the passing of that measure. The right hon. gentleman has played agitation by his proposal. The country is tranquil. The country is in suspense, waiting the passing of this measure; but the country is only waiting to see if the measure can be passed (loud cheers). The question is now transferred to the arena of this and of another house, to be finally disposed of. I will say this as to out doors' agitation, that if the measure was passed and acquiesced in it would be impossible to maintain or excite any intense agitation against the law (cheers). Now, I am perfectly frank (hear, hear). The law would have little more than two-and-a-half years to run, and the English, who are a practical people, would say, "What is the use of creating an agitation as to a principle which is acknowledged in the act; the act provides for the extinction of all duties, and though we would prefer that this should be done at once, yet before an agitation could be excited, so as to tell at an election, the law will have expired" (hear). But you (the protectionists) have placed things on a totally different footing. You have justified what I thought a somewhat impetuous remark of my honourable friend the member for Durham. You have rendered the course we propose imperative. You tell us you will not pass this measure if you can, and if it is forced on you, that you will go to another election to undo it. I say that is the desperate course announced by 100 gentlemen opposite (cries of "more"). No, I don't think you are more (cheers). But there are 100 of you determined in the desperate course of taking any steps consistent with the forms of the house, and consistent with honour, not only to frustrate this measure—which you cannot do—but also at the first convenient opportunity to place the Government in a minority (cheers from the protectionists). I see danger to the right honourable baronet's measure in that, and I can foresee, too, the chances of some little delay in another place. There are motions now on the paper which, if brought on during the progress of this measure, may throw the right honourable baronet into a minority (loud protectionist cheering). I can see the possibility of Government being out of office before its measure passes through this house (cheers again). I do not know whether their tenure of office be worth six weeks or two months' purchase (enthusiastic protectionist cheers). But still I do not see the policy of the course you are adopting in your attempts to turn the right hon. baronet out. However, that is your business, not mine. Mine is to keep this question wholly out of your power and your reach to touch it. I say that this question with the country is safe. While we are united in principle, no power on earth can prevent us from carrying the total abolition of the Corn Laws (hear, hear). And it is because I foresee danger—because I foresee a course of factious policy adopted towards the present ministers—a course to which I for one will not lend myself (cheers)—it is because I see in all these insidious amendments, and in the amendments spoken of in another place, not only so many dangers, traps, and pitfalls laid for this measure—it is, therefore, I say, that I am anxious we should preserve ourselves intact with the country; and if you (addressing the protectionists), if you do defeat this measure, nay, alter or even tamper with it, then will we fall back upon the country ten times stronger than before (loud cheers). After the division upon this question I shall support the ministry—support them cordially, heartily—I shall not be absent from a division or a debate; and now I shall say to honourable gentlemen opposite, to those who, because they have taken an enlightened view of the interests of the country, have greatly, I doubt it not, to the sacrifice of their own feelings, given their support to the measure of Government, when they see that with us of the Free Trade party there is no disposition to obstruct, but every disposition to assist them—that our policy is formed to attain the end which they as well as we have in view—then I would express to them my hopes that if we unite cordially, and if any accident should cause a dissolution, I say, I hope we shall find that those honourable gentlemen opposite who have stood by Government, will, more particularly when they have ascertained that this attempt to conciliate the protectionists by granting them a three years respite, has failed, that instead of diminishing, it has increased the intensity of their opposition; when they see, and the country sees, all sorts of factious opposition resorted to, then I hope that the honourable gentlemen on the other side of the house, who support the measure, will come to this conclusion, that when we do go to the country—if go we must—we shall all go united, with but one principle—with not a vestige of the old spirit of Whig or Tory remaining—determined manfully to struggle for and hopefully to abide the final settlement of this great question by the voice of the country (loud cheers). As to the comparative benefits of a total repeal three years hence—so far as the means are concerned—my opinions are known, and I will not now reiterate them; I hope that after this question has been fully debated, when it is seen that the measure is inevitable, I hope, notwithstanding all this irritation and recrimination, that the farmers, looking at the matter coolly, will come to the decision that an immediate repeal is best for their interests, and believing this, I do not despair that even after the measure is carried—we may, by a short bill subsequently introduced, be able, even in this session, to carry that immediate repeal (loud cheers and laughter from the protectionists). Do let honourable gentlemen reflect on what they are going to do. They are about to promote, to compel, the continuance of our agitation. Let them bethink them if they are in a fit position to abide the contest (cheers). Why I, as one of the members for the League, shall be almost ashamed to enter the field with the odds so fearfully against my opponents (laughter and cheers). Broken, dispirited, without leaders or council, I confess I do not think you will put us to much trouble (laughter) in the way of agitation. Why, the ghost of the League, should it be dissolved, will be more than a match for the flesh, blood, bones, and sinews of protection (cheers and laughter). Take a clear view of the case. I hope that view will be taken here—nay, even in another place; and that a better decision will ultimately be come to. And if the House of Lords will take my advice (loud protectionist laughter)—if they will in another place, instead of taking your advice, take mine; if they will graciously say the country seems to prefer immediate Free Trade, and we will pass a measure accordingly; if they say this, then the upper house will be doing much to restore itself to the estimation of the country (cheers, and "oh, oh"), and the country in return will echo the exclamation, already so famous, "Thank Heaven, we have a House of Lords" (hear, hear)!

Sir T. D. ACLAND blamed the League for the ungracious and ungenerous eagerness with which it sought—even after its principles had been conceded, and the victory placed within its grasp—to set about the work of gathering up the spoils. What could it matter to them if the final change be deferred for a poor two years and a half—if, indeed, there did not happen, what he certainly did not expect, a great change—a great revolution, which could arise from no other source than from the discovery that they had been in error. Unless some such revolution took place, this measure once passed, it was not likely that things would revert to their former condition (hear, hear). Why did they, then, so disgracefully exult when they had attained their object? Why did they so proudly and imperiously interfere to dictate the exact terms upon which the trace was to be concluded (cheers)? He was aware that a difference existed among farmers and landlords as to the three years. For his own part, he thought that the time in question would serve to smooth the way to the new state of things, and he would be very glad to take advantage of the experience of the effects likely to flow from Free Trade which it would afford, to enable him to make arrangements with his tenants. After this division he did not wish to interfere with the right hon. baronet in carrying out the details of his plan. It was his and his alone. If it succeeded let his be the credit; if it failed, let his be the responsibility (hear, hear).

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE had on a former occasion stated that he would support the ministerial measure. He was aware that in acting upon this resolution he would be giving an unpopular vote, but he wished to give a practical one (cheers). The right honourable baronet had stated that he could not be responsible for the success of this great measure, should the amendment of the honourable member for Wolverhampton be agreed to (hear). He added, that if the proposition came from their own side of the house he would be happy to accommodate the protectionists (cheers and laughter). Heartily wishing that such a proposition had arisen from such a quarter, he would yet be obliged, as it had not, to vote with the right honourable baronet for the measure as it stood. He felt that were he to desert the Government now, the right honourable baronet would have the right to say to him, "You left me on the question of the repeal of the Corn Laws, when you knew that our proposition amounted to deferred repeal. You have no right to require us to stand by another part of the plan—the retrospective alterations in the law of settlement (hear, hear). True, the protectionists had at first said that they did not want the three years' grace; but when put to the test, they would go out—they who were every day abusing and vilifying him—with the right honourable baronet. Really he feared that the right honourable baronet would hardly be safe in such company (loud laughter). It would hardly be safe for him to go into the lobby with them (laughter). He was sorry that the honourable member for Wolverhampton had brought forward this motion. It was said it was done to satisfy the conscience and honour of the League—they said they were pledged to vote for Free Trade. Why so was he. He had so voted, he had been so pledged long before the League members came into the house (cheers). Looking at the matter in a practical point of view, he felt that however unpopular the League might make his vote, still it was his duty to go out with the minister (cheers).

The Earl of MARCH was at a loss to know into which lobby some honourable members could go with safety (cheers and laughter). The honourable baronet opposite told them that the right honourable baronet would not be safe in their lobby, but he (Lord March) should think, from the circumstances which had taken place within the last few years, that the right honourable baronet the Home Secretary was not safe in the same lobby with the honourable member for Finsbury (cheers and laughter). However he might venture to assert that the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government would not meet with any great degree of personal inconvenience from the honourable members who sat about him (a laugh). He would not have risen had it not been for the pointed remarks of the honourable member for Stockport with respect to his noble relative. The hon. member had stated that his noble relative had declared in another place that he was for an immediate as well as total repeal of the Corn Laws. That statement he begged leave most distinctly to deny (loud cheers). He had the best reason for knowing that what his noble relative really said was, that he thought it better to have a total and immediate abolition of all duty on corn, rather than a diminishing duty for three years, and then a repeal of all protection, supposing that the present measure was inevitable, and that the proposal of her Majesty's Government be carried (hear, hear, hear). But his noble relative felt that the measure could not be carried, and entertaining that belief he was of opinion that it would be the height of folly to advocate an immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws. What reason had his noble relative for believing it could not be carried? One of the strongest was contained in the statement of the noble lord the member for London, who last night expressed his firm belief that if he had been in power, and had proposed a measure precisely similar to that brought forward by the right honourable baronet, he would have been in a minority, even though he had been supported by that right honourable gentleman in his individual capacity as a member of the House of Commons (hear and cheers). In expressing that belief, the noble lord in effect said that the majority of the House of Commons was opposed to this measure of the right hon. gentleman (cries of "no, no"). It was clear that the case was so from that statement. The country certainly was against it. Let the house look to the result of the recent elections in proof of that. Let them look to the returns for two divisions of Nottinghamshire, for Gloucester, and for Westminster (oh, oh, and great laughter). Hon. gentlemen might laugh, and think that he had forgotten that the honourable and gallant officer who had been returned for Westminster voted with the Government (hear, hear, hear). Certainly not; he knew it well, but he referred to that election because it proved that the people of Westminster were better gratified—were in fact delighted to return the honourable and gallant officer whose principles they were acquainted with—rather than the gallant officer, a great friend of his (Lord March), who professed one principle in 1841 and another in 1846 (cheers). The electors preferred a man who adhered to his opinions and pledges and did not deceive them (hear, hear, hear). The hon. member for Stockport said he would fight the ghost of the Anti-Corn-Law League against the flesh, and blood, and sinews, of the protectionists (laughter). To that contest he challenged the hon. gentleman (loud cheers and laughter). Did the hon. member, when he made that offer, recollect the position in which he placed the body he so ably represented in that house? Did he forget that before he could produce the ghost of the League, he must entirely annihilate its substance (hear, hear, and laughter)? What he gave the hon. member for Stockport every credit for consistency, and believed he was actuated in his course of conduct by a desire for the welfare of his country, he could not but say that it was most inconsistent for a Government brought in on the principles of protection to British industry, by a majority of 91, to bring forward a measure for its destruction, and that they ought first, in common honesty, to appeal to the people of this corn (hear, hear).

Mr. HUDSON rose, but was for some time inaudible, in consequence of cries for a division. The honourable member was at length understood to say that he would not have risen but for the remarks of the hon. member for Stockport, who, in the course of his speech, had, he was sure unintentionally misrepresented what had fallen from him on a previous occasion. He (Mr. Hudson) had stated most distinctly, over and over again, that he believed the probable average price of corn in the year 1849 and subsequent years, would be from 35s. to 39s. a quarter, and not 25s. as had been stated by the hon. member. He could not imagine how the hon. member had fallen into the mistake after the pains he had taken in reading over the reports of the debate; but he (Mr. Hudson) could assure him that he never had placed so low an average on the price of corn. The conduct of the League, which had excited the jealousy and indignation of the people of England, was most reprehensible in withholding the knowledge of the fact, that whilst all duties were to be removed from the importation of agricultural produce, manufactures continued to enjoy protection. The hon. member for Montrose would tell the house that the silk-weavers had plundered the public. Certainly, if there had been any plunder in the case of those duties, the manufacturers had enjoyed the advantages of it as much as the agriculturists (hear, hear). With respect to the assertion, that the farmers of England would prefer an immediate and total repeal to the measure proposed by the right hon. baronet, he could only say, that he had some knowledge of the feelings of the large holders of land, and knew they gave a decided preference to the relaxed protection for three years, because it would give them an opportunity of preparing for competition. He hoped the Government would consider, meantime, the propriety of removing some of the burdens on the landed interest, more particularly he would specify the malt-tax (hear, hear). He would be enabled to prove to the house that it would be the greatest boon to the farmer to be permitted to malt his own barley, and in saying so he spoke independently, for he was much more largely engaged in commerce than in land.

Lord WORSLEY, who rose amid loud cries for a division, was understood to say that he was acquainted with many persons who were extensive farmers of land, and as far as he could ascertain their opinions on the subject, he believed that their wishes were that the repeal of the Corn Laws, if carried at all, should be immediate. He believed that they now anxiously wished that there should at last be a settlement of the question (divide, divide).

Colonel SIBTHORP wished to say a few words before the committee divided. As some of her Majesty's ministers were still without seats in Parliament, he would, in the exercise of that Christian charity which was due even to the right honourable baronet and his cabinet, suggest to the house the expediency of restoring the elective franchise to Sudbury (loud laughter). In the bill to be brought in for that purpose, it would be necessary to insert a special provision, enacting that the borough of Sudbury should return to Parliament those ministers who had been rejected by the other constituencies of England (hear, hear, and laughter).

Mr. WAKLEY: I regret exceedingly, Sir, to find that the honourable and learned member for Wolverhampton persists in dividing the house upon his motion. However much I may approve of his intentions, and however highly I may commend the purity of his motives, I cannot conceive a more inexpedient course can be pursued by any member friendly to the measure of her Majesty's Government than by dividing the house upon this question. I believe that he has taken this step in conformity with pledges given elsewhere, and, therefore, that the honourable and learned member does not feel at liberty to abandon the course which he is about to pursue. I feel, however, that it is a most unfortunate step, because out of doors it may have the effect of producing an impression that there is on the part of those who are friendly to the measure of the Government a divided opinion on this great question. But, Sir, there is no division among them (hear, hear), and I think that the country will find that those who go out into the lobby with the honourable and learned member for Wolverhampton are the most earnest, the most serious, and the most strenuous advocates of the measure of the Government (cheers). Honourable gentlemen opposite may imagine that a different opinion will obtain among the people. But how little do those gentlemen know of public opinion. So mistaken are they upon the bearing of public opinion on this question, that a noble lord who addressed the house a few minutes ago claimed Westminster as a proof that public opinion was in favour of the party to which he belongs. Why, Sir, there were two candidates for Westminster, one of whom had long been a determined repealer of the Corn Laws; the other, one who had received some new light on this question (hear, hear, and laughter). Whom did the electors choose? They chose not the man who had taken a transitory view of the question, but him who had for years been the steady friend of a repeal of the Corn Laws. The Whigs, also, have no right to claim that election as being in favour of their views. They have no right to set up such a claim, because at the last general election, when three candidates presented themselves to the constituency, representing the Tory, the Whig, and the Radical parties, the electors of Westminster chose a Radical, and they have chosen a Radical now. I beg the house to understand that Radical principles are on the advance and in the ascendancy. I regret that the motion of the hon. and learned member for Wolverhampton has been made, but chiefly on the ground that an impression may exist out of doors that a division of opinion prevails among the supporters of the Government measure. I can assert, however, without fear of contradiction, from my intercourse with the middling and working classes of society, and the impression is all but universal that the right hon. baronet, the first Minister of the Crown, has done all he could in introducing his measure in its present shape (hear, hear). But one hon. gentleman opposite says—"We must go to the country;" another says—"You must go to the people." Why, you know perfectly well that you will not go to the people. If you do, let your elections be determined by a show of hands (hear, hear, hear). You will not do that. Do not speak, then, of going to the people, because they have hands as well as you (a laugh). You deny to the unfortunate being whose labour goes to create food a voice in the election of a member to represent him in this discussion, and I am sure from what I have seen that the voice of the people is against you (question). If hon. gentlemen wish that the discussion of this topic should be deferred, I am quite willing to sit down. The honourable member concluded by imploring honourable gentlemen opposite not to offer any opposition to the measure of the Government, but allow it to take its course.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said the noble lord the member for Lincolnshire (Lord Worsley) had declared that the opinion of the tenant-farmers of this country was in favour of the immediate repeal. He admitted that in the bitter disappointment some might feel at the mad and unaccountable change they had witnessed in the opinions of those in whom they had trusted, such expressions might have fallen from them, but he distinctly denied that the tenant-farmers were now of opinion that total and immediate repeal was any more desirable now than it had been for many years past. With respect to what had fallen from the honourable member for Finsbury, he firmly believed that a radical and democratic feeling was rising in this country, and he told her Majesty's ministers that it might grow in a class where they did not expect to find it ("oh, oh," and confusion).

Mr. VILLIERS replied. The hon. member for Warwickshire disputed that the farmers were in favour of immediate repeal. Would the hon. member be content to decide the point by reference to the opinions expressed in that newspaper, which was said to be expressly the organ of the tenant farmers, the Mark Lane Express? In referring to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Stafford O'Brien), that paper said, they had, after mature consideration, come to the conclusion that the honourable gentleman and his friends were entirely mistaken in supposing the Corn Law to be a tenant farmer's question. He did not rise to speak on his amendment, because the merits of the proposition were not disputed; he would state his motives for proposing it. He certainly had been assailed for doing so from quarters whence he had little expected attack (hear). The honourable member for Finsbury had recommended a show of hands as the best mode of ascertaining the sense of the country; and he had been not a little surprised at hearing similar advice from the honourable member for Montrose and others. He would not inquire what might be the view of these honourable members in separating from the course which the great majority of their party deemed expedient; but if any inscription were to be placed on their monument, he would suggest that it should be written as for men who had done some little good to their country by disregarding the opinion of their friends. He would not say anything against those members who thought it right to support the measure of her Majesty's Government in preference to his amendment. He thought they were quite right to exercise their judgment in the matter, and if they thought they would support the cause of Free Trade better by doing so, they were quite right to vote for the measure of Government. Everything that had fallen from any body had shown that his proposition would be an amendment, and in justification of his motion he must say that he had every reason to believe it would not do any harm to the measure before the house, and would be well supported. He was astonished to hear the reason urged by the noble lord the member for Lynn for him and his friends not supporting it. From the moment this session began he had given notice of his amendment, and he had been told by them that he did not mean to bring forward the motion, because he knew that they would support it. This was not only what they had told their friends in private respecting his intention, but what they had circulated in every part of the country where they possessed either authority or influence. The farmers were told that protection could be still maintained. Now was that a way to prepare them for the change which was about to take place (hear)? If the noble lord the member for Lynn persuaded the farmers that the old protection might be maintained, would that be as good a way to prepare them for the change as if they were induced to invest capital in the cultivation of their farms, and adopt a better system of agriculture (hear, hear)? If farmers believed that the old protection could be maintained, it would have the effect of preventing them from preparing for the change which was about to take place, and if foreigners believed that the Government measure would be successful, and prepared themselves for it, then the transition would be more serious to the farmer (hear, hear). He could not suppose that honourable members opposite believed that they could retain the old protection, and the tenant farmers he knew did not believe it (hear, hear). An acquaintance of his was at a large market town on Saturday last when the intelligence of the division arrived, and it did not, he was informed, cause the least interest amongst the farmers, nor was it once mentioned at the market dinner. And why did the intelligence possess so little interest for the farmers? Because they believed the Government measure would be carried, and all they were now desirous of was to see the question settled (cheers). When the noble marquess, whom he did not see in his place, was returned for Gloucestershire, the other day, he presided at a meeting called for petitioning for a continuance of protection to agriculture, and so strong was the feeling in the town in favour of Free Trade, that they would not allow the meeting to separate without adopting a petition in favour of Free Trade (cheers).

The committee then divided, and the numbers were—

MISCELLANEOUS.

JOHN COLLETT, ESQ., M.P., AND THE GAME-LAWS.—This gentleman is as great an object of terror to the game-preservers as Mr. Cobden to the Duke of Richmond, and we fancy a recent act of his, relative to these laws, will not diminish his character in their eyes. In a recent number of the Hampshire Independent appeared an account of a little boy, aged eleven, being sentenced by the Bench of Magistrates at Romsey, for worrying a hare, to pay a fine of 10s. and costs, and in default was committed to Winchester Bridewell. This attracting the attention of Mr. Irwin Willes, a solicitor, residing in Maddox-street, Hanover-square, he addressed Mr. Collett a letter on the subject, and within a very few hours was requested to wait upon him. Upon an interview with that gentleman, after expressing his abhorrence of the case, he requested Mr. Willes to proceed immediately to Winchester and release the infant poacher from confinement. Mr. Willes on reaching the Bridewell found that the child had not been committed there (the bench having determined not to enforce the penalty until after the expiration of ten days, and then only at the desire of the prosecutor, Sir John B. Mill, Bart.). Struck by the appearance of three fine youths, aged 16 and 17, who were inmates of the Bridewell, on account of breaches of the Game Laws, and learning that their conduct in prison had been unexceptionable, he mentioned their case to Mr. Collett. That gentleman no sooner heard of it than he dispatched Mr. Willes instantly to Winchester, and within a few hours the youths were released from the Bridewell, and restored to their parents. The fines and costs in these cases amounted to 3l. The gratitude of the poor fellows at their unexpected discharge was unbounded, and blessings loud and deep were heaped upon the head of the hon. member for Athlone for his sympathy for their misfortunes, and his liberality in their behalf.—The Sun.

A CONVERT TO FREE TRADE.—In Mr. Evelyn Denison's speech at the South Nottinghamshire nomination, he said—Some one might say, you tell me of changes among statesmen, can you show me any change among farmers—among steady practical men? Mr. Denison would try to find them one, and without going out of their own district (cheers). Suppose, he said, if he showed them a gentleman of ancient family, the owner and cultivator of a patrimonial estate, of bad land, strictly entailed, and having a family of children to provide for. Well, that's just the man who would be first to suffer by the new law. So thought the gentleman in question. Alarmed at Lord John Russell's duty of 8s., he galloped over all the country (as many of you have been galloping lately) to oppose the ruinous scheme of the Whigs; something more—he wrote a pamphlet on protection, which was highly applauded by that gentleman's authority, Mr. Alison, the historian of Scotland. The election over, two good Conservatives returned, my friend next thought that the best thing he could do for the cause would be to answer their opponents of the Anti-Corn-Law League. He collected their pamphlets and their speeches, &c., and retired with them to his study. But the process of refutation took another course; instead of his refuting the pamphlets, the pamphlets converted him. The pen fell from his hand, and Mr. Neville, who stands at my right hand, is so convinced of the justice of his views, that if any gentlemen there present was alarmed, and had a property of medium extent to sell, he believed he should not misrepresent Mr. Neville, when he said that he (Mr. Neville) would be happy to buy it at thirty years' purchase on the present rental.

FOREIGN CORN.—The Commissioners of the customs have issued instructions to the collectors and comptrollers of the revenue, at every port throughout the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to prepare and transmit to the examiner and principal comptroller of accounts, with the least possible delay, the undermentioned accounts, according to an approved specified form, so far as the same relates to their respective ports, viz.:—A return showing the number of quarters of foreign corn, meal, and flour, remaining under the Queen's lock on the 12th of February, 1846, instant, together with the total quantities of the same imported by each individual. The return alluded to is to contain the quantities of corn of various kinds, meal and flour, not the produce of the British possessions abroad, held by each importer on the day mentioned, and is to consist of distinct and separate accounts, containing the numbers of quarters and bushels of wheat, barley, oats, peas, beans, Indian corn, or maize, wheat flour and oatmeal, respectively. The principal officers before mentioned at the various ports of the kingdom, have also been directed to prepare and transmit to the Registrar-General of Shipping, with the least possible delay, the undermentioned account, according to an approved specified form, so far as the same relates to their respective ports, viz., a return of the number of ships laden with foreign corn entered inwards at the ports of the United Kingdom, between the 5th day of January, 1845, and the same date in the present year, specifying the kinds and quantities of corn, the ports of lading and the ports of discharge, and whether in ships of the United Kingdom or in vessels of any other nation, and to what nation they belonged.—Times.

THE TIMBER DUTIES.—SUNDERLAND, FEB. 23.—The shipowners of this port being, like Sir Robert Peel, ashamed of the opinions recently expressed to the legislature by the committee of the General Shipowners' Society, have set on foot a petition in favour of even a more extensive change in the timber duties than is proposed by the Government. The petition, which has already been signed by many of the largest and most influential shipowners and merchants of the port, is as follows:—"To the Hon. the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled. The petition of the undersigned shipowners of the port of Sunderland, humbly sheweth—that your petitioners, since the conclusion of the reciprocity treaties, have been unprotected in their intercourse with foreign nations. That your petitioners, therefore, consider that they cannot in justice be called upon to contribute to the protection of other interests. That your petitioners are of opinion the heavy duty now levied on foreign timber is of that description, as it raises the price of British and colonial timber used in the construction of vessels; and this extra element in the cost of vessels falls heavily on the shipowners, since, besides the interest on the extra capital invested, there are to be added the heavy items of insurance and annual deterioration in value from natural decay. That your petitioners, from the circumstance of the colonial timber being better adapted to a greater variety of purposes than foreign, do not consider that the colonial trade would be materially affected by the removal of this duty; but, on the other hand, that a greatly augmented trade might be carried on with distant foreign countries where the present high duty acts as a virtual prohibition. Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your hon. house will wholly remove the protecting duty on foreign timber."

THE FOREIGN CORN GROWER (by James Pillans, in the Mark Lane Express).—As regards the cost of growing corn abroad, at least in Italy (which must enjoy equal advantages with Poland, if we may judge from Italian wheat at the shipping ports being quite as cheap as Polish in the ports of the Baltic), it varies little, if at all, from the rate in England. It is true the agricultural labourer in Italy gains only 8d. to 10d. a day; but it is well known he does less work than the English labourer by one-third or upwards; and the price of all agricultural implements is greater in Italy than in England. The taxes which bear directly on the land in the corn-growing districts of Italy amount to 24 or 30 per cent.—in some cases are even higher. Here the advantage appears on the side of the English landowner; and when it is considered that the intelligence and energy which have hitherto been applied with us to manufactures alone are now being directed to agriculture, it seems not unreasonable to suppose that England henceforward will be able to grow corn on more favourable terms than any country in Europe.

LANDLORD CURIOSITY, AND MINISTERIAL DISCRETION.

Our readers must have been highly diverted, and the public in general have, no doubt, been greatly edified, by the very characteristic and instructive incident which, on the night of yesterday week, enlivened the tedium of Parliamentary discussion. The protectionists, speaking by the lips of Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Finch, were, it will be remembered, extremely anxious to get Sir Robert Peel to put a price on their corn. Never was so eager and pertinacious an importunity. "Had the honourable baronet at the head of the Government made up his mind" as to what wheat would fetch, when the new law came into operation? "Was he able to form any calculation as to what the price of corn was likely to be?" He must see that the demand was reasonable. He had had time enough, over and over again, to go into the investigation, during the six weeks that his bill had been about. What was the result of his researches? How many shillings, now, per quarter, could he undertake to guarantee? Or could he give some sort of general "estimate?" Could he name a figure as likely to be somewhere near the mark? It was no mere speculative curiosity that prompted the query. The highest interests of Britain were at stake. Agriculture would be all at sixes and sevens, without a Parliamentary selling price for wheat. The very rent of land turned on it. "How could they," as Mr. Finch emphatically asked, "in the absence of information on this subject, enter into any satisfactory arrangements with their tenants?" How could they "be in a position to tell them what their RENT in future was to be?"

Alas! it was but a vain "pursuit of knowledge under difficulties." Do what they would, they could not get to know. The dull, unfeeling Premier either could not, or would not, tell. He "could not answer the question of the noble lord." He had not the least idea what their selling price was going to be, and it was no use asking. "If he were asked to guarantee what hereafter would be the price of wheat, he could only say that he could give NO SUCH GUARANTEE." Not so much as an "estimate" could he venture on—"it was utterly impossible." Quite true was it, as they reproachfully reminded him, that he had said something, in 1842, about "some such price as fifty-six shillings"—but that was the very reason why he could not commit himself now; "it was because of his courage, in 1842, that he hesitated now." Since 1842, he had had his three years' experience. He had left that line of business altogether, and must positively decline ever acting again as land-valuer and appraiser. Really, honourable gentlemen must excuse him. It was impossible to mind the corn market and the empire at the same time. Honourable gentlemen must please attend to their business as corn manufacturers, dealers, and chapmen, and leave him to attend to his business as statesman.

It is pleasant to be able to add, that the inquisitive agricultural mind was not altogether put off with these very unsatisfactory negatives. Our protectionists did get something positive at last, though not in the quarter to which their suit was more especially addressed. Mr. Villiers kindly interposed to do them a good turn, and volunteered a suggestion which, we will venture to say, will, if judiciously carried out, answer every essential purpose of the querists: "If honourable gentlemen wanted to know what would become of them when protection was withdrawn, why, he would tell them—they would be obliged to look after their property; they would cultivate it much better, and perhaps be richer and better men."

It is, however, we think, perfectly practicable to give a direct and explicit answer to the landlord query, which the honourable member for Wolverhampton's general admonition seems to evade rather than to solve. What will the landlords' corn fetch under the Free Trade régime? Why, it will fetch exactly what it is worth. The misfortune is, they want more for their corn than it is worth. For these thirty years past, and more, they have been doing nothing else than devising expedients to make their corn sell for more than it is worth, by forcibly preventing people from dealing at any other than their own shop. No wonder they are puzzled. They have never been used to fair market prices. The notion of honest trading puts them quite out of their calculations. They cannot in the least comprehend the come-down, from the stilts of protection to the level ground of vulgar supply and demand.

May we suggest one consideration that strikes us as fitted to soothe the agricultural feelings, under the rebuff which a cold-hearted and worldly-wise Premier administered to an illicit curiosity? Suppose he had been malicious enough to indulge his old friends with an "estimate!" What an opportunity for gratifying vindictive and angry feeling—were his nature susceptible of an impulse so ungenerous! He had nothing to do but name some extraordinarily and alarmingly low figure—and where would they have been then? Fairly pinned. There would have been no getting out of it. They must have accepted the Peel valuation, as asked for; and acquiesced, without more words, in the Peel estimate of prices, with rents to match. Happily, the minister was merciful, and scorned to take advantage of the simplicity even of the men who brand him with "perfidy." It is still an open question for them. They are still their own men, and may do the best they can for themselves. They can talk the matter quietly over with their tenantry. There is yet a wide margin of hope and possibility. We are quite sure they will be for looking on the bright side of things, when the time really comes for the dreaded adjustment of rents. We should not be surprised to see them take a decidedly sanguine view of the prospects of the corn market, and the capabilities and resources of rent-payers. We confidently expect, that from the moment the new Corn Law gets fairly on the statute-book, they will begin to please themselves with the discovery that, after all, prices will not be much the worse, and that rents may very well remain for the present as they are.

This little Parliamentary episode is really, in every way, most instructive. We feel infinitely obliged to Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Finch—to the latter gentleman, in particular, who is a fine specimen of that invaluable class of men who blurt out, with a sort of blundering honesty, things which the discreeter portion of protectionist mankind content themselves with privately thinking. It can never again be said, after this, that "protection" is not meant to raise prices, and that artificially high prices are not coveted for the sake of artificially high rents. The design, and the motive, are now avowed. To fix the price which corn is to sell at—and fix it high, in order that rents may be high, too—is now the openly-declared intent of protectionist legislation. We have it from the landlords' own lips. They tell us, in their places in Parliament, that a statesman's first business is to make wheat sell well, in order that wheat-growing land may let well. There is no disguise or mystification about it. "You, Sir Robert Peel, Prime Minister of the British empire, are making a new Corn Law; now, we, the legislators of the British empire, deal in corn, and in the land on which corn is grown; and we particularly wish to know what prices we are to get for our corn, and what rents those prices will enable our receivers to pay us." We are obliged to you, Mr. Finch. You have knocked the right nail on the head, Mr. Finch. You did not mean it, Mr. Finch, but you have clinched our case.

Did it never occur, we wonder, to our landlords, to ask, themselves what they would think if the "cotton lords"—whose aggregate amount of annual production is on some such scale as their own—were to press Prime Ministers with this sort of questioning? What price does Sir Robert Peel consider calicoes likely to sell at? How much per yard will he guarantee for shirtings? And can he form any calculation, or give any estimate, with reference to muslin? Will he please be so good as to say, because in the absence of information on these subjects the cotton men cannot possibly be in a position to ascertain their profits, adjust their expenditure, and regulate the portions of their daughters. Were the cotton men mean enough, silly enough, and audacious enough, to talk in this strain, our landowners would perhaps be able to appreciate the sordidness and impertinence of wresting the powers of legislation to serve trading purposes, and calling on the Prime Minister of a mighty empire to officiate as a sort of general factory foreman.

We heartily congratulate the farmers on the result of this curious legislative interlude. They may now see—those of them who have yet anything to learn on this subject—what exactly it is that the "farmers' friends" really mean;—high prices by Act of Parliament, or a Parliamentary promise of high prices, to afford leverage for raising rents. We especially congratulate them on the final stop now put to this hoax of Parliamentary prices. The delusion is now, once for all, exploded. Politics and agriculture are divorced. The Prime Minister formally declines acting any longer in the capacity of land valuer. Farmers will never again have to pay, out of their capital, rents adjusted by a fragile Parliamentary promise. There is no such promise now in existence. The Premier refuses to interpose so much as an estimate, or a guess, between the hirer and the letter of arable land. The two parties meet on perfectly clear and equal commercial terms—with not even a conjecture of "some such price as fifty-six shillings" to mystify the commercial character of the transaction. Renting a farm will, in future, be like renting a cotton-mill;—the lessee will look at the actual, natural state of the markets, make his calculations, and strike his bargain accordingly. Rarely has a statesman rendered a better service to his country, by the display of knowledge and foresight, than Sir Robert Peel has now done by a plain confession of irremediable ignorance.

NEXT WEEK.—ANOTHER MONSTER DEBATE THREATENED.

The unexpected rapidity and facility with which the House of Commons has affirmed, in committee, without exception, every item of the Ministerial scheme, must not lead us to fancy that we are at the end of the business yet. Monopoly, it is generally understood, has still a vast deal to say for itself—has a prodigious fund of talk bottled up in reserve, wherewith to deluge a patient and long-suffering public. The second reading of the Bill, founded on and embodying the resolutions of the committee, is fixed for Monday night—when, if rumour speak truly, we are to have another monster debate, another experiment in the art of talking against time. There are, it is said, to be more crushing exposures of ministerial “inconsistency”—more select readings from Hansard—more denunciations of the “perfidy” which a recreant and apostate Premier has practised on a confiding and betrayed “interest”—more lamentations over the setting “sun of England”—more “whinnings” at the cruelty which compels agriculturists to manage their own business like other folks—more parroting of fallacies, at which even fustian-jacketed operatives have almost left off laughing—and more exhibitions of that statistical skill and science which conjure up the pleasing, though, we fear, baseless visions of a bread “inundation” from Onoko and Tamboff.

Now, we would take the liberty of suggesting to our Free Trade friends in Parliament, the advisableness of allowing all this to go on with the least possible amount of interruption on their part. Discussion is now a pure work of supererogation. The country wants only to have the bill passed—and it will pass the sooner, the less is said. The question has reached a point at which nothing possibly can be said, on the one side, which the common sense of the country will not instinctively and intuitively meet with the proper answer; and nothing can very well be said on the other which the same common sense will not have already anticipated. If there is to be a debate, we would like it to have very much of the character of a debate on the truth or falsehood of the multiplication table. Let monopoly talk itself tired—and the business will be over the sooner. Let no stimulants be administered, to prolong the sick life of an effete controversy. The clock will run itself down, and stop in due time, if nobody winds it up again. “Give them rope,” is our advice. A cold and impassive silence is really the only reply to make, at this time of day, to the blundering sillinesses which constitute the staple of protectionist oratory.

The whole affair may now safely be left with the reading public; that is, with that fractional portion of the reading public for whom the argument, as an argument, possesses sufficient interest to render protectionist speeches readable. The case is one on which fustian jacket is perfectly competent to adjudicate, without prompting. For every variety and sub-variety of the monopolist logic, fustian jacket will be ready with a short and sharp answer. To the deprecated “dependence on foreigners,” and the query, “What will you do in case of war?”—fustian jacket will only say—“The more dependence the better—the dependence being mutual, and mutually beneficial, and the surest preservative of peace.” For the “inundation” nonsense, fustian jacket will have only a smile, or a sigh,—according as he hopefully takes the predicted inundation for true, or sorrowfully fears that it may turn out too good to be true. On “wages” fustian jacket will probably not be called upon for any opinion whatever. Of “peculiar burdens” likewise, we do not anticipate that very much will be said—that ground having latterly been marked “dangerous.” Could one ever feel secure in prophesying, that landlordism will act discreetly, and not commit itself, we should venture on a pretty confident prediction, that little or nothing more will be said to set the industrious classes of the British people comparing notes on the question of taxation, overhauling fiscal legislation, and examining into their own “peculiar burdens” under landlord protection.

On the whole, we are sure that nothing will be lost by our Parliamentary friends keeping themselves pretty much in the background, from now until the passing of the bill. So many speeches saved will be simply so much time gained. Free Traders have nothing to do with the next week's debate, so far as we can see, but to take care to be present, in full force, from the first word to the last—ready, on the shortest notice, to bear their part in the division, and to send up the question to the peers, backed by an overpowering array of those statistics of the division lists, which are the sort of facts and figures best fitted to interest their lordships' attention, and sway their lordships' deliberations.

FREE TRADE IN FRANCE.

We have already briefly noticed the first meeting of the Association formed at Bordeaux to promote the freedom of commerce. We are now about to give a more full and complete report of the proceedings, to show that the society has been instituted not in a spirit of imitation, but in consequence of the progress of sound principle,—that it is not based on the study of what has been said or done in England, but on a profound investigation of the commercial and industrial condition of France. The meeting was held in the large Concert-room of the theatre; from 500 to 600 persons were present. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed, and the sum of 50,000 francs was subscribed in the room.

The chair was taken by M. Duffour-Dubergier, mayor of Bordeaux and President of the Association, who opened the proceedings with the following address:

DISCOURS DE M. LE MAIRE.

“Aide-toi, le ciel t'aidera! telle est la devise du sage, et c'est celle que nous vous proposons de mettre en pratique.

“Jusqu'ici, messieurs, nous nous sommes bornés à nous plaindre, et il y a cinquante ans bientôt que nous nous plaignons sans succès; on ne nous écoute pas; bien mieux, on a presque l'air de nous dire qu'on est fatigué de nos doléances.

“Aussi, messieurs, venons-nous aujourd'hui vous engager de vous joindre à nous, pour réclamer comme un droit ce qu'on n'a pas voulu accorder à nos prières.

“Pour réussir, il ne faut que nous grouper, car nous sommes les plus nombreux, les plus forts, et nous avons pour nous la raison et la justice.—Que voulons-nous, en effet? C'est que chacun fasse ce qu'il sait faire, ne fasse que ce qu'il sait faire, et qu'il échange le produit de son travail contre celui qui lui offre le plus d'avantage, c'est-à-dire celui qui lui est offert en échange en plus grande quantité et en meilleure qualité.

“Assés et trop longtemps on s'est occupé des producteurs; c'est comme consommateurs et en leur nom que nous réclamons justice.

“Tout le monde ne produit pas, mais tout le monde consomme, et parmi ceux qui produisent, beaucoup produisent mal, c'est-à-dire chèrement et en mauvaise qualité.

“L'intérêt des consommateurs, c'est-à-dire de la masse, c'est d'avoir des objets, bons et à bon marché, et leur droit est de les prendre là où ils les trouvent à leur convenance.

“Et qu'oi! messieurs, est-il bien possible que ce soit en France, dans ce pays où tout le monde parle de liberté, où l'on a fait dix révolutions pour la conquérir, où l'on a tout nivelé, que l'on ose fouler aux pieds le droit le plus juste, le plus naturel d'un citoyen libre, celui d'employer son argent, des bras comme il l'entend, celui d'acheter ce qui lui plaît et où il lui plaît.

“Vraiment, plus on y réfléchit, le plus on voit que

ADDRESS OF THE MAYOR.

“God helps those who help themselves.” Such is the motto of the wise, which we intend to put in practice.

“Hitherto, gentlemen, we have limited ourselves to complaint. For nearly 50 years we have complained in vain; let us to day engage you to join us in claiming as a right what has been refused to our prayers.

“Yes, gentlemen, long enough, and too long, have we been sacrificed to private interests and superannuated prejudices; the day of intelligence and redress of grievances has arrived.

“To succeed, we need only combine; for we are the more numerous—we are the stronger, and we have reason and justice on our side. What is it that we ask?—that each should do what he knows how to do, and not attempt that which he does not know how to do; and that he should exchange the produce of his labour with him who offers him the most advantageous terms—that is to say, with him who offers the largest quantity and the best quality.

“Long, and too long, has attention been exclusively paid to producers; it is as consumers, and in their name, that we demand justice.

“All do not produce, but all do consume; and among those who produce, there are many who produce badly—that is to say, at a high price, and of inferior quality.

“The interest of consumers—that is to say, of the mass of mankind, is to have good articles at a low price, and they have a right to take these where they can conveniently be had.

“Is it then possible, gentlemen, that in France, a land where all boast of freedom, and where there have been ten revolutions to win it—where everything has been levelled—that man should dare to trample on the most just and natural right of free citizens, that of employing their capital and labour as their intelligence directs l'esprit humain n'est qu'un composé d'absurdes préjugés.

“Il y a cinquante ans que nous lutons pour des utopies, que nous réclamons des libertés qui ne nous profitent en rien, et dans le même moment nous acceptons et supportons patiemment que la première de nos libertés, la plus naturelle, la plus simple, la plus utile, nous soit ravie, celle d'employer notre argent comme bon nous semble et au mieux de nos intérêts. Nous nous bergons de chimères et la réalité nous échappe.

“Et pourquoi n'en serait-il pas entre nations comme entre les individus d'une même nation?

“Pourquoi, si la division du travail, celle des industries est bonne parmi les individus d'une même nation, ne serait-elle pas bonne entre les peuples? Bien mieux, si le principe est bon entre individus, à plus forte raison doit-il être bon entre peuples, car l'aptitude des individus à telle ou telle profession ne dépend que de l'habitude et du travail, tandis que celle des peuples à telle ou telle industrie, tient la plupart du temps au climat, ou à des causes naturelles qu'il ne dépend pas de nous de changer.

“Ce qui est vrai dans un cas, l'est donc à plus forte raison dans l'autre, et cependant nous admettons la spécialité des industries entre individus, et nous la rejetons entre nations, alors qu'ici la spécialité est basée sur les lois immuables de la nature.

“Il est vrai qu'on a su colorer cette usurpation des droits naturels d'une apparence de raison. Il faut, dit-on, qu'un peuple se suffise à lui-même; il faut favoriser le travail national.

“Mais cet argument n'est pas spécieux, car on pourrait tout aussi bien dire que chaque individu doit se suffire à lui-même; mais de là résulterait la confusion des industries; dès-lors, plus de division de travail et partant la barbarie. Et quant au travail vraiment national, il ne peut y en avoir d'utile que celui qui est basé sur la nature du sol et du climat; tout industrie qui ne vit qu'à l'abri du privilège est nuisible et fatale, car elle empêche la véritable, la bonne industrie, celle que la nature favorise, de se développer autant qu'elle le ferait si elle pouvait échanger son trop plein contre les produits de l'industrie étrangère: ce ne serait pas la cessation d'un travail national, mais bien la suppression d'une industrie parasite au profit d'une industrie vivace qui fournirait dix fois plus de travail, et emploierait dix fois plus de bras, et mériterait seule à cet égard le nom d'industrie nationale.

“J'en ai dit assez, messieurs, pour vous faire comprendre le but de l'Association pour la liberté des échanges: c'est l'association des consommateurs contre quelques producteurs, privilégiés; c'est l'affranchissement de la masse; le triomphe d'un droit inné; la liberté que doit avoir chacun d'employer son argent et ses bras de la manière qu'il croit le plus utile à ses intérêts.

“Il semble, messieurs, qu'il suffise d'exposer cette doctrine pour assurer son succès; et, cependant, il n'en est pas, il faut le dire, qui ait été plus controversée them,—that of buying what they please and where they please?

“Verily, the more we reflect, the more we find that the human mind is a mass of absurd prejudices.

“During 50 years we have been struggling for visionary objects, demanding franchises which profit us nothing, and at the same time allow the first, the most natural, the most simple, and the most useful of our liberties to be left from us—that of employing our wealth as our inclinations and our interests direct. We amuse ourselves with fancies, and realities escape us.

“Why should it not be between nations as between individuals of the same nation?

“Why, if there are shoemakers, tailors, weavers, and that each citizen does not make his own shoes, clothes, and shirts—why, I ask, should not each nation have its special branches of industry?

“Why, if the division of labour is good for individuals of the same nation, should it not be good for nations themselves? If good for individuals, a fortiori it must be still better for nations, since the aptitude of individuals for this or that profession depends on habit and practice, while the aptitude of nations for a special branch of industry depends on climate or other natural causes beyond human control.

“What is true in the one case is consequently still more true in the other; yet we accept special pursuits for individuals, and reject them in the case of nations, where they rest on the immutable laws of nature.

“We must confess, gentlemen, that the interest of the masses has been sacrificed to the interests of the privileged classes. It is in the name of the interest of the masses that we come to protest against injustice, and to claim Free Trade as a right.

It is true that this usurpation has been excused by plausible pretences. We are told that a nation should depend on itself, and that we should favour our national industry.

“But this argument is not even specious; it might as well be said that every individual should depend on himself; but thence would result confusion in industry, the cessation of the division of labour, and perfect barbarism. A truly national industry must be based on the nature of the soil and the climate; every industry which can only be supported by protection is injurious and fatal, for it prevents the development of the really advantageous industry, by preventing the exchange of its surplus for the products of foreign industry; free exchange would not be a cessation of national industry, but rather the suppression of a parasitical branch of industry for the advantage of a healthy branch of industry, which would afford ten times as much employment, occupy ten times as many hands, and alone would merit the name of national industry.

“I have said enough, gentlemen, to explain the object of our association: it is an association of consumers against some privileged producers; it is the enfranchisement of the masses; the triumph of innate rights; the freedom that each should have to employ his capital and his labour as best accords with his interests.

et dont la réalisation ait à surmonter plus d'obstacles; et la raison en est facile à comprendre, c'est, qu'elle a à lutter contre les intérêts individuels; or, les individus intéressés se groupent, s'entendent, forment corps, tandis que la masse est isolée, dissimulée sur le sol, et ne comprend même pas son véritable intérêt.

"La mission de l'Association est donc de l'éclairer, de dissiper les ténèbres dont on a cherché à obscurcir la vérité, et de rendre compactes et collectives des plaintes isolées, qui n'ont, jusqu'à présent, obtenu des gouvernements que des dénis de justice, et, j'ose presque le dire des dédains.

"Mais quelques justes que soient nos réclamations, il ne faut pas espérer vaincre sans combat.

"Il faut du zèle, de la persévérance; il faut plus que cela, il faut de l'argent, beaucoup d'argent, et la réunion d'aujourd'hui a spécialement pour but de vous en demander.

L'appel fait à votre patriotisme ne restera pas sans fruit: Bordeaux a toujours défendu les principes que nous soutenons. Sa chambre de commerce a, depuis cinquante ans, soutenu le dogme de la liberté des échanges; aujourd'hui qu'il faut agir, les Bordelais, nous l'espérons, ne reculeront pas; ils se montreront dignes de la grandeur de l'œuvre que nous sommes appelés à propager, et justifieront le choix qu'on a fait de leur ville pour y établir le berceau de l'association humanitaire de la liberté des échanges.

"Mais je laisse à une bouche plus éloquente que la mienne le soin de vous exposer les besoins de l'Association et l'emploi qu'elle entend faire des fonds que vous mettez à sa disposition, et je me hâte de rentrer dans mon sujet.

"L'œuvre que nous entreprenons demande, comme je le disais, du zèle et de la persévérance; comment en serait-il autrement lorsqu'il faut en quelque sorte faire l'éducation de tout un peuple? Voyez à cet égard ce qui s'est passé en Angleterre. Il a fallu dix ans de lutte pour obliger le gouvernement à entrer dans la voie des concessions. Que dis-je, dix ans! Il y en a cinquante et plus qu'Adam Smith a professé les principes que nous soutenons aujourd'hui. Il y en a trente bientôt que j'ai entendu en Angleterre le peuple crier contre le corn-bill, et que j'ai vu afficher et colporter des pétitions, où l'on réclamait son abolition, et cependant il faut le dire, l'Angleterre était mieux préparée que la France à recevoir ces idées; les moyens de les y répandre sont plus faciles chez nous, car on y lit, on discute davantage, et les masses se groupent plus facilement et avec moins de dangers. Il ne faut donc pas nous faire illusion, c'est une œuvre immense que nous entreprenons; mais, je ne crains pas de dire qu'elle est aussi glorieuse qu'elle est immense et je remercie pour ma part l'Association d'en avoir choisi pour son président. Elle a compté sur ma bonne volonté, comme moi je compte sur le zèle de mes collègues, et, Dieu aidant, j'espère qu'avec de la persévérance nous atteindrons le but que nous nous proposons.

"Mais pour l'atteindre, la première condition est de faire faire nos petits intérêts personnels, d'ajuster tout préjugé, tout esprit de parti. Il faut, avant tout, que le gouvernement sache bien que nous ne voulons employer que les moyens légaux de la persuasion; qu'il n'a donc rien à redouter de nous, parce que nous voulons l'ordre, le repos, la paix, l'aisance générale, et que nous savons que tout cela n'est pas possible qu'avec sa stabilité. Loin de chercher à l'affaiblir, il nous trouvera disposé à lui prêter appui.

"It seems, gentlemen, enough to enunciate this doctrine to ensure its success, and yet we must confess that no doctrine has been more controverted; there is none of which the realisation has had to surmount more obstacles, and this for a reason which is easily understood, because it has had to grapple with personal interests. Now interested individuals combine, consult, and form compact parties, while the masses are isolated, spread over the land, and often ignorant of their true interests.

"The mission, therefore, of our association is to enlighten, to dispel the darkness by which truth has been obscured, to collect and combine the isolated complaints which have hitherto received from the government only denials of justice—I might almost say disdain.

"However just may be our claim, we cannot hope to conquer without a struggle.

"We must have zeal, we must have perseverance, and more than that we must have money—much money; and the special object of our meeting to-day is to raise funds. The appeal made to your patriotism will not be fruitless. Bordeaux has always defended the principles which we maintain. Its Chamber of Commerce has maintained the doctrine of Free Trade for 50 years, and now, when we must act, the men of Bordeaux will not hold back.

"I leave to a tongue more eloquent than mine the task of explaining to you the wants of the association, and the use we intend to make of the funds which you will place at our disposal, and I return to my subject.

"The work which we undertake demands, as I have said, zeal and perseverance; how can it be otherwise when we have to undertake the education of an entire people? See what has occurred in England. It required ten years to force the government to yield. What say I? Ten years! Fifty years and more have elapsed since Adam Smith maintained the principles which we maintain this day. For thirty years I have heard the English people cry out against the Corn Laws; I have seen them sign and present petitions demanding its abolition, and yet I must say that England was better prepared to receive these ideas than France. There are greater facilities for their diffusion there than here; the English read more, discuss more, and masses meet there with greater facility and less danger than here. We must not, therefore, deceive ourselves; the work we have to undertake is immense; but I do not hesitate to say it is as glorious as it is immense, and I feel grateful to the association for having chosen me as its president. It has counted on my good will; I too rely on the zeal of my colleagues, and with the help of God, I trust that we will attain the end at which we aim.

"But to succeed, our first consideration must be to lay aside our petty personal interests, to abjure all prejudice, and all party spirit. Above all things we must show the government that we mean to employ none but legal means of persuasion; that it has nothing to dread from us, because we desire order, tranquillity, peace, general comfort, and that we know that none of these are attainable without its stability. Far from seeking to enfeeble it, government will find us disposed to lend it our best support. We must show that when we

"Il faut qu'il sache enfin qu'en attaquant le privilège, nous n'entendons pas attaquer le revenu des domaines, mais bien en favoriser l'augmentation en développant la consommation des objets qui en font la base, et en attirant chez nous des produits qui en sont exclus aujourd'hui et qui ne paient, par conséquent, aucuns droits au fisc.

"Espérons donc, messieurs, que le gouvernement, loin de nous voir avec crainte, nous favorisera dans nos efforts, qui tendent à répandre l'aisance dans nos villes et nos campagnes, et à consolider le système de la paix. Oui, messieurs, la paix! car il faut bien le reconnaître, un des plus grands fleaux du système protecteur, c'est de favoriser, d'entretenir les haines internationales, de voir partout des rivaux, jamais d'amis: c'est le système de l'égoïsme, de l'isolement érigé en principe, tandis que notre système a précisément pour but de renverser les barrières qui séparent les peuples, d'unitier leur intérêts qu'ils ne forment plus qu'une association de frères, et que la guerre, résultat de l'antagonisme, devienne à jamais impossible.

"Ainsi se réalisera ce rêve des philosophes, la paix universelle, et nous viendrons ainsi en aide à la pensée royale qui, depuis quinze ans, lutte contre les préjugés, les rivalités, l'antagonisme, pour maintenir la paix européenne, si souvent menacée par les mauvaises passions et l'ignorance des masses exploitées par des ambitieux ou des égoïstes intéressés. Ainsi se réalisera enfin ce vœu philanthropique et généreux que j'ai en le bonheur, il y a quelques mois, d'entendre sortir d'une bouche auguste, et qui résume en peu de mots le but de notre association, et doit désormais devenir notre devise. 'Que chaque citoyen français puisse se procurer au meilleur marché possible le plus de jouissances possibles.'

"Vive le Roi!"
"Vive la liberté des échanges!"

(We shall publish the eloquent speech of M. F. Bastiat, with a translation, in our next Number. We are sorry that our space compels us to defer it.)

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.—STAFFORD.—When a vacancy was created in the representation of this borough by Captain Carnegie's acceptance of office as a junior Lord of the Treasury, a large number of the independent electors applied to Mr. Lawrence Heyworth to become a candidate. He consented; but before the day of nomination arrived, he had reason to fear that he might be involved in the bribery and treating for which Stafford has an unenviable reputation; and having tendered to his committee a sum sufficient to defray the legal expenses already incurred, he retired from the contest. On this the Free Traders requested that Mr. E. Watkin, of Manchester, would allow himself to be proposed, in order that some opportunity should be afforded for the manifestation of public opinion. Though quite unprepared, Mr. Watkin complied with the solicitation; and at the same time the protectionists brought forward the notorious Dr. Sleight. At the nomination, the show of hands was decidedly in favour of Mr. Watkin; but being unprepared with a legal property qualification, he declined to go to the poll, so that the contest lies between Captain Carnegie and Dr. Sleight. The polling takes place this day (Friday).

MR. CHARLES MACKAY.—On Friday last the Senatus Academicus of the University of Glasgow, by a unanimous vote, conferred upon Mr. Charles Mackay, the author of the "Hope of the World," "The Salamandrine," and other poems, the degree of LL.D.

THE PREMIER AND THE FARMERS.—Mr. W. Cross a respectable farmer in the neighbourhood of Dover, a few days since addressed a letter to the Premier, in connection with the proposed new plans of protective duties, in which he respectfully submitted, that, were the Income Tax levied on farmers according to the profits derived from their farms, instead of, as now, on half their rental, this would be one of the best methods that could be adopted to afford compensation for the withdrawal of protection from agriculture. Mr. Cross instanced his own farm as having yielded little or no profit for several years past. To this letter, Mr. Cross received, by return of post, the subjoined pithy reply.—"Downing-street, Feb. 4, 1846. Sir,—I am desired by Sir Robert Peel to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday. Sir Robert Peel trusts that your farm will be more profitable under the law which he has proposed than it appears to have been under a system of high protective duties. He has no intention of making any alteration in the Income Tax. It is clear that, in such a case as yours, there could be no claim for compensation, as a change in the law can hardly operate to your injury.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, W. H. STURGEON."

attack protection we do not attack the revenue, but that we favour its increase by developing the consumption of articles subject to impost—by attracting to our ports commodities which are now excluded, and consequently pay no duty.

"Let us hope, then, gentlemen, that the government, instead of viewing us with fear, will favour our efforts, which tend to diffuse comforts through our towns and villages, and to consolidate the system of peace. Yes gentlemen, peace! for it must be granted that one of the greatest curses of the protective system is to cherish and encourage international enmities, to see rivals everywhere, and friends nowhere. It is a system of selfishness, of isolation raised into a principle; whilst our system has for its object to throw down the barriers which separate nations, so to unite their mutual interests as to form an association of brothers, and that war, the result of rivalry, should be henceforth impossible.

"Thus will be realised that dream of philosophers, universal peace, and we shall thus aid the royal sentiment which for 15 years struggles against prejudices, against rivalries, against enmities, to maintain the peace of Europe so often menaced by the bad passions and ignorance of the masses, worked upon by the ambitious for the promotion of selfish interests. Finally, then will be realised the philosophic and generous sentiment which I heard uttered some months ago by an august mouth, and which so briefly explains the object of our association that we might take it for our motto—'May every French citizen be able to procure the greatest possible amount of comfort at the least possible expense.'

"Three cheers for the king!"
"Three cheers for Free Trade."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Eighth Week, ending Saturday, March 14.

The Corn Law amendments, of which we gave transcripts last week—amendments which threatened us with fixed duties and fixed minimum sliding scales—all disappeared on Friday night week, like snow under the influence of an April sun. The protectionists began to show symptoms of consciousness that they were, somehow or other, acting a feigning part, and that the delay of the Government measures was really injurious to the best interests of the country. So, they abandoned their opposition, not, however, without much talk, especially from that "great man," Lord George Bentinck, who, on behalf of his country and the turf, has had to endure the brunt of many a qui tam action. He insisted that Sir Robert Peel should inform them what would be the price of wheat under the new measures of the Government. This question is a perfectly legitimate one for a protectionist to ask. They have been brought up in the idea that an Act of Parliament can secure a given price for grain; and it is really a "crucifying of the flesh" to abandon the notion. Sir Robert Peel, in 1842, expressed himself cautiously; but still he held out the hope that, so far as law could affect it, his sliding scale, which he was then proposing, and which he now abandons, would keep prices fluctuating between 54s. and 58s. But he is not so courageous now. Ever since 1815 the hopes of the lawmakers have been falsified; we have now to try how prices will work when freed from the intermeddling of the Legislature. But though Sir Robert Peel declined to prophesy what would be the probable range of prices under his new measures, he expressed an opinion that protection had worked occasionally in an injurious way even for the protectionists themselves, for the exclusion of foreign corn frequently rendered prices lower than they might otherwise have been, as in 1835, when the average was 39s. In truth, protection, by confining our agriculturists to one market, enables them to obtain an unnaturally high price in scarce seasons, but punishes them by giving them a low price in superabundant seasons.

Mr. Finch, the hero of Rutlandshire, was not satisfied with the answer of Sir Robert Peel. The Free Traders, he thought, ought to know better. So he called on Mr. Cobden to foretell. Mr. VILLIERS took up the question, and answered it happily. An importunate beggar having succeeded in obtaining a dole, was asked what he would have done had he not got it. "Why," replied he, "I should have been obliged to work!" So, as Mr. Villiers told Mr. Finch, if protection were withdrawn, he would have to work—to look better after his property, and the result would be, that he would be a better, a richer, a happier man!

Opposition being all withdrawn, the resolutions were severally put and agreed to. And here it may be as well to refresh the memory of our readers as to the Parliamentary process. A simple bill is introduced at once. The member who has it in charge makes a statement, and asks leave to bring in the measure. If this be granted, and the bill is already prepared, it is frequently brought in on the same evening, and read a first time. Then, there are the stages of second reading; going through committee; and third reading. But bills relating to taxation, customs' duties, public money, and so forth, have a more protracted course. Thus, when Sir Robert Peel proposes to make a great fiscal change, or to impose a new tax, he moves that the house should resolve itself into "a committee of the whole house." The SPEAKER quits the chair; the chairman of committees takes his place at the table; and Sir Robert Peel makes his statement. Should this prove to be an important one, it is usual for the committee to be adjourned, in order to give time for due consideration. The next stage is the committee's passing resolutions, affirming the expediency of making the proposed alterations. These resolutions have afterwards to be reported by the chairman of committees to the SPEAKER; and it is not until the report of the resolutions is affirmed, that leave is given to bring in a bill or bills, which have to go through all the usual stages of first, second, and third readings, with the intervening one of considering all the clauses in committee.

This gives room for protracted discussion; of which the protectionists have amply availed themselves. After Sir Robert Peel had made his statement on the Corn Laws and the customs, a fortnight was given for consideration. Then came the three weeks' debate as to whether or not the SPEAKER should leave the chair, in order to permit the house to resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, with the view of passing the necessary resolutions. This being over, and the house in committee, a long debate may arise on the resolutions. Should they be successfully carried, another debate may arise on the reporting of the resolutions. Parliament met on the 23d of January, yet leave has not yet been obtained to bring in bills embodying the Government measures, with the exception of the one on corn, the second reading of which is fixed for Monday, and on which it is expected that there will be another debate of a week. But Friday night (last night) will probably see some further progress made with the remaining measures.

In the rambling discussion of Friday night week, Indian corn became a prominent topic, and Lord George Bentinck rose to express his conviction that the right course, with respect to Ireland, would have been for the Government to have bought up the Irish oats on the spot, instead of allowing them to be exported, and then have distributed them to the poor. The Premier pinned him to this point. What would have been the effect of such a step? These oats are now exported to England for the consumption of Lancashire, Scotland, and Wales. Now what would have been the condition of the population in those parts of the kingdom had they been forced to bid against the Government for their food? Moreover, the price of oats would have been raised to the Irish people by such a proceeding; that is, of all oats not bought up by the Government. Sir Robert Peel informed the House that 100,000L had been expended in the purchase of maize for the relief of the Irish people. Mr. William Miles, who has a majestic way of looking at matters, in the course of the discussion on maize remarked that the United States produced annually seven hundred millions of quarters of that grain. Between this and the Tamboff wheat what have we to expect? Mr. Miles has a peculiar knack of blundering in his statistics. The laughter which his seven hundred millions of quarters created roused his faculties, and he corrected himself by substituting bushels for quarters, which, as he said on Monday night, was equivalent to eighty-seven millions of quarters.

The rapidity with which the resolutions were passing on Friday alarmed Lord George Bentinck, and other large-minded men. Further progress was therefore stopped till Monday, with the understanding that there was then to be a debate on Indian corn.

On Monday Mr. O'Connell brought before the house the subject of the distress now existing in Ireland, and pointed out the results that might ensue if speedy measures were not taken by Government to provide an effectual remedy. In reply, Sir Robert Peel re-stated the nature of the precautions which the Government have adopted; providing work, food, and placing grants of public money at the disposal of the grand juries. But though the efforts of the Government were not inconsiderable, spontaneous charity must, after all, be the main reliance of the destitute, and they confidently expected that the landed proprietors will contribute their aid. The Treasury also, as soon as the resolution is passed, will permit the introduction of Indian corn, buckwheat, rice, &c., at the reduced nominal duties, taking the usual precaution of a bond from the importers, to secure the payment of the higher rates, in case the measure should not become law. We must do the protectionists justice so far as to say, that they cheered the proposal of the Prime Minister to permit at once the introduction, for a limited period, of Indian corn, in order to mitigate the distress in Ireland. But it was a wholly different thing to allow that importation to become permanent. However, before we come to the discussion on Indian corn, we must notice a little preliminary incident. When Mr. Greene, the chairman of committees, appeared at the bar, and brought up the report on the resolutions which were agreed to on Friday, that amusing gentleman, Sir John Tyrrell, rose, and "Trusted that the house would not think he unnecessarily occupied its attention while he took the liberty of reading a letter he held in his hand. He had no wish to interpose needless delay, and should therefore at once give the contents of the letter. The honourable member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Alderman Copeland), the other night, had made a statement which evidently produced such a strong impression upon the right honourable baronet (Sir Robert Peel) that he cheered it most vociferously (loud laughter), and his supporters on the opposite benches joined heartily in chorus (hear, hear). The letter he held in his hand referred to that statement, and for the contents of it he (Sir J. Tyrrell) would vouch, and would communicate privately on the subject with any honourable gentleman. It was from an Essex farmer, one of a body considerably alluded to in the course of these discussions. He began his letter thus:—'I see that Alderman Copeland mentioned on Friday night' (cries of 'order, order'). He supposed he was out of order in giving the name—'I see,' said the writer, 'that the hon. member for Stoke-upon-Trent' (laughter, and cries of 'order'). He did not know how he was out of order.

The SPEAKER—No letter can be read taking notice of a debate in this house.

Sir J. TYRRELL would put it in another form: "I see that it has been asserted by a member of a corporate body (laughter) that a farm in Yorkshire, containing nearly 900 acres, has lately been let to a farmer from Essex, at an increased rent of 200L per annum, and that he preferred such facts to all the arguments and eloquence on the opposite side. I am fearful this statement will injure our cause (laughter), and as I know the facts of the case, having been requested to look over it for my friend who hired it, I am induced to furnish you with the circumstances of the case, and shall feel obliged by your mentioning them as soon as you can in the House of Commons, and you will do our cause much good, as you will find our worthy alderman had not stated the whole facts of the case. This farm had been let in 1882 at a reduced rent of 200L, making the rent 1200L, having been previously 1400L. The person who has now hired it did at last agree to give the old rent of 1400L, the company to whom this property belongs having determined to take no less than that rent. But my friend has now hired it on such conditions as to make the present hiring far preferable to the old one. The landlords are now bound to expend a considerable sum, estimated by their surveyor at about 2000L, in erecting new buildings, fences, to find all tiles for draining, to allow 60 acres of grass to be broken up and converted to arable, and this farm being of a fine rich, deep staple, the tenant is also allowed to farm on the five-course system, taking oats after wheat, which the old tenant was debarred from doing (hear, hear). But above all, a clause is to be inserted in the lease, that in the event of agricultural protection being withdrawn (cheers), that the tenant is at liberty to quit the farm by giving notice, (cheering), in the event of its operation being to reduce the prices of his produce; and should his landlords not agree to let it to him on such terms as he might feel safe in continuing the occupation, he would be at liberty to leave it." Such was the letter of the Essex farmer, and he (Sir J. Tyrrell) regretted that the hon. member for Stoke-upon-Trent was not in his place that he might have read it; he would have seen that his statement, though not exactly true, was extremely well invented. The fact was, that if you gave some things the slightest twist their appearance was entirely altered. The hon. member for Stockport was not in his place; he had alluded to another Essex farmer, and had made a statement with just about as much foundation. However that hon. member was not present (cries of "here he is").

The laughter which accompanied this statement was very great. The Essex baronet could not perceive that, like a swimming pig, he was cutting his own throat with every sentence.

But a much more important statement was made. Mr. Liddell intimated that he will abandon his threatened opposition to the reduction of the duties on timber. He came to this determination because he had reason to believe that the shipping interest were in favour of the measure of the Government with respect to timber. It was singular that this part of the Government scheme should have been opposed by the shipping interest; for the high price of timber employed in the building of ships is at present the heaviest drawback on the British shipowners; and were the duty repealed, or greatly diminished, it is the common opinion amongst ship-builders that ships could be built cheaper in England than in any other part of the world. Moreover, it was demonstrated, if we remember right, in the course of Parliamentary discussion, at any rate it is demonstrable, that pretty nearly whatever number of ships were thrown out of the Canada trade would be employed in the trade with the north of Europe. However, Mr. Liddell has withdrawn his motion. This is one more instance to be added to the many others of the return of the people of this country to sounder notions of economic science.

The resolutions which were agreed to on Friday night, in committee on corn and customs, having been brought up,

Mr. Miles drew attention to Indian corn, which, of all the cereals, ranked next in importance to wheat, and the production of which in the United States was equivalent to 87,000,000 quarters, capable of being introduced into this country at a cost of 20s. the quarter. It would, therefore, enter into active competition with our agricultural produce, as food not merely for stock but for man, and would seriously affect the English farmer. He did not intend to move any amendment, because he was willing that Indian corn should be admitted for a temporary period, duty free, in order to mitigate the distress in Ireland; but he protested against the repeal of the duty being rendered permanent.

Mr. Cardwell thought that the apprehensions of Mr. Miles were exaggerated, and remarked upon the importance of endeavouring to introduce among that large portion of the Irish people whose staple food has hitherto been the potato, a taste for a nutritious grain, which, in combination with opportunities for obtaining employment, might be the means of effecting a great social change in Ireland.

A conversational discussion ensued, joined in by a number of members, during which Colonel Sibthorp, on hearing that the average wages of the Irish peasantry were only 2s. 4d. a-week, exclaimed, "The Lord have mercy on the people!" And Mr. Bright warned the agriculturists that their absurd opposition placed them in danger of losing not merely their Corn Law but their characters.

Sir John Rae Reid, who has been a Governor of the Bank of England, and is a great "city" commercial man, also stated that the protraction of the debate on the Corn Laws and the Tariff was paralysing trade and commerce, and urged the house to bring it to a close as speedily as possible. He was himself convinced that the measures of the Government were for the general benefit of the British empire.

Sir John Rae Reid was followed by another commercial authority, Mr. Labouchere, who, though not blaming the Government for imitating former precedents in appropriating public money for the purchase of food, in order to mitigate the present exigency in Ireland, protested against the principle as a dangerous one. One member, Lord George Bentinck, had told them that they ought to have bought up Irish oats. But no Government ought to act the part of a merchant. Burke, in his "Thoughts on Scarcity," had long ago pointed out how fatal it was for any Government to teach a people to rely on them for sustenance; and the soundness of the doctrine was unquestionable. Let them open the channels of trade and commerce; and in the introduction of such a grain as Indian corn, raise the bulk of the Irish people higher in the scale of social existence. He concurred with Sir J. R. Reid in deprecating further delay as most injurious to all our commercial and manufacturing interests.

The discussion, which turned on Indian grain, the duties of Irish landlords, and the extent of the potato rot, was closed by Lord George Bentinck, with some details of experiments on potatoes intended for seed. The report on the resolutions on the different corn duties was received and confirmed.

The House then went into committee on the resolutions for reducing the various duties in the Customs, which are included in the new tariff proposed by the Government. It was agreed that all opposition should be withdrawn, any objections to controverted items, as brandy and silk, being reserved to the bringing up of the report. The second reading of the Corn Bill is appointed for Monday next. But the discussion on the tariff did not pass without one interesting discussion. The interests of literature formed the topic of the night. Mr. Ewart proposed an amendment, when the article "books" was cited in the tariff, to the effect that the duty upon foreign books, the production of foreign authors, should, in Parliamentary phrase, henceforth cease and determine. There is no doubt that the Government made a most clumsy defence. Notwithstanding that Mr. Ewart had duly entered notice of his amendment, it would have seemed as though her Majesty's Ministers had been completely taken by surprise. No sooner was intelligence conveyed "up stairs," that the Government were a little embarrassed, than Mr. D'Israeli, and a compact body, entered the house, and took up their stations "under the gangway." After considerable discussion, during which Mr. Ewart intimated his intention of pressing his amendment,

Mr. Curteis rose, and said that if Sir Robert Peel were placed in a minority, as he seemed likely to be, he would be justified in throwing up his whole commercial scheme. He expressed his surprise that any member of the Anti-Corn-Law League should attempt to embarrass the Government.

Sir Robert Peel felt much obliged to Mr. Curteis for the spirit with which he had spoken. But he was perfectly aware that, having undertaken this task, he would have many difficulties to encounter. It would, however, be a great thing to bring it to a conclusion; and even if placed in a minority on this point he would not abandon the Government measures. But he hoped that members would look at them in the light of a comprehensive plan, and recollect that considerations of revenue frequently prevented for the time the adoption of propositions of which the principle was approved.

Mr. Gisborne and Mr. Wyse advised Mr. Ewart not to press his amendment, and to this appeal,

Mr. Ewart consented, feeling that the opinion of the house was with him, and that the question would be successful next year.

Mr. D'Israeli sarcastically assured the Government that they need not now be afraid of being placed in a minority until the great and comprehensive scheme was passed. Tomorrow they would repent of their decision; but when the public inquired why they could not indulge in the luxury of a foreign author at a cheap rate, they would be told that it was because the Government was in danger of being placed in a minority, and was rescued by an "Opposition" which supported instead of opposing them, but which was only aiding them to their ruin.

The amendment having been withdrawn, the discussion on the other articles was proceeded with. Towards the close of the discussion upon the article of wool, Lord John Russell remarked that as the duty upon corn was to terminate at the end of three years, so also should the remaining duty of 10 per cent. on woollen articles. The Premier received the suggestion favourably, and left us with the impression that his idea was that every vestige of protection is to be swept out of the customs books of England. He is completely confirmed in his system, and takes every opportunity of declaring that he is determined to adhere to it at all hazards. All this is most significant, as affecting the decision in the House of Lords.

Ultimately the whole of the tariff was gone through on Monday night. We now, therefore, begin to see our way. The Corn Law Bill is in the house; and it is to be hoped that the remainder will speedily follow.

PLYMOUTH FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION.—FREE TRADE AND PEACE.—On Thursday evening, the 26th ult., the Rev. W. J. Odgers, Unitarian minister, of Plymouth, and the President of the Mechanics' Institute, delivered an admirable lecture to this Association on the tendency of Free Trade to promote universal peace. The hall was crowded with a highly respectable audience, many of whom were not members of the Association, and the lecture was listened to with the greatest attention, the audience frequently testifying their pleasure and approbation by the most enthusiastic applause. W. Burnell, Esq., was in the chair, and briefly opened the business of the meeting, after which he introduced the lecturer. The Rev. W. J. Odgers then addressed the audience in a speech of great power. He considered the progress of international communication by steam and the rapid advancement of Free Trade principles as two great movements which were proceeding simultaneously to the accomplishment of the same grand object, "the weaving over the whole earth a web of mutual relations and dependencies, which, growing stronger and broader every year, must at length bind nations together in the bonds of peace." He then went forward into his subject, which he treated at great length, and enforced by a copious variety of argument and illustration. The rev. gentleman's speech was eloquent throughout, and frequently elicited the applause of a gratified and enlightened audience. At the close of the address, Lieut. J. D. Haswell proposed in glowing terms a vote of thanks to the lecturer, which was cordially seconded by Mr. Edward James. The vote was greeted with the heartiest applause, and a gentleman proposed that the lecture should be printed in a separate form, if the Rev. Mr. Odgers would consent to it. The rev. gentleman said he had no objection, and having acknowledged the thanks so kindly voted to him, a similar proposition was passed to the chairman for the able and impartial manner in which he had performed his duties, after which the meeting broke up.

THE ALLOTMENT SYSTEM AT REDDITCH.—The hon. R. H. Clive has given directions for the division into garden allotments of about 20 acres of valuable land in the immediate vicinity of Redditch. To prevent any supposed partiality in the distribution, the various lots were drawn for in the National School-room, at Redditch, on Monday week, under the immediate superintendence of John Maughan, Esq., the respected steward of the hon. R. H. Clive. Upwards of 140 persons have thus been supplied with ground, at a cheap rent, to grow sufficient vegetables for their families. There were many more applicants than could be accommodated; but Mr. Maughan held out the hope that if the present experiment was found to work well, Mr. Clive would be disposed to extend it.—Worcester Journal.

Sir Robert Peel has shown a disposition to detract from the grace of large and liberal concessions by paltry reservations or postponement; and, on the principle of "like master like man," Sir James Graham, in his very small way, cannot help imitating the Premier's policy. The abolition of bone crushing is not to be total and immediate, but the practice is to be continued for three months in several workhouses.

Among the Chinese no relics are more highly valued than the boots that have been worn by an upright magistrate.

(From the Times.)

The papers laid on the table of the House of Commons on Monday night, and ordered to be printed, exhibit some very interesting results.

The first of these is an account of the number of vessels, the amount of tonnage, and the number of their crews, on the 31st of December in each year, from 1820 to 1844.

In 1820 the number of vessels was 25,374, the tonnage 2,648,593, the number of men employed 174,514. In 1841 there were 30,052 vessels, of 3,512,480 tons, manned by 210,198 men. In 1844 there were 31,320 vessels, of 3,637,231 tons, and 216,350 seamen.

The number of British vessels entered inwards in 1832 was 10,762, whose untold burden was 1,936,846 tons; the foreign vessels were 3,865, of 561,047 tons. In 1845 the number of British vessels was 15,364, and their tonnage 3,669,853; the number of foreign vessels 7,895, and their tonnage 1,353,735.

The declared value of British and Irish produce and manufactures exported from the United Kingdom to foreign countries and our colonial possessions was in—

1827	36,860,376
1841	51,634,623
1842	47,381,023
1843	52,279,709
1844	58,584,292

The net revenue of the Customs, and the amount of duty received from corn, from 1839 to 1845, were as follows:

	Revenue.	Corn Duties.
1839	21,583,997	1,098,858
1840	21,784,499	1,156,636
1841	21,898,844	568,340
1842	21,025,145	1,363,969
1843	21,033,717	758,293
1844	22,504,821	1,098,382
1845	20,196,856	367,008

With respect to the silk trade, the returns are extremely full, but we have only room for one or two extracts. The quantity of silk of all kinds entered for home consumption in 1814 was 3,119,974lb., in 1844 it had risen to 4,011,048lb., but in 1844 it had only reached 4,522,351lb., while in 1844 it amounted to 6,208,021lb.

The declared value of British silk goods exported from the United Kingdom in each year between 1826 and 1845 exhibits since the year 1825 a comparative decrease. The value of the silk exported in 1826 was 168,801l., but in 1835 this amount had increased to 973,786l.; in 1837 it had fallen to 503,673l.; and although from that time the value declared continues to increase, it had in 1845 only reached 764,424l.

The quantities of foreign silk manufactures retained for home consumption since the removal of the prohibition upon them in 1826, exhibit a gradual rise from 115,278lb. in 1827, to 410,153lb. in 1845.

The table respecting wool and woollen manufactures is especially interesting, but we have only space to give a few of the results, which prove that an increased importation has had the effect of increasing instead of lowering the price of domestic produce. In 1824 the number of pounds of foreign and colonial wool imported was 22,544,485; and the price of Southdown wool 1s. 3d. a pound. In the following year the duty upon colonial wool was removed, the import increased to 43,816,966lb., and the price of Southdown wool simultaneously rose to 1s. 4d. a pound. During the next 20 years the price fluctuated from 6d. to 1s. 8d. a pound, and in 1843 it was at 11½d., with an import of 47,785,061 pounds. In 1844 the duty upon foreign wool was entirely removed, the quantity entered for consumption increased to 65,079,524lb., and the price of English wool rose at once to 1s. 2d. In 1845 the amount imported had further increased to 76,828,152lb., and the price of domestic wool had risen to 1s. 4d.

Between 1831 and 1845 the declared value of British exports of woollen manufactures had risen from 5,389,124l. to 8,741,728l.

In 1842 the total amount of revenue, exclusive of the corn duties, was 32,178,814l.; in 1845 it was 33,415,431l., although during that period the amount of Customs and Excise duties remitted was 5,197,074l.

The amount of reductions in the public expenditure effected by the repeal of the duties on auctions and glass, in 1845, is not less than 52,636l.

A number of extracts from the letters of glass manufacturers in every part of the kingdom, stating the immense increase of consumption consequent upon the removal of the glass duty, is appended to the important paper from which we have made these extracts.

RESULTS OF THE FREE TRADE POLICY.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

A few days since Sir Robert Peel moved for the production of a number of accounts relating to the shipping, revenue, and the exports and imports of the United Kingdom, calculated to illustrate the effects of some of the most important changes which have taken place in our commercial legislation, from the commencement of Mr. Huskisson's reforms to the present day. The paper containing these several accounts was published yesterday.

As a display of commercial facts the paper moved for by Sir Robert Peel is one of the most important that has been presented to the public for a long time. Not that there is much, if anything, that is new in it, but that most of the great arguments of experience by which the triumph of Free Trade principles has been achieved are here marshalled in all the imposing array of an official review. Every line is an argument in favour of the Minister's policy, and every page refutes hundreds of fallacies, many of them so long interwoven, as it were, with our most cherished national prejudices and maxims.

We know not if we have been indebted to the childish and absurd petition of certain shipowners, against the introduction of good and cheap timber, for the timely production of these papers, but the accounts open with an unanswerable reply to the complaints of this class of inveterate monopolists. Shipowners are the only class of mercantile men who have fairly and perseveringly contested with farmers the character of being the most aggrieved men on earth. They too, like the farmers, have divided their anxieties between the care of the Legislature and the dread of the elements. Ever since a shipowner owned ships he has been an aggrieved man—hastening on to destruction. For the last twenty years, since Huskisson relaxed the navigation laws, the continuance of which threatened destruction to our commerce, this class of men have beset Parliament year after year with new representations of their woes and their wrongs, till at length we really believe they have got the world and even some of themselves to give credence to their statements. But what tale does the statistics of the Premier tell? Why since the period when the death-warrant of this interest was signed by Mr. Huskisson, in 1824, notwithstanding the yearly ruin falling on the poor shipowner, we find that, independent of all the ships built to replace those lost at sea, the entire shipping of the country has increased more than one million of tons! The following is the comparison of the property of this class, possessed in 1824 and 1844:

1844	31,320	3,637,231	216,350

What disinterested men must these be, to increase so much their investments in a constantly losing trade!

But these gentlemen have not only so largely increased their stock of ships, but these accounts show that they have also been driving a most active trade. The tonnage of ship-plug entered inwards and outwards from our ports has, even since 1832, increased more than one hundred per cent.!

The following is the comparison:

	Ships entered inwards.	Cleared outwards.
	Vessels.	Tons.
1832	14,627	2,497,893
1845	23,859	5,023,588

True, says the grumbling shipowner, navigation has increased enough; but the Danes and the Prussians, the Americans and the Dutch, trade to our ports on the same conditions as our own "native ships," and run away with all the trade. But what says the Minister's facts? True it is that the entries inwards and clearances outwards of foreign shipping have increased each about 800,000 tons; but the entries inwards of British ships have in the same time increased no less than 1,700,000 tons, and the clearances outwards 1,300,000 tons. The comparison from these returns is thus:

	SHIPS ENTERED	OUTWARDS.
	British.	Foreign.
1832	1,936,846	561,047
1845	3,669,853	1,353,735

	SHIPS ENTERED	INWARDS.
	British.	Foreign.
1832	1,637,093	466,333
1845	2,947,257	1,361,940

	Increase ..	792,688

The last 20 years has been a period of constant, unvarying ruin to the shipowner—sometimes a little more, sometimes a little less—but still always of ruin; nevertheless they have added to their tonnage by nearly fifty per cent., and while they have been driven from the field by the competition of Danes and Prussians, they have nevertheless managed to sail two additional ships for every one that their competitors have forced into our trade. And what an astounding fact for these grumblers against foreign competition to know, that for every additional ton of foreign shipping that has been forced into the British ports under these acts of reciprocity, they, the British shipowners, have forced into foreign ports more than two additional tons of British shipping! While 805,607 tons of additional foreign shipping have brought cargoes into our ports, 1,732,907 tons of British shipping have carried cargoes from here to enter their ports. Mr. Liddell has displayed a sound discretion in abandoning the case of the malcontent shipowners, who think a carrying trade can be best improved by narrowing traffic and throwing impediments in the way of commercial intercourse.

So much for the shipowners. Then comes a table exhibiting the value of British and Irish produce and manufactures exported in each year since 1827, distinguishing the proportions shipped to each of the chief quarters of the world. By this table it appears that the value of our exports, which in 1827 was only 36,860,376l., has increased until it last year amounted to 58,584,292l. In this increase we at once discover the great source from which new employment for an increasing population has been derived. What facts of immense social importance crowd upon the mind in contemplating this additional demand for more than twenty millions of value of our goods! How many families, who would otherwise have been steeped in pauperism, burthens to their country, have, by this employment, been raised into respectable and useful members of society! How much crime and misery have been saved, how much benefit diffused by this employment! But how could this increase of trade have been secured, except by those means which Mr. Huskisson took to reduce the cost of our products, by the reduction of duties on all raw materials, and on the chief articles which constituted our imports? Cheap wool and cheap flax were necessary to make the cheap woollens and linens which would secure a market abroad. Cheap coffee and other produce, received in payment of our exports, were equally necessary to secure their consumption here. And, above all things, a free navigation was necessary to facilitate that intercourse.

But this table exhibits a fact, often referred to by Free Traders against the principle of protection, which is not very tasteful to the self-love and prejudices of our countrymen, who deem all the world besides as deserving of so little consideration as compared with our colonial empire. For the sake of the trade to our colonies, no sacrifice has been regarded as too great. England has been always represented as repaid for the high price paid to Canada for bad timber, and to the West Indies for sugar, by the enormous amount of our goods taken by those colonies. Exports and foreign trade have been in the popular mind as much associated with colonies, timber, and sugar, as wages are with labour. A column in the table before us exhibits the proportion of our whole exports to those colonies in each year, and proclaims the unwelcome and humiliating truth to British prejudice, that while even in 1827 they amounted only to about 15 per cent. of our whole exports, in 1844 they little exceed 8 per cent., and that in fact they are the only markets to which, with all the care and protection bestowed upon them, our exports have remained stationary, the average of the last three years not being quite equal to that of the first three years of the period. The comparison between the first and last year of the period of the amount of our exports to the different divisions of markets is as follows:

Northern Europe	28,533,563	21,328,797
Southern Europe	5,915,751	11,291,338
Africa	671,481	1,615,580
Asia	4,799,432	11,273,721
United States	7,018,272	7,938,079

What pretence can now be found to reconcile the English public to continue to pay a high price for bad timber, or a price for their sugar at least 50 per cent. above their Continental neighbours?

Sir Robert Peel appears to have been roused by Mr. D'Israeli's flight—or, perhaps, we should say descent—into the region of statistics. The member for Shrewsbury, getting out of his element, found himself bewildered by the statistics of the import and consumption of silk, when, substituting figures of arithmetic figures of speech, he held that the reduction of the silk duties had been a palpable failure. He quoted figures to show that the trade had fallen off. It is plain that Mr. D'Israeli had been hoaxed into the belief that Free Trade had converted our silk manufactures from what they were 20 years ago into a manufacture of a material the mere refuse of silk. The monopolists constantly assert that all the increase in the silk trade has been in what is termed "waste knubs and husks." It is quite true that in this, as in all branches, our trade has increased. But Sir R. Peel here gives us an account separating this description of silk from the fine raw silk, and showing the imports in each year since 1814. An abstract of that table, giving the quantities consumed in decennial periods, is attached, the result of which is as follows:

AGGREGATE QUANTITIES CONSUMED IN TEN YEARS.

	Raw Silk.	Waste and Husks.	Thrown Silk.
	lbs.	lbs.	lbs.
1814—1823	15,214,245	585,906	3,608,872
1824—1833	32,916,995	2,891,515	3,742,825
1834—1843	37,425,114	1,924,815	2,657,189

AVERAGE IN EACH YEAR.

1814—1823	1,521,424	58,591	360,887
1824—1833	3,291,699	289,151	387,284
1834—1843	3,742,511	1,92,481	265,718

--------------	-----------	-----------	---------

Mr. D'Israeli is quite right in saying that the consumption of "something called waste and husks, a sort of refuse," has increased; but here also is the undoubted fact that the fine raw silk, the annual consumption of which, in the 10 years prior to the reduction of duty and the removal of the monopoly to the Spitalfields manufactures, was only 1,521,424lbs., had increased, in 1844, to 4,021,808lbs.!!

Sir Robert Peel follows up this display of the success of these measures by a still more startling evidence of the benefits of competition. When we had dear silk, and highly protected silk goods, we might force our people at home to purchase them, but we could command no foreign trade. Hence, if the home trade was bad, Spitalfields had no other resource than public charity; no foreign markets to fall back upon. But with Free Trade and cheaper goods, a foreign trade has rapidly risen in silk goods, as in all others. In 1826, by the tables before us, our exports of silk goods amounted only to 168,801l.; and in 1845 to 764,424l. But the most curious fact shown by this table is, that, with the single exception of the United States, we now export a larger quantity of silk goods to France than to any other country in the world, and more than to all our colonial possessions together; another very unkind cut to John Bull's colonial prejudices.

The Minister next goes on to show the result of the reduction in the timber duties in 1842. We recently alluded to this subject in detail, and shall again have occasion to do so when the timber duties come to be discussed. Under the reduction of duty a rapid increase of consumption has followed. The following is the comparison of the three years in which the low duties have been in operation:

TIMBER ENTERED FOR CONSUMPTION.

	Colonial	Foreign
	Deals, Batten, &c. Loads.	Deals, Batten, &c. Loads.
1843	347,366	605,994
1844	398,194	551,994
1845	498,891	797,490

The duty received has rapidly risen at the reduced rates, thus:

1843	£64,495
1845	1,042,105

Thus, while the consumer is benefited, the revenue progresses by the increased consumption.

Sir Robert Peel next furnishes the statistics connected with the import of wool, and the various changes in the duty upon that article. In an elaborate article upon the new commercial policy of the Government, published in the Chronicle at the beginning of the recent debate, we laid all these particulars in minute detail before our readers. At the duty of 6d. per lb., in 1823, we imported 19,300,725 lbs. of foreign wool; at that period the price of English South Down wool was 1s. 3½d. the lb., and that of Kent wool 1s. the lb. In 1824 the duty was reduced to a nominal rate, and in 1844 removed altogether. What has been the result? In 1845 the quantity of foreign wool imported was 76,828,152 lbs. (about four times the supply of 1823); the price of English South Down wool was 1s. 4d., and that of Kent wool 1s. 3d. Just imagine what increased employment the consumption of that additional quantity of material has afforded to our people, and to the injury of no existing interest! The export of woollen goods has increased from £5,636,586 in 1823 to £8,741,728 in 1845.

This interesting and important paper concludes by some statements exhibiting the great benefits which have resulted from the repeal of some of the excise duties, and especially of that upon glass. A statement is furnished of the particulars of the reductions effected since the repeal in 1845 of the duties on auctions and glass, in the Excise establishment. The salaries thus saved to the public amount to no less a sum than £52,636 per annum. At the same time, the most gratifying fact is announced, that most of the officers so discontinued have been selected to fill other situations which have fallen vacant, and that no new appointment will take place till every displaced officer has been taken back into active employment.

In conclusion, we must repeat, that this document contains a mass of facts which vindicate not only the wisdom, but also the benevolence of Free Trade; which prove that it has been, as far as applied, an unalloyed benefit and blessing. The importance of such a document at this time will fully justify the length which we have considered it.

HOW CAN LAND BEST BE RELIEVED?

(From the Economist.)

In an article under this title, in the Economist of the 21st ult., we endeavoured to show to what extent the agricultural class as a body, and land as a property, have been relieved from public taxes and local burdens during the last thirty years, by the increase which has taken place during that period of the manufactures and commerce of the country, first, by the means they have afforded of providing profitable employment for the whole addition to the population which has taken place; second, by the relief which a distribution of the public taxes of the country over a greater number of persons has afforded to each, and to the agricultural class as a body in particular; and third, by the relief which land has obtained, by the greater amount of all other real property during that period, and consequently the greater proportion of all burdens which such property bears. The Union Magazine for the present month contains an article based on the same facts to which we alluded in our paper of the 21st ult., but worked out in greater detail, so as to show the exact results of the operations of all these causes. Following our former remarks, and the calculations submitted by the writer in the Union, we now propose to place these results before our readers, as showing in a stronger light than any which we have yet seen, the enormous advantages which land as a property, and the agricultural class as a body, have derived from the rapid increase of our commerce, and our manufacturing system—advantages of which that class has hitherto been so unconscious as rather to regard these rising interests as dangerous rivals than profitable allies.

In looking to the relief which land has experienced by the absorption of the surplus population in manufactures, it is necessary to refer to the fact that in the beginning of the present century the maintenance of the poor was becoming a charge which threatened the annihilation of rent altogether. The increase of this charge in the sixty-eight years from 1750 to 1818 is thus shown by a recent Parliamentary return. The sums raised in England and Wales, for the maintenance of the poor, were, at the respective dates, as follows:

1776	1,730,317	1814	8,388,974
1785	2,167,750	1818	9,320,000

It is thus apparent that a rapid inroad was being made in the rent of property—an evil of itself so great, that had no means arisen to have relieved land from the threatened danger, the State must have adopted some expensive plan of doing so. But whatever plan might have been adopted, it must be obvious that it could only have been a temporary relief. Another surplus number would soon have risen up, and sooner or later the whole value of the land would have been swallowed up, either by the expense of emigration, or for the support of the population at home. For the land there was no escape, except by an increase of those occupations which would profitably employ the people. To this end our manufacturing system, happily for the land, rose into importance just in time to avert the catastrophe with which land was threatened.

As noticed in our former article, we find by the last census returns that the proportions of the population engaged in agriculture and otherwise were, in the different years, as follows:

	Engaged in agriculture.	Other pursuits.
1811	35 per cent.	65 per cent.
1821	33	67
1841	22	78

In the first ten years of the period in question only two per cent. of the population was transferred from land to other pursuits; in the second ten years, five per cent.; and in the third ten years, six per cent.; making in the whole period thirteen per cent. of the population which have been transferred from a dependence upon agriculture to other pursuits.

Taking the two extreme periods, we then find the population of Great Britain at each divided in the following proportions:

	Employed in agriculture.	Otherwise employed.	The whole population of Great Britain.
1811	4,408,880	8,187,923	12,596,803
1841	4,145,775	14,698,659	18,844,434
Decrease	263,105	Increase 6,510,736	Increase 6,247,631

We thus see that while the whole population increased by 6,247,631 persons, or 49½ per cent., the population employed in agriculture actually diminished by 263,105 persons. If agriculture had maintained its own share of the increase during that period, the distribution of the population in 1841 would have been as follows:

	Employed in agriculture.	Increase to 1841.
1811	4,408,880	49½ per cent.
Otherwise	8,187,923	12,596,803
Total	12,596,803	Total 18,844,434

Which comparison shows that, while land at this time furnishes employment to 2,445,501 persons fewer in proportion to the whole population, that that number have found occupation in other pursuits.

We are very apt to underrate the importance of evils which have not really been experienced, but which, by the timely interference of some agency, have been averted. It is, however, clear, that but for the increase of our commerce and manufacturing system, which have absorbed not only the natural increase of the numbers belonging to them, but which have relieved the land of its whole increase of population during the last thirty years, the rents and profits of land would by this time have suffered a great reduction for the maintenance of an idle and unemployed population, which, on the contrary, have been converted into valuable customers as consumers of the produce of the soil. By this means the danger which threatened the absorption in time of all rent has been averted, and that which constituted the danger converted into a positive good.

It will be useful now to follow out the effects of this new distribution of the population upon the general taxation and local burdens borne by each class. In a former article we have shown that the general taxation of the country amounted, in the year 1811, to 65,173,545, or at the rate of 37. 10s. 3d. to each person of the whole population of the United Kingdom; while in 1841 the general taxes amounted only to 51,911,588, or at the rate of 17. 18s. 10d. to each individual of the United Kingdom. The writer in the Union then shows the proportion of the taxation contributed by each class at the two periods as follows:

	Taxation.	Rate per head.	Agricultural population.	Their proportion.
1811	65,173,545	£ s. d.	10,167,023	15,982,190
1841	51,911,588	1 18 10	14,698,659	8,049,709
Less contributed by land				7,932,481

	Taxation.	Rate per head.	Other population.	Their proportion.
1811	65,173,545	£ s. d.	10,167,023	28,760,070
1841	51,911,588	1 18 10	14,698,659	28,339,897
Less contributed by other classes				230,182

Of the reduction of the taxation, therefore, amounting to 13,261,957*l.* between 1811 and 1841 for the whole of the United Kingdom, the agricultural class in Great Britain has profited to the extent of 7,932,481*l.*, while the other class, comprising the rest of the population of that part of the United Kingdom, has profited only by 230,182*l.* "If," says the writer in the Union, "the general taxation of the country had been borne, in 1841, in the same proportion by the agricultural class, and the rest of the community, as they existed in 1811, the former would have contributed thereto 12,798,059*l.* instead of 8,049,709*l.*, and the latter would only have contributed 23,791,547*l.* instead of 28,539,897*l.* Thus, by the increase of numbers which had found occupation in manufactures, commerce, &c., the landed interest, as a class, was relieved of taxes, on this account only, of 4,748,350*l.*"

Passing on to the consideration of local burdens, we extract from the Union Magazine the following calculations bearing on this branch of the subject:—

"The operation of the property and income-tax also exhibits, in a striking manner, the relief which land has experienced, in the proportion of the general burdens of the state which it is called upon to bear. In 1814, according to the Parliamentary papers of that year, we find that the whole amount of income derived from real property of various kinds was 57,129,047*l.*, proportioned as follows:—

Land	£37,666,347 or 66 per cent.
All other kinds of property	19,462,700 or 34 per cent.
£57,129,047	100

"In 1843, according to a Parliamentary return of last session, the income from real property had increased to 95,284,497*l.*, proportioned as follows:—

Land	£45,753,615 or 48 per cent.
All other property	49,530,882 or 52 per cent.
£95,284,497	100

"Thus, while land alone, in 1814, contributed 66 per cent. to the property tax, and all other property only 34 per cent., notwithstanding the increased value of land from 37,666,347*l.* to 45,753,615*l.*, per annum, other kinds of property have risen into existence, chiefly the result of manufacturing and commercial enterprise, to share the burdens of taxation with the land, so that the latter now bears only 48 per cent., instead of 66 per cent., as in 1814, while the former bears now 52 per cent., in place of 34 per cent. in 1814.

"According to a Parliamentary return, the property-tax under schedule A yielded, in the year ended 5th of April, 1843, 2,150,412*l.* Had this sum been contributed by land and other property in the proportions which they bore to each other in 1814, the sum charged on each would have been:—

On land, 66 per cent.	£1,419,271
On other property, 34 per cent.	731,141
£2,150,412

"But, instead of which, this tax has actually been contributed in the following proportions:—

By land, 48 per cent.	£1,033,193
By other property, 52 per cent.	1,117,220

Thus showing that, in this item, the relief which 'land,' as a property, has experienced by the increase of other classes of property, is equal to 386,079*l.* annually.

"But to pass from general to local taxation, we will now consider the effect which the creation of so much real property, other than land, has had in relieving the land from the charges of the Poor Rate, County Rates, and other local burdens. In 1814, the whole amount levied for the relief of the poor was 8,388,974*l.*, which was charged on land and other property, in the following proportions, assuming that property was rated for local purposes in the same proportion as to the property and income tax:—

Land, 66 per cent.	£5,536,719
Other property, 34 per cent.	2,852,255
£8,388,974

"The amount levied for the poor's rate, in 1843, was 6,552,890*l.*, which, according to a similar principle, was apportioned as follows:—

On land, 48 per cent.	£3,145,368
Other property, 52 per cent.	3,407,522
£6,552,890

showing that land has actually been relieved during that period, under the head of poor rate, to the amount of 2,291,321*l.*, while other property contributes the sum of 555,247*l.* more at present than in 1814. The present amount of poor rate, levied now in the same proportion as in 1814, would be charged thus:—

On land, 66 per cent.	£4,324,905
On other property, 34 per cent.	2,227,984
£6,552,890

which, when compared with the proportions really charged, show that land has been relieved of its relative share of this burden, by a sum equal to 1,179,518*l.*, which sum has been transferred to the relative proportion of this charge borne by other property. Again, with respect to the county rate, we find a similar result. In 1814, the amount levied for 'county rate' was 573,504*l.*, which was contributed in the following proportions:—

By land, 66 per cent.	£378,510
By other property, 34 per cent.	194,994
£573,504

In 1843 the sum levied for this rate was 1,003,651*l.* in the following proportions:—

On land, 48 per cent.	£481,753
On other property, 52 per cent.	521,898
£1,003,651

But which, if levied in the same proportions as in 1814, would have been contributed:—

By land, 66 per cent.	£662,408
By other property, 34 per cent.	341,243

which shows that land contributes now relatively less to this object, by the sum of 180,657*l.*, than in 1814, and that other property contributes relatively more by that sum. Every other local rate, chargeable on real property, has undergone during that period, a similar relative change in favour of land.

"Leaving out of view altogether the actual reductions of burdens, for general and local objects, which have taken place during the last 30 years, as not so distinctly traceable to the immediate influence of extended commerce and manufactures, we will now sum up the relative difference which now exists in the proportion of those charges which attach to those employed in agriculture and the rest of the community—to land and other property now, as compared with 1814—which has been caused entirely by an extension of our trade, the additional employment it has afforded, and the new property which it has called into existence.

AGRICULTURAL CLASS, AND LAND.		Proportion of burdens actually contributed in 1814.	If contributed in the same proportion as in 1814.
General taxation	£8,049,709	£12,798,059
Property tax	1,033,192	1,419,271
Poor's rate	3,145,388	4,324,906
County rate	481,753	662,408
	£12,710,042		£19,204,644

Annual relative saving to land, over and above the actual reductions of burdens	£6,494,602
£19,204,644

ALL OTHER CLASSES AND ALL OTHER PROPERTY. Proportion actually contributed in 1843. If contributed in the same proportion as in 1814.

General taxation	£28,539,897	£23,791,547
Property tax	1,117,220	731,141
Poor's rate	3,407,502	2,227,984
County rate	521,898	341,243
£33,586,517		£27,091,915
Annual additional relative sum contributed		£6,494,602

"We thus arrive at the remarkable fact, that not only has the land been relieved of the maintenance of its own natural increase of population, amounting, in the last thirty years, to no fewer than 2,445,501 persons, but land, as a property, and the agricultural class, as a body, have been relieved of taxes, general and local, to the extent of no less than 6,494,602*l.* annually, wholly and entirely by the increase of our commerce and manufactures, which have afforded profitable employment to such an increased proportion of the population, and which have led to the creation of so much additional fixed property in various ways, which has shared with land all the burdens chargeable upon real property."

This sum, however, of 6,494,602*l.* represents only the "relative saving to land over and above the actual reductions of burdens," but the calculations furnish all the materials by which we can compute the actual increase of rental and diminution of general taxes and local burdens which have occurred between the two periods in question:

In 1814 the rent of land returned to the income tax	£37,666,347
In 1843 it had increased to	45,753,615
Increase of rent	£8,087,268

TAXATION AND LOCAL BURTHENS.		8,087,208
Share of general taxation in 1811 ..	£ 15,982,190 In 1841	£ 8,049,709
Poor rate, 1814 ..	5,536,719 In 1843	3,145,368
County rate, 1814 ..	378,510 In 1843	481,753

Reduction of taxes and local burdens	11,676,850

Thus while the rental of this country has increased by 8,087,268*l.*, the general taxes and local burdens contributed by land as a property, and the agricultural class as a body, have been diminished by 10,220,569*l.* annually, independent of the numerous special exemptions from particular taxes which have during that period been extended to this class.

We sincerely trust that the inquiry which has now been awakened upon these subjects will convince landowners how much their true interests are bound up with an uninterrupted progress of the trade and manufactures of the country by which alone a profitable occupation can be found for the increasing population and the capital of the country, to the general benefit of all, and that from this source they will find the safest and surest relief of their existing burdens.

COOGAN v. LUCKETT.

Mr. Wellsby for the Appellant; Mr. Grove for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—This must be a question of fact if anything can be a question of fact: the revising barrister has come to a conclusion, and he has not stated any facts that enable us to say that he is wrong.

MR. JUSTICE MAULE.—The principle in this case is not one of law, but a convenient using of fact. It might as well be called a principle of law to say that several surveyors were called in to form an estimate, and that they were all of opinion that this was a clear annual value of 10*l.* There is clearly no question of law in this case; and therefore the decision ought to be affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE CRESSWELL concurred.

MR. JUSTICE ERLE.—I think the test for annual value is that which I have endeavoured to express once or twice—what the premises will let for fairly under ordinary circumstances, deducting what the tenant ordinarily had to pay. That is the principle laid down frequently; and I think it is applicable in this case.

Decision affirmed.

BISHOP v. SMEDLEY.

Mr. Arnold for the Appellant; Mr. Merewether for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—It appears to me, the decision of the revising barrister was proper under the circumstances of this case. The 36th section of the Act says, that if the occupier's name is not on the rate, he may insist on having it put on; and if there is a refusal, it shall be a sufficient claim to have the right to put it on, if he actually pays or tenders the full amount of the rate then due for that purpose. It is perfectly clear he did not actually pay, and it seems to me as clear that he did not tender the full amount of the rate due for that purpose; for it appears to me when he called upon the overseers, and after inquiring whether any rates were due, the overseer saying he did not know, when he tells the overseer that he is prepared to pay what is due, and the overseer says, "I will submit," if he goes away and never comes again, it seems to me he goes away on the mutual understanding that the overseer is to look into the book and see what it is, and that when he comes again he shall know what it is. The case goes on to state that he never made any further inquiries. Therefore, the parties are to each other re infesta in the position of having begun a transaction and not having come to a conclusion. Therefore, it is enough to say, without going into the two points made by the revising barrister, that he has decided the case rightly; and as we have not felt any doubt in the case, in point of law, the decision must be affirmed with costs.

COOKE v. LUCKETT.

Mr. Wellsby for the Appellant; Mr. Grove for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—The alteration being made in the statement of the case for your determination has relieved it, as it appears to me, of some difficulty. It appears now that the learned gentleman, the revising barrister, thought that the mistake of No. 3 for No. 4 was one that brought the case within the 75th section of the Registration Act, as one of inaccurate description; he thought that it was an amendable mistake, and held so under the powers of the Act. A doubt was raised whether it was such an alteration, and he thought it was; and therefore, so far as that part of the question is concerned, there is an end to that; and the only point to consider is, whether the facts show the appellant had been called upon bona fide to pay, and had done so in respect of such premises, which premises we must now take as rightly described. The facts showed that the tenant's name was upon the rate, but that having agreed with his landlord to give a larger sum of money for the occupation of the premises, it was on the landlord's part agreed that he would pay all the parish rates and some of the taxes. It appears to me that the payment of them by the landlord is bona fide under the circumstances of the tenant being rated, that the tenant is bona fide called upon to pay in respect of such premises the rates of the parish, and that he has actually bona fide paid the same. I cannot understand that the words "bona fide called upon" means of necessity a personal call, or a personal demand of the rate; but it appears that the tenant's name being upon the parish rate, he is the only person who can in law be called upon by the parish officers to pay the rate. He is the person who must either answer it by actual payment through himself or through some other person, and he is liable to a distress from having his name upon the parish rate book; and therefore it seems to me he is called upon in law to pay the rate. There could be no greater notoriety than the actually calling at the door and asking him to pay the rate in consequence of seeing the name already in the rate book—therefore it seems to me to satisfy these words. He is called upon to pay it in person or by deputy—not necessarily by his own hand. It is stated he did actually pay, and as the words are satisfied, the decision is wrong, and must be reversed.

Mr. JUSTICE MAULE.—I think also this decision must be reversed. I think there was a bona fide payment of the rate, and that the appellant was bona fide called upon to pay the rate within the meaning of section 75 of the Registration Act. It is by no means clear that it is necessary, in order to support his vote, to have recourse to that section, because I incline to think that without the assistance of that section, on a due construction of the 27th section of the Reform Act, the vote might have been properly allowed. The Reform Act is not entirely in the dark with respect to the purpose and intent of the different provisions of that Act. In section 27 of that Act the elective franchise is conferred upon persons occupying 104 houses. There might be set up an occupation for the purpose of the franchise, where they were not bona fide occupiers entirely, and it may well be that they should be willing to take the benefit but not to incur the burthens of that occupation; and therefore the section requires, amongst other things, that the party shall be rated and pay the rates,—not merely the putting himself on the list of 104 householders for the purpose of the franchise, but that he shall also submit to the liabilities of such a person in respect to the matters in the ordinary and usual course, such as having to pay rates. Further, another object may be that he shall be the person who shall be called on by the parish, and those who have to make the rates as the person occupying the property, and to a sufficient amount. In order to effect that purpose, the 27th section says he must be rated, and that he must pay the rates. We have had several cases on the question of what payment of a rate amounts to, and it has been contended it must be paid by the very hand of the person liable to pay it. Now, generally speaking, the thing required to be done by the statute, or the law, need not be done in his own person unless there is some sufficient reason for it; and it clearly is of the least necessity that the payment should be made by a particular person by his own hand; because, if the money comes out of his pocket and goes into the pocket of the person entitled to receive it, it seems perfectly immaterial whose hand it is that conveys it—the party paying and the party receiving being the same. Possibly we might quote cases in which the difference arises, but there is no difference arising out of the intermediate adventure of the money in transitu. Therefore, there is no doubt that a person who gets another to pay for him out of his funds and allows it to another person in account, is the person who, within the meaning of this statute, pays the rate. This is meant to exclude a gratuitous payment by some person of that kind, who does not pay as the agent of a party liable, or out of his funds, or to be repaid by him; but a person who pays voluntarily a sum which he is in no way under a pecuniary contract to pay, but pays it so as to fall within some of the mischief intended to be prevented by Parliamentary law. But there cannot be a doubt that a payment which has been procured by the services of any other, bona fide, and which one man gets another to pay for him, is a payment by the person who has recourse to that means of making it. Here there was a complete payment within the sections of the Reform Act and the Registration Act. The main question that turns upon this is, whether the applicant can be said to have been, bona fide, called upon to pay. Now section 75 of the Registration Act, is not necessarily a new law in all cases; it may be that it helps some new cases that would not hold by the 27th section of the Reform Act, but no doubt it is meant to apply to many cases in which that section of the Reform Act would apply without its assistance; but the 75th section is to relieve doubts that may exist in cases that ought to be decided in favour of the franchise independent of the new enactment of the statute of Victoria: and it is to facilitate the decision of such cases, and to relieve the obscurity, and to enable the court and the revising barrister to come rapidly and easily to the conclusion he ought to have arrived at, and would have done so, but with difficulty, under section 27. And therefore, that being the case, it must necessarily happen that there are many cases in which the decision would have been the same if the statute of Victoria had not been passed; and I am inclined to think this is one, and that within the 27th section the appellant was rated for No. 3, which was called by mistake No. 4, as if it had been, that "a house in Black Lane" had been put instead of "Red Lane," which would come I think within the 27th section; and if that be so, then no doubt could arise with respect to the words, "bona fide called on," for they are not in section 27, and not being so in the 27th section of the Reform Act, that therefore throws great light on the term in the section of the Act of Victoria; because that section is intended in the cases where there is innocent error and mistake—without mala fide by substituting that which is substantially the same, in effect, as a formal compliance which is required by the 27th section, and a compliance would be to substitute that for a formal compliance which is the same in effect but not in form. Now what is the effect of being distinctly and accurately rated? Why, it is intended that it may effectually draw the attention of those parties whose business it is to be informed of the matter who it is liable to pay the rate, and this is done by putting that person on the rate to inform him also that he is to be called upon in respect of occupying certain premises, to pay a certain sum of money, being assessed by authority of law, and that such amount he is called upon to pay to the overseers. All that is the effect of accurate rating; and the statute of Victoria says, that when there shall be inaccuracy, which there possibly may be, that is to be removed: not in all cases of mistake, but in such cases only where the substance has been complied with, not in those in which he shall either be on or off the rate, for there may be some cases where the rate did not show that the voter or claimant was called upon to pay so much to such persons; and you may take the call and the rate together, and say he was bona fide called upon by the rate, together with some other information he had received, so as to exclude everything from the case except a fraudulent mistake, so as to make the liability acknowledged by the claimant, and to make it notified by calling upon him. It may be error, and I am strongly inclined to think the law on that point to be defective; the rating is not merely that he may know to whom he is to pay the amount, for that may be helped; if the overseers be in earnest in the matter by, calling upon him, and thus effectually give him the information,—it shows us merely the demand that the overseers might make, but it amounts to something a great deal stronger than that, namely, to the imposition of a duty on the part of the person to pay it, and a notification to him that he is to pay it. Not simply calling upon him, but writing in the paper that he is to pay so much per annum, and notifying to him and the rest of the world publicly, and in such a way, that if he does not pay it, he is liable to be distrained for it. I am sure that it is stronger information than the knocking at the door of the party, and saying, "be so good as to pay me so much money." Therefore the revising barrister conceived that he was called upon to answer a question quite independent of what passed between the overseer and the landlord—the question, namely, that he was called upon bona fide to pay the rate; and that being so, he has actually paid it. Though the money is not actually disbursed by him, it is received by those entitled by law to receive it, and I think he has been bona fide called upon, and has bona fide paid the money; and therefore his name must be inserted on the register. The rest of the court concurred, and the decision of the revising barrister was reversed.

BAYLEY v. OVERSEERS OF NANTWICH.

Mr. Cockburn, Q. C., for the Appellant; Mr. Wellsby for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—The case has been referred back to the revising barrister to certify whether any objection was made before him as to the address of the notice of claim to the overseers of Nantwich being the proper address: he has certified that no such objection was made; and as it was admitted that all the provisions of sections 100 and 101 of the Registration Act had been complied with, the sole point referred to us was whether the duplicate notice of claim properly stamped was conclusive evidence of its being in time? This was decided in the case of notice of objection, and there is no distinction to be taken between the two cases: we therefore think the decision of the revising barrister is wrong, and that the same must be amended and be reversed, and the names of the 25 claimants inserted in the list of voters.

Decision reversed.

Mr. Serjeant Kingleke for the Appellant; Mr. Russell Gurney for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—The question appears to me to turn upon the proper construction of the 32d section of the 2 Wm. IV., c. 45; and I am unable to read that in other way than by seeing a marked distinction made between the burgess or freeman of an ordinary borough, and the freeman and liveryman of the city of London. The very first observation that arises is, when speaking of other boroughs or cities than London, using in the alternative the word burgess or the word freeman, though one would be synonymous with the other; but when speaking of London, it couples with it the character of freeman and also of liveryman: therefore I should say on the first inception of the case, when it is speaking of a right to vote of a burgess or of a livery and freeman, it couples with the character of freeman the necessity of also having the character of liveryman; it makes the right to vote depend upon both. If you carry your mind through the enacting part of the clause, you will find the distinction is thoroughly kept up. It goes on to say, "he shall be entitled to vote in such election provided such person shall be duly registered according to the provisions hereinafter contained," which do not mean expressly to point to the proviso to this section, but to the general provisions in the act, for the registration of cities and boroughs. And then it goes on to say "that no person shall be so registered in any year unless he shall on the last day of July in such year be qualified in such manner as would entitle him then to vote if such day were the day of election, and this act had not been passed; nor unless where he shall be a burgess or freeman, or freeman and liveryman of any city or borough"—still pointing to the distinction, burgess or freeman of any city but London, and liveryman and freeman of London, "where he shall have resided for six calendar months, &c." Then follows the clause which relates only to other boroughs than London, and then it drops the words liveryman and freeman, and only uses the words burgess and freeman. It contains a provision that applies to contributory boroughs; and therefore, not applying to London, it did not want the word. Now you come to the proviso, and you find the same distinction, "Provided always, that no person who shall have been elected, made or admitted a burgess or freeman since the 1st day of March, 1831, otherwise than in respect of birth or servitude, or who shall hereafter be elected, made or admitted a burgess or freeman, otherwise than in respect of birth or servitude, shall be entitled to vote as such in any such election for any city or borough as aforesaid, or to be so registered as aforesaid." That exception, which is the disfranchising exception, is in force with respect to the city of London, where you find in the other part of the clause it has considered the double character of liveryman and freeman to be necessary to give the right to vote. Look again at the schedules, and you find the same distinction prevails. In the schedule K, of the 2 W. 4, c. 45, the notices all show in the language they use, that the double character of liveryman and freeman is necessary: "I hereby give you notice that I claim to have my name inserted in the list made by the clerk of the company of —, of the liverymen of the said company of —, entitled to vote in the election of members for the city of London;" and the second says, "The following persons claim to have their names inserted in the list of persons entitled to vote as freemen of the city of London, and liverymen of the several companies herein specified, in the election of members for the city of London;" and the same with number three. Therefore when you come to the words at the end, "entitled to vote as such," it appears to me the revising barrister came to a right decision when he held that with respect to the qualification, it offered only to burgesses or freemen, and was not to include the right of those who claim to vote for the city of London. It has been asked, why there should be that distinction? I am unable, perhaps, exactly to point out why it should be. It might be thought perhaps, that in London, companies being very various and numerous, that is a sufficient check against any of those malpractices which might take place in other boroughs where the whole depended upon the will of the corporation. Such might or might not be. That appears to me to be the construction of the Act, and I think the revising barrister was right.

Decision affirmed.

LUCKETT v. BRIGHT.

Mr. Grove for the Appellant; Mr. Wellsby for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—The question put, I conceive, is whether the revising barrister was wrong? And, looking to the facts of the case to see whether he ought, on that state of facts, to have come to a different conclusion; in the first place you have all of these claimants clothed with the character of tenants; there is a lease made to them, and the case finds no other person as the landlord, and no other person to whom the rent is paid. Being tenants, we are then told of the mode of their occupation, from which it appears that they are there just as often as they wish, not only for their own business, but some other particulars are told us which we are not to inquire into. We cannot inquire how the business of the association is carried on, and we cannot say that this was an occupation neither by themselves or by some persons whom they let into possession, whether jointly with them, or severally from them. The names, therefore, were rightly retained on the list.

Mr. JUSTICE MAULE.—I am of the same opinion. The barrister has found that the voter was the occupying tenant of certain premises, and the appellant, upon the point reserved, asks us whether we can say the barrister was wrong in coming to that conclusion? The case shows that the premises were let for 200l. a year to five persons, of whom the voter in question was one; the use of the premises was by the five persons and other persons admitted with them, for some purposes, using it for any purpose that they thought fit, and whenever they thought fit. They used it first for themselves in doing their own business, which could not be done by others, and which, therefore, they were obliged to do personally when in London. The house seems to have been in charge of some servants, who were the servants of the association, of whom the defendant and his co-lessees were members; and it was used by the voter and the others who were engaged jointly with the voter in some pursuit which was the object of the association; and from these circumstances the barrister says they occupied as servants. Can we say he was wrong in that conclusion? It seems to me it was by no means an unreasonable conclusion upon the facts; and, therefore, I think the decision ought to be affirmed.

Mr. JUSTICE CRESSWELL.—I think the revising barrister was right in retaining these names on the list. The material question for us is, whether he was justified in finding that the parties occupied this house as tenants. It is stated on the case expressly that the respondent and certain others were lessees at a certain rate, and therefore were tenants of the house, and undoubtedly had a right to occupy the house. There does not appear, therefore, anything in the case to show that they have parted with their right to turn everybody else out at any moment they think fit. It does not appear that any persons came into the house at any time without their consent. They are said to be the joint subscribers to the same fund, out of which the servants are paid who have the superintendence of the house. These servants are reported to be the servants of those persons who subscribe to the common fund. That shows that they are in the same position as the agents of any other person, and could have no right to be there a moment longer than the lessees chose; therefore the respondent reserved to himself the right to remain in the house as long as he pleased, not only for the business of the association, but for his own private business. There is nothing to deprive the revising barrister of the opportunity of finding that they occupied the house as tenants, and that therefore the finding was correct.

Mr. JUSTICE ERLE.—I know of no definition of the word "occupation" that can prevent the facts here found from amounting to occupation.

Decision affirmed.

SCOTCH LAW OF ENTAIL.—We learn by an announcement which appears in our advertising columns, that the landlords of Scotland are in earnest upon the subject of entails. A requisition for a public meeting of landed proprietors to consider the subject has been headed by the name of the Marquis of Breadalbane. It invites the proprietors of entailed estates in Scotland to meet together, "for the purpose of considering the great national evils connected with the law of entail, and the propriety of an immediate application to the legislature thereupon." The landlord proprietors have the warm wishes of the community for their success; for, as we have attempted to show above, however much these unnatural laws press upon the owners of land, they weigh with double injury upon all other classes.—Glasgow Argus.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MOVEMENT IN FRANCE IN FAVOUR OF FREE TRADE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

London, 11th March, 1846.

SIR,—As no small difference has been expressed in Parliament upon the views of the French upon Free Trade, I beg leave to offer to your readers the result of personal inquiries in Paris, and in several departments, on the subject, during the last eight months, with some reasons in support of it.

That result is, a strong conviction that public feeling in France is beginning to be roused in favour of a change from the system of protection hitherto in force.

These are my reasons :

Before the present crisis in England, and in the United States, the alarming decay of the French shipping had compelled the Government to do something for its relief. What it did was, to call upon the three general Councils of Trade, Agriculture, and Manufactures to give their advice on the point—whether foreign iron should be admitted duty free for ship building.

These Councils met in December, and sat till the 15th of January last, and with a large majority declared themselves in favour of the admittance. The motives of the Government in calling these Councils together on this topic, and their original report to this effect, were published in the Liberté du Commerce, of which I send you a copy.

The decline of the merchant shipping of France, which has led to this conclusion, is thus pointedly stated in the report :

"Here is a brief statement of the revolution our trade has undergone since 1827 :

"In 1827 we had three merchant-ships of 800 tons each; we have now none. We then had two of 600 tons each; we have now but one of that size. We had 13 from 500 to 600 tons; we have now only 6. We had 38 of 400 to 500 tons; we have now but 33. We had then 186 of 300 tons; we have now but 179. We had 570 of 200 tons; we have but 436 now. All our other shipping, including our coasters, are sinking in the same way."—(Liberté du Commerce, p. 30.)

The document which I quote, explains the various causes of this astonishing fact; and the conclusion of the Councils is, that "foreign iron ought to be imported free of duty, as one remedy."

On the same occasion the Government called for an opinion as to the admittance of the foreign article to make steel, with a similar result.

There these two topics stand at present; namely, the Government has yielded to the distress of particular interests, and a mixed body of men of business and property urges warmly upon the Government the advantage of Free Trade in two great articles of foreign produce to relieve this distress.

It is said that the Government will not bring these subjects before the Chambers this year, for reasons unconnected with the subject in question.

On another article, salt, an analogous discussion took place last year in the Chamber of Deputies; and it is revived this year. This occurred on the motion of M. Demesmay for lowering the duty; and this gentleman's numerous essays and speeches on the subject, which I now send you, with the report of M. Dussauret, a ministerial member of the Chamber, added to them, contain a strong argument in favour of the Free Trade principle.

M. Bastiat's remarkable book upon our League is familiar to you. It is absolutely prophetic as to our proceedings of December and January; but it is written in terms of despair for the good cause in France.

The zealous author of this book might have been bolder. He has himself been received honourably into the Institute of France since its publication—and along with what we see above, it has stimulated his own countrymen in the south west of France to form a League.

If such a society had rested there, it might be said that the personal influence of M. Bastiat, and the interest of the vine growers of Bordeaux, had created a mere local movement.

Not so; I believe that in Marseilles a similar society is forming; and I know that in Paris another is formed under the very best auspices, and with the prospect of combining the more diverse classes in its operations. This has just occurred; and I assert as a fact, that individuals of the greatest character, not theorists, hold this movement in Paris to be extremely important.

It deserves also to be had in mind that the Chamber of Peers in France, so early as in January last, listened without disfavour to one of the warmest appeals ever made in any assembly, for the adoption of Free Trade.

I allude to the speech of the Duc d'Harcourt on the 12th of January—twice republished since.

That speech, with a reply to it, by M. Fulchiron, may be found in the Liberté du Commerce, above quoted; and whilst M. Fulchiron deprecates an immediate and total change, he holds the principle of Free Trade to be good in itself, and he abandons prohibition as essentially bad.

But advocates of Free Trade have declared themselves from a very different class.

The Populaire is the organ of a numerous body of reflecting workmen in Paris and elsewhere in France. It is a great satisfaction to find such a body loud in its praise of our present efforts.

Permit me to call your attention to the Populaire of Paris of the 25th February, and to ask a corner in THE LEAGUE for its leading article.

Publish it in French in your front columns, and you will do much to remove some of the bitterness, still too prevalent among our neighbours towards us, on many topics.

I have trespassed too long on your time; but if your acceptance of these hasty remarks should give them some value, I will repeat my communication with details of the constitution of a new society formed a few days ago in Paris, to represent the various interests of the north of France, and which I believe is of a character to promote these interests by an enlightened view of Free Trade. The north is one of the strongholds of protection in that country, as here of freedom. We have won the race by the spread of knowledge through the efforts of our northern men. The Frenchmen of the north are seeking knowledge too; and my object next week will be to show how it must lead them to the same goal.

A RESIDENT IN FRANCE.

AGRICULTURE IN WARWICKSHIRE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Leamington, March 3, 1846.

SIR,—The alarm of the effects of the Anti-Corn-Law measure of the Government attributed to the farmers of this county led me to inquire what rent is paid for land in Warwickshire?

Small lots, styled "accommodation lands," are let as high as 4*l.* for arable, and 5*l.* for pasture; but the average rent of land let in larger farms appears to be under 2*l.* per acre. The soil in this part of Warwickshire (as the fine oak timber indicates) is deep, and, with good cultivation, productive. In a few rare instances, the farmers plough as deep as 9, and even 10 inches, but 5 inches is more common; and the very name of a subsoil plough seems unknown.

Twelve sacks of wheat per acre is considered a good crop—a very small amount of produce for such strong land, which undoubtedly might yield more abundant crops.

The protectionist members of Parliament assert that the labourers are opposed to a repeal of the Corn Laws. The average wages of agricultural labourers in this part of Warwickshire is 10*s.* per week, from which for house-rent, increased by town-rates, in the case of a man with a family of five children, you must deduct 3*s.*, thus leaving for provisions and all other expenses, only 7*s.* per week. Ask the labourer if he fears a reduction of wages by the admission of foreign grain? His reply is, that he looks for a reduction of price in various articles of consumption, and that, as the farmers now employ fewer hands than their land requires, they feel confident that their labour will be at least equally in demand; and they hope that, stimulated by increased competition, the farmer will employ more manual labour, in order to raise from the soil a larger amount of produce. The labourers are quite above the ignorant prejudices, once prevalent in some English counties, against machinery, as they observe, that on farms where threshing-mills are used, more hands are employed than where the grain is threshed by the flail.

From some tenant farmers themselves, when asked if they feared a repeal of the Corn Laws, I received this answer:—"We have been led to believe it will injure us; but what we fear most is the uncertainty of markets by the three years Government plan. We would rather know at once what is to happen."

From these replies, Sir, we may fairly infer that the labourers are in favour of an immediate repeal, and that the tenant farmers, admitting that a repeal is inevitable, are most anxious that the change should be immediate.

Allow me to take this opportunity of asking you to correct a slight error in a letter on "Labourers' Wages in Surrey," inserted in THE LEAGUE of the 7th ult. Instead of "with bread at 10*d.* per gallon," it should have been "with bread at 1*d.* per gallon, more of our earnings is expended on bread than when at 1*s.* per gallon."

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
 A PROPRIETOR OF LAND IN SCOTLAND ON A VISIT IN WARWICKSHIRE.

TO FARMERS.—THIS IS THE TIME.

In a town in Somersetshire, some months ago, I met two gentlemen, inquiring into the state and prospects of the potato crops in that country. They had met by accident, in the same way that I had met with them. We staid together at the same inn, and during our stay I ascertained that one of them was collecting information for Government; and the other was providing the correctness of information which had been sent to the Potato Society by a Somerset Society, of which Mr. W. Miles is a leading member.

in that country, I was willing to hear from each of the two gentlemen what they had learned of it, and I found that both had ascertained the same class of facts in the same places that I had; and I knew that both of them sent to their respective employers the same kind of facts which I had become informed of—namely, that the potatoes were fatally diseased in Somerset; that in all the chief potato-growing districts in the eastern parts of that country there were not more sound ones in November than the quantity of seed-plants put into the ground last spring; that taking a crop of 80 sacks to the acre, 70 sacks were more or less diseased; that the best of the diseased ones were sold for 1s. a sack for pig feeding, and 9d. a sack for starch making; that potatoes were the chief article of diet with the peasantry in Somerset: most of the working people, in the east and northern parts of the country, living on potatoes entirely in ordinary seasons, but that there was an impending, imminent, and unavoidable scarcity this season.

How Mr. Miles has managed to dress up his statistics in the House of Commons, so as to deny the failure of the potatoes in Somerset, I know not. But I do know that, apart from any reports sent to the protectionists by the gentleman just alluded to, Mr. Miles's Society in the first instance applied to the churchwardens of parishes to get the information for the society. I have before me, while writing, copies of some of the returns made by churchwardens; and a letter accompanying those copies of returns says, that few things ever uttered in Parliament have at any time shocked conscientious men in the parts of Somerset referred to, more than Mr. Miles's denial of the potato failure there. And his denial is the more noticeable that the persons most shocked at it are nearly all political friends of his own—persons who once dreaded Free Trade, and still have fears that agriculture cannot stand on its own feet, yet who believe nothing is so likely to damage their cause as the falsification of facts so notorious in their own county as the rotten potatoes.

Letters which I have received on the subject ask why such statements are suffered to go uncontradicted. But the reply is simply this; the alleged facts of the protectionists are self-destructive; and their arguments have been refuted over and over again. It is but to reap stubble to go to work with them now.

The question with which we have now to do is the question of time. Those who once defended monopoly have taken up the question of principle, and have abandoned its defence; and not only so—they are its assailants. Nothing is left for us to settle but the question of time. And this is the time.

Though the ill-humour of the representatives of monopoly in Parliament prompted them to say they would rather have repeal immediately than have it for certain three years hence, while their ill-regulated Parliamentary conduct has since led them to retract that and contradict themselves, the tenant farmers are growing in number who say they will rather have immediate repeal; and their opinions are uniting and flowing in a stronger, wider, and more direct current to the point of final and immediate settlement every day.

I saw a member of the farmers' club this week—a society embracing many of the leading farmers of England, Mr. Baker, of Writtle, being either its originator or one of its originators, and nearly all the members being persons holding the same opinions on protection as Mr. Baker; and the subject at present engaging the attention of the club is a reform of the terms upon which tenants hold farms from landowners. A committee of the most sagacious members has been appointed to devise a scheme of leases best calculated to ensure the safe and profitable occupancy of the land. As private individuals, they still speak of protection when they meet; but they see it to be hopeless, and feel that to struggle for it is to waste that strength, and time, and opportunity, which should be turned to a practicable and profitable account in obtaining better terms with the landlords.

Farmers know how difficult it is to approach a landowner to make a bargain in ordinary times. They are therefore happy to hear the landlords say that new bargains must be made and old ones adjusted. A farmer can go to market and sell his corn, or buy a horse, and be at least on an equality with the corn-dealer and the horse-dealer—he will probably think himself superior to both; yet even with those men he feels he must be keen in perception and ready in action to take advantage of any varying humour in making a bargain.

Keeping off the one act of a farmer's life—that of taking a farm—no class of men in England are so habitually used to buy and sell according to varying humours, low spirits or high spirits, as the farmers. They are so far removed from their landlords in the social scale, and being only able to approach them on business through agents, which agents are the paid servants of the landlords, that the taking of a farm is an exception to every other trade-like transaction of their lives. The landlord is so high above them; so many persons are seeking to have each farm that is to let; it is so beset in its tenure with covenants; there are so many nets in which they may be caught, and so few loop-holes to escape by; they are taught (that is, they have been) to depend so much on what the landlord will do for them and for agriculture, in his political character, that they never once appear as the dictators or independent negotiators in a bargain for a farm; they are from beginning to end the humble recipients or expectants of favours; the very first favour being the getting of the farm on any terms, even though he had a bad bargain.

Now, when farmers hear their landlords crying out that the removal of the Corn Law will cause them to enter upon new terms with their tenants, and that they must do so; that they will do so because, yet only because, they must; and when the farmers see, as see they do, and feel it, and believe it, and swear to it, that the Corn Law will inevitably be repealed, they say, and it is natural, and just, and logical, that they should say, "Let it be done at once; this is the time."

This is the time. And were there no other reasons to make the farmers think so than the one now mentioned—the desire of getting their landlords to make new bargains, or amend the old ones by liberal covenants, while the landlords happen to be in a humour so to do, it would be a sufficient reason for the tenants to say, this is the time; for never in the annals of agriculture did the owners of land profess to be more compassionate towards the hirers and the workers of land than now; never did they promise to be so full of justice, so overflowing with conscientiousness as they will be if the Corn Law is taken from them. For then, say they, the farmers will be suffering; and they must suffer to relieve the farmers.

A few have said, perhaps prophetically of the greater number, that the farmers will be ruined, if they are to be ruined, before any abatement of rent is made. If there be any truth in this, it should only make the tenantry the more eager for an immediate settlement.

This is the time, because a year of prosperous trade has so enlarged the consumption of home-grown provisions that prices cannot fall, nor any very hurtful panic arise, though the importation should be immediate.

This is the time, because foreign corn growers have little to sell, and what they have to sell is already rising in price, in anticipation of our Corn Law being abolished.

This is the time, because with lingering monopoly and bad harvests there may be bad trade and shaken credit, which always accompanies bad trade, and a stagnation in all national enterprises which always accompanies shaken credit—there may be all these in 1849; and if there be, the farmers having high prices, inferior grain, and the smaller quantity peculiar to a bad harvest, there will be a panic the most disastrous ever known to farmers when the free importation does begin.

This is the time, because if the repeal is delayed for three years, the foreign corn grower has three years notice to prepare for competition in the British markets.

This is the time, because, if the British farmer should have favourable seasons and good harvests for the next three years, he will be at liberty to make the most of his land, and of the seasons, and of those facilities to feed cattle, and of the manures to be produced by an increased number of cattle, which the Prime Minister has said will profitably supersede the prodigious expenditure for artificial manures; whereas, if the question remains unsettled for three years, his new arrangements with his landlord will also be deferred, his new arrangements upon his farm will be deferred, no decided steps will be taken; no money will be invested in the drainage of his farm, and he will be, in 1849, in a worse position than he is in now, with the foreigner prepared to compete with him by a three years' notice, and the advantageous position which he now occupies with respect to his landlord frittered away.

This is the time, because nothing has hitherto retarded the profitable cultivation of the land so much as the continued expectation of Parliament doing something which it cannot do; and because Lord George Bentinck and some other members who act with him have declared that they are in favour of the three years rather than the immediate repeal, because they will not cease to agitate by every means in their power to have the present Corn Law restored. Other members have said they will endeavour during the three years to make the low duty perpetual. And the League, on the other hand is pledged not to cease in its operations so long as a fraction of a protective tax on corn exists. Consequently the farmers will be kept in the turmoil of agitation for three years longer, that such men as Lord Geo. Bentinck, who throw the dice again and again when they have lost all, may try for another chance—not to restore the Corn Law (as well may they seek to restore the age of pack-horse travelling instead of railroads), but to take whatever chance turns up in the meantime for themselves as politicians in Parliament.

This is the time, because the League is pledged to dissolve when all Corn Laws cease to exist, and not until then; and because the proprietors and occupiers of land have not yet lost the representation of the counties, most of which they will lose before 1849 comes to a close, if the Corn Law keeps the League in existence so long.

Other reasons might be given for saying this is the time; but they refer more to landlords and others than to farmers. I will only now say farther, that this is the time because not all the landowners combined, to say nothing of the fragments of parties, will delay the time beyond 1849—it is not in the power of political confederacy to do so, and we are all three years younger now than we shall be then.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE.

We find in an American paper, received by the Hibernia, a return made by the Marshal of the State of New York of the quantity of every kind of grain, per acre, growing in that great state last year, which ought to go far to remove the opinion that the whole of the United States is a region of exuberant fertility, in which the farmer has only to throw the seed into the ground and in the autumn to reap a harvest much heavier than can be obtained from the exhausted soils of Europe. The State of New York extends some four or five hundred miles into the interior, and includes much of the best land which is to be found to the east of the Alleghany mountains; and yet it will be seen from the following returns, that the yield of wheat, oats, and barley, per acre, throughout the whole of this state, is scarcely half the yield, on the average, of this country, and not more than one-third the quantity which is frequently raised in the best cultivated districts of Norfolk, Lincoln, and the Lothians. The following is the table:

Aggregate of the agricultural statistics of the State of New York, furnished by the returns of the marshals employed in taking the late census:

“ barley under cultivation	192,503
Bushels of barley raised	3,108,704
Acres of peas under cultivation	117,379
“ rye sown	317,099
Bushels of rye harvested	2,936,322
Acres of oats sown	1,026,915
Bushels of oats harvested	26,323,051
“ peas raised	1,761,503
Acres of beans under cultivation	16,231
Bushels of beans raised	162,187
Acres of buckwheat under cultivation	255,495
Bushels of buckwheat raised	3,631,679
Acres of turnips under cultivation	15,322
Bushels of turnips raised	1,350,332
Acres of potatoes under cultivation	255,762
Bushels of potatoes raised	23,653,418
Acres of flax under cultivation	46,030
Pounds of flax raised	2,897,062
Acres of wheat sown	1,013,655
“ wheat harvested	958,231
Bushels of wheat raised	13,391,770
Acres of corn sown	595,134
Bushels of corn harvested	14,722,114

From the above table it will be seen that the total yield of wheat on 1,013,655 acres was 13,391,770 bushels, or, as near as possible, 13 bushels to the acre. Now it is generally estimated that the yield of wheat in this country, taking the bad lands as well as the good, is about 24 bushels to the statute acre, and it is well known that from 36 to 40 bushels per acre is commonly raised in the best districts of England and Scotland. Granting, therefore, that the American does get his land considerably cheaper than the English farmer, the remarkable inferiority of the produce much more than compensates the latter for this difference. There is no reason to believe that the produce of the state of New York, which contains every variety of soil, and includes among other districts, the fine wheat-growing country of the Genessee, is inferior to any of the states east of the Alleghany mountains. We know, from General Washington's letters, that the yield of wheat in Virginia was as small sixty years ago as that of New York is at the present time, and the same observation applies to all the Atlantic states. To obtain returns resembling those raised in England, in quantity, it is necessary to cross the mountain, and to descend into the great valley of the Mississippi. There crops are grown which would be called abundant even in England, but it must never be forgotten that these crops, when raised, have to be conveyed from 800 to 1000 miles, along rivers, lakes, or canals, before they reach the ocean, to say nothing of the freight between the shipping ports and this country.

The yield of wheat is not smaller in proportion than that of most other varieties of grain. It will be seen that the average of barley is not more than about thirty bushels to the acre, which is less by 15 to 20 bushels than the average of that raised in Norfolk and Lincolnshire; and the yield of oats is not more than about 26 bushels to the acre, which would be thought a very poor return in any of the oat-growing districts of England. Even of Indian corn, which may be considered the peculiar grain of America, the yield would be considered very moderate in this country.—Liverpool Times.

FREE TRADE IN DENMARK.—By a decree issued under date of the 28th ult., the import duties on cotton manufactured goods, shawls, handkerchiefs, unbleached linen, drugs, &c., into Danish ports, have been considerably reduced; and it is confidently expected that a further modification will take place in the heavy imposts upon nearly all manufactured articles, levied for the sake of protection. The value of land in Denmark has increased more than 50 per cent. during the last 20 years—a circumstance from which English farmers will surely extract some comfort; for if rents rise on that side of the water whilst falling on this, we cannot see that the competition of the foreign grower will be any very fearful matter.

AGRICULTURE.

MONOPOLIST FALLACIES.

The arguments of the protectionists have latterly become so stale, flat, and unprofitable, their statistical facts have been so invariably found to be—to use a polite paraphrase—the reverse of true, and their predictions have ever been so entirely falsified by events, that in the midst of the important and exciting topics of the last few months we have not thought their few attempts to argue their now forlorn hope worth notice. There has been, it seems, a pamphlet, published under the auspices of the Central Society, for the encouragement of British indolence, which the protectionists think a great card in their hands. It is entitled, “Free Trade Fallacies Refuted, by W. Hainworth, a Tenant Farmer,” and purposes to refute the arguments, displace the data, and deny the conclusions of Messrs. Morton and Trimmer’s able exposure of the ill effects of protecting duties on the profits of agriculture. Mr. Hainworth is a tradesman and a farmer of Hitchin, Hertfordshire, whose debut in public life was at the Protection Society, at St. Alban’s, in February, 1844, where he comforted the frantic and foolish lords and squires there assembled—some of whom by-the-by have since shown symptoms of recovery—with a most imposing array of figures to prove non-existent “facts,” and establish the truth of “impossible things.” He was naturally a great light, and it appears that he has been selected by the 17, Bond-street publication committee to write a book. The rapid progress of opinion and legislation adverse to “protection,” would have left Mr. Hainworth’s tract—written not in the best English—in its natural condition of obscurity, had not his attack on Messrs. Morton and Trimmer induced those gentlemen to use his fallacies as the means of reinforcing upon the farming community the soundness of their previously published conclusions. We cannot on this occasion enter into any detailed examination of the fresh evidence which Mr. Hainworth’s blundering arguments have enabled Messrs. Morton and Trimmer to adduce in support of the proposition that Free Trade will increase the profits of farming—that is, good farming; but we take the opportunity of urging every tenant farmer to get the two pamphlets of Messrs. Morton and Trimmer, judge of their arguments for himself, and then soberly and like a man of business, see whether he cannot turn them to practical account upon his own farm. The time is now at hand which lords and squires have pretended to be big with ruin to tenant farmers. They will tell a different story when the tenants come to ask for reductions of rent; and it will not do for farmers any longer to shut their eyes to the real position, the difficulties, and advantages of British agriculture. They must be up and doing. The squires may live in “a fool’s paradise” for the next three years; but that won’t do for the farmers. They are under positive engagements to pay rents calculated on a scale of prices they never had received constantly, and never will obtain, except by accident. The landlords have in their hands that fearful engine of oppression and injustice, the law of distress; and the farmers can only retrieve themselves from the false position in which they have been placed by reliance on the delusion of protection. Farmers can and will do well enough, provided they can get real and permanent possession of their own farms, free themselves from the semi-feudal burdens of their landlords, and apply themselves with perseverance and skill to the development of the vast and hitherto latent fund which the soil contains. For these objects they must set about a business-like examination of the real incidence of protection on agriculture, and see what alteration of system an intelligent self-reliance would dictate. As an aid to that practical examination, they will find Messrs. Morton and Trimmer’s two pamphlets most useful.

THE HORRORS OF ABUNDANCE.

If it were possible to feel anything like compassion for men who place themselves in such false positions as the public advocates of monopoly are now in,

we might pity the sorry figure the protectionists make in their pitiful opposition to the details of Sir Robert Peel’s measure. Out of the House of Commons, the monopolists are obliged so far to conform to public opinion as to say they don’t want to profit by artificial scarcity. Thus Mr. Sanford, once the Whig member, but who now seeks to re-construct his political fortunes on the protectionist delusions wherewith the constituency of West Somerset is supposed to be imbued, said, at a public meeting of monopolists, at Taunton, got up to call upon Messrs. Dickinson and Acland to resign, as Peel converts, said:

“It had been stated that they wished to prevent the people from being fed (no, no); now this was a groundless and scandalous attack upon the protectionists, who were the last men to stand in the way of the people being fed (hear). But if famine and distress had arisen—and he feared that such was the case in one part of the kingdom—he fearlessly asserted that the measures of Sir Robert Peel would be the means of preventing the people being fed. If there was famine in some parts of the kingdom, it would be at least two months before the measure of the Minister, if he carried it, could take effect. Could it, then, be a remedy for the famine? And if Sir R. Peel and his Government really were of opinion that there was starvation among the Irish, through the potato blight, they ought to have at once opened the ports for a temporary purpose; whereas they had delayed the importation of corn, instead of giving food at once to the famishing people. This was one reason why he was opposed to the new measure. But there was another reason, that if they were not to have a fair protection—such as he believed the sliding scale gave them—then he (Mr. Sanford) was a total repealer at once. He would not have it said that they had protection, when they derived no advantage from it.”

And even these monopolists “no, no’d” the imputation of a wish to prevent the people being fed, and “hear, heard” the defence which alleged such an imputation as a “scandalous attack” upon the protectionists. Now, without stopping to contrast Mr. Sanford’s declaration, that the protectionists “were the last men to stand in the way of the people being fed” with his assertion that the sliding scale—admitted on all hands to keep the people at times on the verge of famine—afforded the only fair protection to the landed interest, we may refer to the remarks of Mr. Miles, the monopolist member for West Somerset, who thus spoke in the House of Commons, on Monday night, in opposing the importation of Indian corn:

“He would now refer to the subject more directly before the house. The properties of Indian corn, or maize, were little understood in this country; but he trusted that the agriculturists of England would now begin to understand it. Maize was in itself, as to its quality, in cereal crops next to wheat. If they took a bushel of maize it was equal to $1\frac{1}{4}$ bushels of barley, and to 3 bushels of oats. As to nutritive properties, that was the relative proportion between Indian corn and oats and barley. But how did it stand as to wheat? There could be no doubt Indian corn would be used largely instead of barley and oats. He understood from a friend of his, that Indian corn could be brought to the port of Liverpool under 20s. per quarter. They were told that competition would have the effect of stimulating agriculture, but the agriculturists would by the present resolution be placed in this position, that whereas they could compete with foreigners in wheat, barley, and oats, with regard to Indian corn they could carry against them no competition at all. Mr. Cobbett had tried to introduce Indian corn into this country, but, from the temperature, had completely failed. This article appeared to require a temperature of about 70 in one month, and of about 75 or 80 in the other months. He had tried to cultivate it in the West of England rather largely, but he had only succeeded in ripening the maize once in three years. So it was quite impracticable for the English farmer to compete with the American grower. The great western States of America as well as the southern were very well adapted for its growth, but what he wanted to inquire was, whether its introduction into this country would only interfere by competing with barley and oats? He said no. It would enter very seriously into competition with wheat. If the house looked to the quantity of wheat consumed in this country and America, they would see how completely it served as a substitute for wheat. Here the consumption of wheat was one quarter for each individual, whereas in America each individual merely consumed three and a half bushels (hear). Now, what could be the reason of this? Labour was better; employment more abundant; wages higher; and wheat bread cheaper than in England. It arose solely from the constant use of Indian corn instead of wheat.”

Here we have a significant commentary on Mr. Sanford’s rash assertion, that the protectionists are “the last men to stand in the way of the people being fed.” The redoubtable Mr. Miles then proceeded to descant on the horrible possibility of 700,000,000 of bushels of Indian corn being imported into this country; and he added—

“Now, when they looked at the immense quantity produced in the United States, when they remembered that the temperature of that country was particularly fitted for it, and that the temperature of this country did not suit it; that in America it was useful in cleansing the land, and that it could be brought into the English market at the price of 20s. per quarter, duty paid; they were bound to look at its effect, not only upon oats and barley—much of which it would supersede—but they ought also to look at its effects upon wheat itself.”

And afterwards—

“He (Mr. Miles) thought he had shown that maize would enter not only into animal but human food, and would, in a great degree, supersede the use of corn (hear). And that it would be impossible for the English farmer to compete with the American at all in the production of maize (hear, hear). It was idle to talk of stimulating the farmer’s industry by the free action of prices in the market, when a positive natural impossibility was interposed against his production of the competing article.”

Now, this is gross, perhaps wilful, agricultural ignorance. We should assuredly rejoice to see the potato-fed rural population of West Somerset and the other half-cultivated districts of England elevated into an Indian-corn-eating people; yet it is not so much directly as indirectly that the free importation of Indian corn will cheapen human food. Maize will, we dare say, be used to some extent in the manufacture of bread, but its great value will be for feeding stock, cattle, sheep, pigs, and thus by increasing the supply of manure, thereby furnish the means of increasing the production of wheat. Object to the importation of maize because the farmer can’t grow it in this country!!

Why, a farmer who thrashes with a steam engine might as well be told that he shall have no coals unless he can dig them on his own farm! This is just the narrow, one-eyed view always taken by the protectionists; they seem to have no knowledge of the vast capacity for increased production which exists in our soil; they seem to be unable to comprehend the idea of an increased proportional return derived from additional outlay. The great problem of produce husbandry is, how to keep the largest quantity of stock at the least cost; and the free admission of all kinds of grain, pulse, and so forth, offers the readiest, perhaps the only solution. Speaking as farmers, looking to make the greatest possible amount by farming, we say Indian corn and other grain cannot be too cheap. If instead of 20s. a quarter, as Mr. Miles with such a sorrowful face predicts, it should turn out that we can import it at 18s. a quarter, nobody should rejoice more than the farmers, as they will be able to increase their stock. When Free Trade has really come into operation, we have no doubt that the live stock kept by the average farmer will be as three to two compared with his present stock; but should it turn out that he can profitably double his stock, he will not only increase the growth of grain on his farm by the manure from the extra stock, but he will also increase the supply of meat. We say emphatically, that Free Trade will cheapen the food of the people at the same time that it increases the profits of the farmer. Will the House of Lords interpose their suspensive veto between the nation and such benefits?

IMMEDIATE FREE TRADE.

If there be one thing more than another which the tenant-farmers should deprecate, it would be the proposed suspension, for three years, of the total abolition of duties on imported grain. We can understand a tenant-farmer, who for thirty years has been told by his landlord, and his landlord’s members of Parliament, that foreign corn can be brought to this country and sold for next to nothing, being alarmed by the bugbear, just as we can understand that an ignorant child, who has been frightened by its nurse’s ghost-stories, should be afraid to be left in the dark; but how the tenant-farmer is to be benefited by three years of uncertainty, three years of alarm—three years, during which he can make no safe calculation, or come to any adjustment with the landlord, it passes our imagination to conceive. Every man of ordinary judgment, who is acquainted with agriculture, says that, if Free Trade is to be, let it come at once. Peel converts and protectionists agree in this, if in nothing else. Thus we find Colonel Wood, member for Brecon, saying in his place in the House of Commons:

“He had voted for every Corn Bill for the last fifty years, and he admitted that every one of those Corn Laws had been a failure. He repeated it. From the year 1815 to the present time every Corn Act had been a failure. He would now tell the House why he should oppose the present and any amendment, that should be introduced upon the measures of the right honourable baronet. He would oppose every amendment because he wanted the present measures of the Government to pass. He trusted also that these measures would soon go to the other House of Parliament, and that no amendment would there be introduced in them. No—he did wish that one amendment should be introduced in the upper house. He did not want to monopolise all the good legislation to that house. He was desirous that some room for improvement should be left to the House of Lords, and he trusted that they would introduce into the measure a clause by which the repeal of the Corn Laws should be immediate."

So Mr. Sanford, the would-be monopolist member for West Somerset, speaking at a monopolist meeting at Taunton said:

"As he was addressing a number of tenant farmers, he would ask them if it could be expected that the landlords would begin to make arrangements to meet the altered state of things, before they saw what the effect of the measure would be. Now three years would be a short time for any landlord to take an average, that being the time to be allowed before all protection ceased; but it would be necessary, after this three years was expired, to take three years more under the total free corn trade system, in order to see what the average was, so that there must be six years at least, under this precious measure, brought in by the Conservative Minister, before the agriculturists could see what the effects were like to be."

These three years of uncertainty may be very pleasant to the squires, who are deluding their tenants with all sorts of false hopes, of re-establishing protection or making the proposed temporary scale permanent; but what say the farmers? Let the farmers only exercise their wits, and they will be at no loss to perceive a very sufficient cause why the political squires cling so tenaciously to this remnant of monopoly.

The monopolist landocracy is not just now in very good odour with the public; their grasping selfishness is thoroughly understood by all but the farmers, and the farmers have been very generally made to see that if there be profit from monopoly, the landlord has got the lion's share. Now, if a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws should take place at this time, the squirearchy would be hard up for an election cry at the forthcoming general election. And more than that, farmers instead of being satisfied, as the squires now expect they will be satisfied, with the harmless pledge on the part of the county members, to do all they can to retain or recover protection, will be very apt to talk about Game Laws, leases, the law of distress, tenant rights, and various other uncomfortable rural topics which the most purblind county member must see looming in the distance. It is to stave off these things, and so retain their political influence over their tenantry until they can re-organise their forces, that the landed oligarchy has imposed upon Sir Robert Peel the three years' continuance of the sliding scale, as a condition to the passing of his measure.

REASONS FOR IMPORTING CATTLE FOOD.

The present high price of meat, which is seriously injurious to the consumer, is not, as some have supposed, vastly advantageous to the grazier.

The following remarks on the Smithfield cattle market, which appeared in the Mark Lane Express of last Monday, though with a different object, show most conclusively that a constant and regular supply of cheap provender in all seasons is essential to the gain of the farmer and the comfort of the consumers of meat:

"It has been asserted (says the writer) that production has not kept pace with the demand; and this assertion is supported by instancing the falling-off which has taken place in the arrivals of beasts and sheep for the metropolitan market since the commencement of the present year: hence it has been assumed the graziers are obtaining enormous profits, to the injury of the great masses of people."

This assumption is not warranted. That there has been a deficiency of sheep is admitted, though their quality; from the abundant food of the past summer, "has seldom or never been equalled."

"Without, therefore, attempting to assert for one moment that a numerical deficiency has not existed in the supplies of sheep, we at the same time deny that the graziers are obtaining those large profits which some parties would make it appear. For instance, the great scarcity of turnips, &c., experienced during the whole of 1844 and a portion of 1845, caused the prices of natural and artificial food to rise enormously high, as much as £14 per 1000 having been paid for linseed cake. This scarcity of pabulum had another effect, equally injurious to the interests of the flock masters—that of compelling them to dispose of their sheep in this and other markets, often in a half-fat state, at ruinously low figures. When, therefore, the period arrived at which store animals are usually purchased, many graziers, owing to their deficiency from the causes above assigned, and the consequent high rates at which they were held, were compelled, from circumstances over which they had no control, to have fewer animals on their farms than could by possibility consume the immense produce of last year's green crops; such, too, is the case at this moment, and, as a striking illustration of our remarks, we may state that many farmers who require the land for spring corn are positively driving their turnips away to those who will eat them off. What, then, we ask, has an abundant season done for the grazier? Has it increased his returns? Certainly not."

At this moment the prices of store stock of every kind are so high, that notwithstanding the actual abundance of food, there is not the least chance of any profit being derived from grazing during the present year.

PROTECTION TO AGRICULTURE.

It is to protect the farmer against foreign competition that, as it is said, the Corn Laws have been enacted;

yet, in the following act of wanton destruction, the farmers were the real sufferers:

"CUSTOM HOUSE DESTRUCTION OF DAMAGED WHEAT.—This week a quantity of foreign wheat, which had been imported by Messrs. Philipotts and Co., of this port (Gloucester), but which has since become damaged, so as not to be worth paying 17s. duty upon, was destroyed under the supervision of a very active Custom-house officer, by throwing it into the river Severn, and by keeping a very close official watch until it was carried away by the stream, or so intermixed with the mud that it could not be in any way used."—Gloucester Journal.

Now, had the trade in corn been free, this damaged foreign wheat would have been sold at a low price, and ground up for feeding cattle and pigs; and many hundreds of such chances for the farmer would occur in every year. We know an instance in which a good farmer, occupying a large farm, made a very considerable sum of money in a particular year from having had the opportunity of purchasing a cargo of damaged lentils, at a very low price. They were apparently so much injured by sea-water that nobody would look at them, supposing cattle would not eat them; but the farmer we allude to made the venture, and by spreading and turning the lentils in a barn, he so dried and sweetened them, that when ground, his beasts eat them readily, and fattened quickly. We have heard him say, "that was the best year's farming he ever had."

A BUSINESS VIEW OF THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

The following extract from the Mark Lane Express review of the corn trade, shows the way in which those who write for men of business regard the present position of the Free Trade question:

"It appears that the ministerial plan is preferred to a repeal of all duties on grain. The other amendments have been disposed of in an equally summary manner, and it is now pretty certain that the measure—as first proposed—will, ultimately, become the law of the land; a month or six weeks may, however, elapse before the final settlement, and during that interval the trade will probably remain in a state of depression: indeed, even if the success of the bill were placed altogether beyond doubt, the fact that the new scale of duties cannot, under any circumstances, come into operation for several weeks, must act as a serious inconvenience. We have on former occasions intimated, that though unforeseen events of a political character have hitherto prevented the advance in the price of wheat, which, from the indifferent result of the harvest and the disease in the potato crop, all parties engaged in the trade confidently expected would have occurred, still we can see no reason to alter our opinion as regards the facts of the case. The shortness of the produce of wheat, and the disorder which has affected potatoes, may have been made the most of for party purposes; still it cannot be denied that these two principal articles of food suffered so much from the excessively wet weather experienced during the summer and autumn, as to afford just reason for concluding that both will run short before the time can come round for gathering another crop. With respect to potatoes there is also ground to apprehend that the malady may not prove temporary; indeed it has been recently proved, by carefully conducted experiments, that the diseased potatoes when planted—though they vegetate freely—do not yield a sound return, the young tubercles exhibiting the disorder of the seed at an early stage of their growth; we maintain, therefore, that abundant cause exists for surprise at the present position of affairs, and that there is every prospect of business assuming a more healthy tone so soon as the long protracted discussion on the Corn Laws shall have been disposed of in one way or the other."

We know from other sources that men largely engaged in the domestic corn trade believe that that trade will not assume the healthy tone so desirable for farmers' interests until the expiration of the three years of uncertainty proposed by Sir Robert Peel, in obedience to a dominant landocracy, to be inflicted upon the community.

FISH ALIVE, ALIVE, O!

It seems that even the "coroneted fishmonger," who cried out so woefully against the admission of foreign salmon, will, after all, suffer no damage even to his own sordid and selfish interest. We find the following evidence that Free Trade is ultimately the best for the protected interest:

"PRICE OF SALMON IN THE NORTH.—The Duke of Richmond's salmon on the Spey are selling at the high price of 2s. 6d. to 3s. a pound in the neighbourhood of the fishing grounds."—Inverness Courier.

TRADE WITH RUSSIA.—We have the important fact we are about to communicate from a confidential authority, in which we place the most implicit confidence, and from which it will appear that the effect of the development of the future commercial policy of the British Government is working away abroad, sooner, perhaps, than was generally anticipated by our merchants and the public. We learn from St. Petersburg, notwithstanding recent assurances from high quarters that nothing would be done with the Russian tariff for this season at least, that it is more than probable that, in the course of a short time, a few days, an announcement of considerable reductions in the duties of the leading exports, and on many imports, will be made. These reductions, we are assured, will take effect this season. —Hull Packet.

Some of the newspapers are getting absolutely demented in their attempts to struggle into fame and circulation. One has offered to give globes to their subscribers; a second piano-fortes, and a third two thousand pounds.

REVIEW.

A Summer Ramble in Germany, Belgium, and Switzerland. By J. W. Massie, D.D., &c. London: Snow.

The circumstances under which this work appears before us, must to some extent disarm criticism. Ill health compelled Dr. Massie to make a Continental tour, and his congregation raised subscriptions to facilitate his journey. On his return, he delivered a course of lectures on the countries he had visited, and the substance of these lectures is incorporated in the volume before us. Dr. Massie is a zealous minister of the congregationalist persuasion, the first sect which proclaimed liberty of conscience; but he carries his hatred of intolerance to an excess which renders him intolerant in his turn. We regret that too large a portion of his volume is occupied by tirades against the church of Rome, which are perversely introduced in the midst of graphic descriptions and clever historical dissertations, so as to infect every association with the bitterness of controversy. We regret this, because we find in the work elements of excellence, which ought to have been dis severed from such a connection. Dr. Massie is a shrewd observer, and a clever describer; to the descriptive part of his work we shall therefore confine our attention, and leave others to debate with him on the points at issue between Rome and Geneva.

The account of Namur, a city historically associated with the memory of Louis XIV. and William III., is a clever sketch of a Belgian manufacturing town:

"Namur is to Belgium what Sheffield is to England; the cutlery of the Netherlands is made there. Seraigne, more like a street for continuousness than a town for architecture, nearly a mile in length, stretches along upon the river Meuse between Namur and Liege. An old episcopal residence, in which the prelate princes of Liege resided in the times of feudal power and grandeur was a few years ago turned into the vestibule and front section of a magnificent factory for casting and constructing machinery for almost every mechanical purpose; whether for peaceful arts, or as implements of destruction. The palatial gardens,—no longer the luxurious retreat of lordly churchmen, but now made the storeroom or depository for crude and manufactured iron, and occupied with heaps of coal,—have altogether lost their episcopal aspect; and, while yielding to the darkening and sombre influences of some fifty wide-mouthed chimneys, and their issuing flames or smoke, the prelate dignity of the scene may seem to have disappeared—but a no less intellectual and industrious destiny prevails. Ingenuity and patient labour here preside; while nearly every description of iron-work is fabricated, from the heaviest and most potent engine to the most complicated or refined instrument of utility—from the monumental lion which crouches on the field of Waterloo, to the lady's penknife, which is deposited in her reticule. The vast pile of building forms a town within itself. The establishment possesses a great advantage in being placed over the bed of coal from which its exhaustless supply is dug; and the fuel being raised within the limits of the factory, and close to the furnaces near to which the mineral ore is found, the labour is much diminished compared with many English foundries. The workshops of the craftsmen are situated upon the line of railways on the banks of canals leading to the river. The blast furnaces, puddling furnaces, forges, and rolling mills, are on the opposite bank of the river from the houses of the operatives; but they maintain their intercourse between home and the shop by boats provided for their convenience and at their command."

"John Cockerill, as a prince among mechanics, was in partnership (a strange association, and uncommon for the trader,) with the late King of Holland, as an engine-builder and machine-maker, which gave celebrity to this large establishment. There have been, and I presume there are still, 3000 employed in these works, receiving on an average about 2000*l.* in weekly wages. Cockerill sought to extend his connections and mechanical fame, especially in regions where manufacturing skill was precious. He died at Wursaw, leaving his wealth to his heirs, and his name on many Continental locomotives."

"A company have undertaken the management of his extended works, and employ an equal number of men in the same branches of manufacture: making not merely implements of destruction, as used to be the case at the Carron Works in Scotland, but also some of the first-rate locomotive engines for Prussian and other European railways, which are rapidly multiplying. The cotton factory is also thence supplied with spinning-jennies and other machinery. Thus the school of Cockerill competes with the shops of Sharpe, Roberts, and other prime mechanists in England. The elements and occasion of Cockerill's success sprang from a source which working men were not quick enough to discern—at least they did not soon enough discover and remedy the mistake. The law which short-sighted monopoly had enacted, as it was considered for the protection of the machine-maker in England, preventing the exportation of machinery from this to Continental countries, gave the stimulus and premium to enterprise in these countries. For a while the smuggler profited by the interdiction, and gambled on the chances of detection. The machine of human thought, the mysterious engine of the busy mind, revolved its powers and principles in contrivance and imitation for production and supply. No law could contravene the laws of nature and the gifts of God. Genius can summon its resources from Indus to the Poles, and self-interest has power enough to bind the winds and seas, fire and vapour of smoke. Monopoly was defiled, and at length subdued."

"John Cockerill, and his friends, and men of like spirit, exported the men of thought and genius from England, who went forth and became the tutors of the men of Belgium. It was not enough to work and execute plans; they had literary and mechanical institutions in Cockerill's works and in others, for the training of handicraftsmen, who received their instruction from English mechanists, and who have now filled the whole of the workshops of Belgium with workmen and men capable of managing all kinds of machinery, and of inventing, as well as producing the manufacture of machinery such as will very nearly compete with your most skilled engine makers of England."

Cologne fares hardly at the Doctor's hands, and we think that the picture would be more perfect if the shadows were less dark:

"Cologne itself contains a population of about 65,000, or from that to 70,000 people. As a town, it is one of the least inviting, the least handsome or spacious of all the cities I have visited anywhere, to be an ancient and a large city—the resort of imperial and commercial wealth, as well as ecclesiastical domination. The streets are narrow and mean; they are as contracted and impassable as the streets that I saw in the obsolete and decayed cities of the East, where the light of the sun never shone upon the pavement; the houses having been reared so high as to keep out the sun, even though it was vertical. It might have been deemed the design of architects and civic authorities, from the days of Agrippina till the time when Hanseatic prosperity declined, to keep out the beauties of heaven and the balmy breath of day from the pavement upon which the passenger trod. The streets of Cologne have been compared very fitly, by a Scotch writer, to the streets of the Old Town of Edinburgh,—to the West Bow, the Cowgate, the Grass Market, and various other places. The associations which these allusions will recall to a quondam visitor of Auld Reekie, at the hours of nine and ten o'clock, p.m., when the régime of malarious sewerage and loathsome effluvia gave character to the streets, however unavailing, will fitly represent the filthiness of Cologne. The poetry of Coleridge will better complete the picture than my harsh prose:

"Ye nymphs who reign o'er sewers and sinks,
The river Rhine, it is well known,
Doth wash your city of Cologne;
But tell me, nymphs, what power divine
Shall henceforth wash the river Rhine?"

I may only add, that, to my apprehension, the Cologne seemed to prefer the luxury of carrying their sewers and sinks upon the surface of their streets, to any under-ground excavations and conduits which sanitary refinement might suggest. You may conjecture what would be the effluvia passing through a town with such accommodation. This ancient seat of power and commerce has, however, many circumstances connected with it of an historical character to excite an interest in it."

The view from Ehrenbreitstein "the broad stone of honour," above Cologne, is portrayed with great spirit and fidelity. On this elevated rock, the Doctor was raised above the sphere of theological differences, and was free to follow the impulses of his better genius:

"From the top of this fortress the spectacle is magnificent and enchanting. Certainly the scene down the Rhine and up the Moselle, along the banks of the Rhine, and all across the valley through which the Rhine flows, is the richest of all the scenes your eye can rest upon or survey. The well-wooded plains here and there; the vineyards in all their beauty; the corn-fields (it was one of the most productive seasons I fancy that Germany had witnessed)—the ripened crop of corn-fields waving in their golden beauty, inviting the scythe of the mower; whilst the sun rested with its chastest and yet richest rays upon the radiant scenery, and threw back those rays reflected from the glassy streams that flowed along. The Moselle was seen taking its course quietly, unostentatiously, but very determinedly, with a kind of independence, as a parallel and concurrent river, by the side of the Rhine, and they flowed down the channel together as twin streams, proving for miles and miles that they were able to maintain their individuality, though ultimately they were to be wedded and rendered indivisible for their future course. I crossed the bridge which passes from Coblenz to the Petersburg fortress; just below this point the contemplative tourist will often linger, to mark the superb view which may there be obtained of Ehrenbreitstein. The weather was bright and yet calm, presenting a midday scene of voluptuous indulgence and tranquillity. I could realise all that the 'Pilgrim of the Rhine' has given as his impression. 'There stood the old herdsman leaning on his staff, and the quiet cattle knee-deep in the gliding waters. Never did stream more smooth and sheen, than was at that hour the surface of the Moselle, mirror the images of pastoral life. Beyond, the darker shadows of the bridge and of the walls of Coblenz fell deep over the waves, chequered by the tall sails of the craft that were moored around the harbour. But clear against the sun rose the spires and roofs of Coblenz, backed by many a hill sloping away to the horizon. High, dark, and massive, on the opposite bank swelled the towers and rock of Ehrenbreitstein, a type of that great and chivalric spirit—the honour that the rock arrogates for its name, which demands so many sacrifices of blood and tears, but which ever creates in the restless (unsanctified) heart of man a far deeper interest than the more peaceful scenes of life by which it is contrasted. There still, from the calm waters, and the abodes of common toil and ordinary pleasure, turns the aspiring mind. Still, as we gaze on that lofty and immemorial rock, we recall the famine and the siege, and own that the more daring crimes of men have a strange privilege in hallowing the very spot which they devastate!"

"Below, in green curves and mimic bays covered with herbage, the gradual banks mingled with the water; and, just where the bridge closed, a solitary group of trees, standing dark in the thickest shadow, gave that melancholy feature to the scene which resembles the one dark thought that often forces itself into our sunniest hours. Their boughs stirred not; no voice of birds broke the stillness of their gloomy verdure; the eye turned from them as from the sad moral that belongs to existence. Here, at the confluence of the rivers, the Roman Castrum was entrenched—hence the name Coblenz; and, in the middle ages, the Electors of Treves found a stronghold and a refuge; here Marshal Bellerophon and a French army in vain carried on the siege and assault, conducted by Vauban under the personal auspices of Louis the Fourteenth; and here, again, the soldiers of the Revolution reduced the Prussian garrison, in 1793, to the most humiliating extremities, when, during the straits of the siege, where they were besieged, a cat's head was sold for five shillings, and a pound of horse flesh was bought for tenpence, or thirty kreutzers. It then fell into the hands of the French, who, before they evacuated its garrison, blew up its shattered walls and tower of victory, on which the iron shiver for years had poured in vain."

The floating-baths, and floating-mills of the Rhine, suggest improvements which might be beneficially adopted on many of our British rivers, and we have never found them more lucidly and accurately described than by Dr. Massie:

"Another arrangement which I observed appears worthy of notice, and might be initiated with beneficial results to the community in Britain and other countries. I allude to the floating-baths, which abound on the Rhine, and serve for more extensive purposes than individual comfort or profit—cleanliness and health. They seemed to be regarded as a part of the national economy. The youth of the localities resorted to them as a sort of gymnasium; and especially the young men, who anticipated employment in the army, assembled at them for daily discipline, and were taught to swim, under the direction of men appointed by the authorities for such a purpose. There are inclosures with awnings and shades, platforms, floating beams, buckets, and ropes, to afford every facility and inducement for the healthful exercise. The rope was held by the hand, or girt around the waist, and the floating beams were moved to and fro, so that the novice might try his attainments, or be sustained in courageously venturing beyond his depth, and become ultimately independent, and capable of casting aside all aids; and, plunging headlong into the stream, might dash forward with the freedom and indulgence of a pastime. Swimming is practised, not as a momentary recreation, but as part of a regular training, in which hours are spent. I think that, were there more bathing among ourselves, there would be more health; and were our youth more extensively taught to swim, there would be less fatality attending accidents, whether in rivers or at sea.

"My attention was attracted to the operation of the river flour-mills, which are numerous on this majestic stream, and might be advantageously employed in other regions. Immediately contiguous to the bridges of boats, and in other parts, I suppose the more equable channels of the river, these floating mills are moored, and kept in daily occupation. Their tacklings were fastened to anchors and powerful chains, or attached to the floating bridges. They were worked by external paddle-wheels, not dissimilar to the paddles of a steam-boat. The constant downward current of the river acted from without with the same effect as steam from within does, in the propulsion of the sailing vessel. Thus the corn is ground by the operation of a generally equal force; which I believe, is always preferred by the miller. I counted as many as ten, and, in some places, as many as seventeen mills of this description at one station. A smaller number, however, repeatedly occurred; and all the grain was brought in boats to a platform in front of the mill, and was returned to the storehouse on the banks of the river with the greatest facility. I do not know why such a mechanism should not be adopted, not alone on rivers, but also where the tide flows and recedes. The rise of the tide, flowing one way, might revolve the wheel; and the tide falling, sending the current out, might work it in such a manner as almost to secure a constant power; the engine being capable of reverse action, on the same principle with the engine of a steam-boat. Even in firths, or at the embouchures of rivers, independent of wind or steam, the miller's work might continue with but short intermission. I have adverted to these mills, not because I know much of the mechanical arts, or can profess to teach practical men; but as it is possible some intelligent mechanics, from the suggestion, may develop what will profit or improve with far more readiness and sagacity than I can display."

Notwithstanding the pressure on our space, we must make room for the history of the Free Trade League of Mayence:

"Mayence boasts celebrity for other incidents in European history, which are interesting to all, and which may even yet become the source of moral and popular power. The first which I would mention is not only for the locality the most important, but recognises within its operation principles of a just and wise political economy for all nations, applicable to all times, and promoting good will among all the tribes of the earth. Free Trade was first recognised by the citizens of Mayence, and first realised, through their instrumentality, among other cities upon the Rhine. Walpolden was a citizen of Mayence, who suggested the confederation of cities; which led first to the formation of a Rhenish, and then of the famous Hanseatic League. The union which he recommended was to secure advantages which should be common to all, and which they should share in spite of feudal or baronial power. Their plan was, to free commerce of the oppressive exactions enforced by knightly highwaymen, whose fortresses were a refuge to the plundering robbers too proud to work, and too selfish to consider the claims of justice or the rights of fellow-men. The whole Continent was at that time overspread with these haunts of rapine and excess. The Rhenish confederacy united for purposes of commerce, and, through Walpolden, obtained the counsel and sanction of the emperor Rodolph of Hapsburgh. To effect their object, they assailed these fortresses, unroofed their castles, and sent their feudal chiefs forth to other regions. To this movement has been ascribed the numerous and far-spread ruins of castellated buildings on the Rhine. Their picturesque grandeur serves a far more harmless, and even a more beneficial purpose now, in variegating the scene, and associating the present with memorials of the past, than, as the habitations of chivalry and martial parade, they could have done in their best days. They are landmarks now for the navigator and adventuring trader; but then they excited terror, and repressed commerce by their signs of life and occupation, when the feudal chiefs employed their menials to intercept and plunder the vessel of the merchant who sought the gains of trade. The tourist, in search of the picturesque, and the mariner, can alike look on them now with undisturbed composure.

"The Rhenish League was a precedent for the subsequent Hanseatic League—a confederation of the Hanse, or free towns of the Continent—to which I may again refer. But it was also founded much in the spirit, and for objects very similar with the designs of a more modern confederacy, whose combined energies will do even more for the world than did Walpolden and his condottieri. Though they may not leave so many fragmentary ruins to excite the admiration of future travellers, or fill the page of history with scenes of carnage and spoil, and tales of heroic bravery in dismantling the beautiful, magnificent, and picturesque mansions of lordly barons; yet the principle and process of Free Trade will have its achievements, its conquests, and its laurels; overcoming feudal tyranny and territorial domination; setting free the channels of commerce, the energies of men, and the wealth of nations."

Our last extract shall be the description of Berne, a city dear to all lovers of freedom, from its venerable associations with the patriots of old:

"Standing on an isthmus made by a curve of the Aar, 1800 feet above the level of the sea, and surmounted by a wooded summit, it bursts into view, to the surprise and delight of the tourist; and, encircled by this line of dark, of water rapidly rushing on its flanking sides, its mass of piled buildings, heaped, thrust, and pinnaled, stands out to view, surrounded by leafy and cultivated pastures and meadows, rising like terraces, one above another, from the river to the tall houses above. The contrast made more gratifying—it will startle the curious by its beauty and advantages.

From the ramparts, the Alpine attractions, in their distant snow-clad peaks, which invite to farther wanderings, appear in great grandeur. Were I to name more than the Jungfrau, the Eiger, the Wetterhorn, the Monch, and the Schreckhorn, would be to bewilder the imagination amidst nature's richest magnificence; while the expanding banks of the blue and lovely Aar, curling and murmuring far below, contrast with the grey sandstone habitations of the citizens, which rise to the height of six or seven stories, with crowded inhabitants from cellar to garret. The new bridge completed, gives a more modern and improving aspect to the city. More like a fortification than a republican town, it remains as a monument of the law of the strong hand, which prevailed in the times when Berne was chosen for defence rather than commerce. It is now the chief place for the residence of foreign ambassadors to the Swiss Diet; and is the centre of the most populous and wealthy of the cantons. The chief part of the town is the main street; and its houses extend over the foot-pavements, forming pillared arcades similar to those of Chester, but less roomy. These arches are filled by shopkeepers' goods, as in a lengthened bazaar; and thus the street is almost an impassable thoroughfare. The only means of enjoying ventilation for the inhabitants are their higher windows, which are furnished with cushions and balconies. The middle of the street is intersected, from end to end, by a channel large enough to be called a rivulet, which is supplied with copious streams thrown out continually from the fountains, surmounted by figures of bears, and men in armour, which at intervals, from top to bottom, are placed in the Rue Grand.

"The Bernese do not excel in their toilette. Their costume is simple, if not rude, and does not indicate a wide commercial intercourse with other lands. The women wear jacket and petticoat of coarse woollen, brown or blue, and the men have coat and trousers of the same stuff. The ordinary male and female attire, from head to heel, is made by themselves, of home manufacture, excepting a few holiday trappings, which their shops furnish. The women wear on the neck a black cotton velvet lapet, bound loosely under each arm, from back to breast, by a steel chain; and decorate their heads with bows of black ribbons and broad black lace. The whole people are accustomed, men and women, to laborious country toil; and are cleanly, comfortable, and contented. The conjecture was warranted, that they make or mend their own shoes, as well as prepare the coarse fabrics for their clothing at their cottage fire-sides, by the exposure and purchase of pieces of leather at the market. Zeiglockenthurm, an ancient tower, stands in the middle of the main street, like Temple bar, London; a tall block of masonry, dating from 1191, which had been a portal in the walls prior to the extension of the town. Its eastern side is furnished with the dial of a clock. The remarkable performance of its functions would not much interest those who treat such mechanism as toyish, rather than indicative of early progress; yet I will venture a brief description for my young friends. A strange whirring sound, a minute prior to the striking of the hour, gives notice of what follows. A variety of puppets, adjoining the dial, assume their functions; a cock flaps his wings, and crows; a king waves his sceptre; a troop of bears march round in procession; and the clock—strikes the hour. The crowing, flapping, waving, and marching then again follow; and silence reigns for another hour.

"Beyond the western gateway of the town, contiguous to the public promenade, is a well-constructed bear-pit, in which the fattest and largest bears, as sinecurists, are fed and pampered at the state's expense. The Bernese authorities have always shown great respect for sinecure pensioned bears. I wish the English authorities had never kept or upheld any worse sinecured and pampered pensioners. The tradition of the bears is unique in Bernese history; but, at the beginning of the last century, an old lady dying, without near relatives, bequeathed her fortune of 60,000 livres to them. The will was disputed by some distant relative of the deceased; but the cause of the brutes was so ably pleaded by one of the most distinguished members of the bar of Berne, that the plaintiff was nonsuited. The bears, declared the rightful heirs, were taken under the guardianship of the supreme council, who, treating them as wards of Chancery, or minors, administered their property. In order to maintain the succession to the estate, a pair of young bears was always reared, in case of the demise of the elders; and, to prevent too large an increase of the race, all that were born beyond this were fattened to furnish a dainty for the civic feasts of the Bernese burghmasters. The bears, however, did not long enjoy their fortune. The French revolution broke out; and its sweeping consequences, not confined to crowns and kingdoms, descended even to bears. The French army, having defeated the Swiss in several engagements, entered the town, (in 1788,) and immediately took possession of the treasury. Eleven males were despatched to Paris, laden with specie found in it; two of them bore away the birth-right of the bears, amounting at the time to about two millions of francs. The bears themselves were led away captives, and deposited in the Jardin des Plantes, where one of them, the celebrated Martin, soon became the favourite of the French metropolis. When, after a series of years, the ancient order of things was restored at Berne, one of the first cares of the citizens was to replace and provide for their ancient pensioners. A subscription was raised in consequence, and a small estate purchased; the rents of which, though diminished from various causes, are appropriated to their support. The cost of keeping them amounts to between 600 and 700 francs per annum; and well-grounded fears are entertained that modern legislators, forgetful of the services rendered by Bruin for so many centuries, in figuring upon the shield of the canton, may soon strike him off the pension list."

We take leave of Dr. Massie, with greater admiration of his powers than of his prudence; controversial theology is bad seasoning to a book of travels, especially when no care is taken to sooth down condemnation by the more gentle feeling of pity for human error. With this exception, however, the tone of the book is vigorous and healthful, the descriptions very vivid, and the course of the narrative easy and flowing. A little less of controversy, and a little more of Christian charity, would have rendered it as acceptable a companion and guide in a Continental tour as could well be desired.

UNITED STATES.

LIVERPOOL, THURSDAY.—The arrival of the New York packet-ship Rochester, Captain Britton, at this port to-day, has put us in possession of papers five days later than before, to the 21st. inclusive.

The debate upon the Oregon had been resumed in the Senate, but not yet brought to a conclusion. The speakers were for the most part on the pacific side of the question, but the arguments possess but little novelty.

The new Tariff, or Customs' Duties Bill, had been introduced by Mr. Walker, Secretary of State.

The steamer Cambria arrived at Boston on the 18th inst. She sailed hence on the 4th of February, and carried out news a whole month later than before, and news, too, it will be remembered, of the most intense interest. It was expressed to New York in 7½ hours, and caused a great sensation. The New York Herald observes:

"The news is of the highest importance, both in a political and commercial point of view, and as it spreads through the south and west, must have a very favourable effect upon business matters generally, and upon the prices for our principal staple productions particularly. The bill introduced into Parliament by Sir Robert Peel, in relation to a reduction of duties upon the importations into the United Kingdom, met with universal favour, and had a very good effect upon trade in the manufacturing districts throughout the country. In many instances large purchases of the raw material had been made, and arrangements commenced for extending the produce of the loom. Should this bill of Sir Robert Peel be completed, and become a law, the effect upon the most important interests of this country will be as great as on those of Great Britain; it will cement the interests of both countries more firmly than they have ever yet been, and the political differences must be very much softened down by the increased liberality that characterises the commercial systems of the two nations.

"The attention of the commercial classes of Great Britain is turned to this country, in expectation of a reduction in our tariff. There appears to be a determination in Parliament to bring down the tariff of Great Britain to the lowest point, and it is expected that a reciprocal movement will be made in reducing the duties on the manufactures of Great Britain, imported into this country. The two Governments have before them bills for the reduction of the tariff, and it is due to that Government that the most liberal compromise in our commercial system should be made. The bill proposed by Mr. Walker would be highly satisfactory to the commercial classes of Europe generally, and Great Britain particularly; and after the reported reductions made in the duties on American produce in England, it is but just, it is but fair, that some concessions should be made on our side. Reductions have from time to time been made in the British tariff upon our products, without a corresponding reduction, or even the slightest reduction, on the part of our Government; and notwithstanding these repeated disappointments, the Government of Great Britain have proposed another reduction, before the first change has been made in our tariff. In the face of these facts, it becomes necessary that immediate measures should be taken to adopt at once Mr. Walker's bill, and place the tariff upon the most liberal foundation."

Referring again to the state of the Oregon negotiations, the same paper observes:

"The political news, also, possesses great interest, as it must give confidence in the permanency of our peaceful relations with England, and do away with many of those fears and alarms which have for the past year had such a blighting effect upon commercial affairs. The remarks of Sir Robert Peel indicate an intention on the part of the Government to settle the Oregon question by negotiations, if possible; and his allusion to the course pursued by Mr. Pakenham, in refusing the offer made by Mr. Buchanan, is pretty good evidence that had the offer been submitted by Mr. Pakenham to his Government, it would have been very favourably received, and perhaps have been accepted. Mr. Pakenham therefore deserves the censure the Prime Minister gave him in Parliament, as the difficulties that have grown, and those that may grow out of this question, can be attributed entirely to the refusal of the last offer of Mr. Buchanan by Mr. Pakenham, without consulting his Government."

(From the New York Tribune, Feb. 20.)

The news from Europe, by the arrival of the Cambria steamer, is of the highest importance, and was received here with the greatest joy. The British Government is determined on peace, which is proclaimed in the speech from the throne, and by Sir R. Peel in the House of Commons. This news is altogether unexpected, and so much better than was anticipated, that it had an instantaneous effect to advance the price of stocks, and to inspire confidence. The proposal to reduce the duties of American produce is all we can wish: those articles most important, such as beef, pork, and Indian corn, are to be admitted free or nearly so. These are the leading articles that the Continent of Europe cannot compete with us in, and which we can supply to almost any extent. The debates in Congress will be very much affected by the news, and it is believed will be shaped to a speedy and happy issue. The spring trade has commenced; merchants are here from the south and west; the auctioneers have commenced their spring sales, and our hotels are fast filling up. The weather has been quite stormy and severe, and the rivers remain closed; happily, however, the railroads have not been obstructed, and travelling has continued uninterrupted.

(From the Express.)

The intelligence we consider in some respects of more importance than any we have received for many years. The proposition of the British Ministry to reduce the duty on many of the most important articles imported from the United States is all that could be wished. The reduction is on the very articles that the most experienced men in this country would have selected, if they had had the opportunity to frame the bill. One of the most important is that of Indian corn. This is the species of grain that is raised in immense quantities in this country. By the census of 1840, the product of a single year was over three hundred and seventy-seven millions of bushels, and the largest yield was in the state of Tennessee. In the growth of this description of grain, no country on the globe can compete with us. We have, in fact, a greater monopoly in the growth of corn than we have in that of cotton. The duty is now 1 cent a bushel, and by the proposed law is to be admitted free. The admission of pork and beef from this country, free, is an important event. Beef is already shipped from here in great quantities, and has become in high favour. Pork is also shipped freely from this country. The reduction of duties on butter, candles, cheese, cloths, hams, hops, rice, and tallow is sufficient to allow very large shipments to be made. The duty on wheat, which is now 2s. sterling, or 15 cents a bushel, is to be reduced to 6d, or 12 cents a bushel, and a corresponding reduction in flour.

The intelligence, in a political point of view, is of the highest importance. Notwithstanding all the boasting and swaggering from this country, the Government of England are determined on peace.

The Queen's Speech is decidedly pacific, and Sir Robert Peel's is, if possible, more so. It is now certain that war must come from this side of the water, if at all.

FAMINE IN IRELAND.

DUBLIN, MARCH 10.—The subjoined remarkable statement was unanimously agreed to at a meeting of the magistrates, clergy, and respectable farmers of the parish of Kilmone, county of Clare, held in the National School-house of Newhall on Friday, the 6th inst. Mr. John Macdonnell, of Newhall, in the chair, for the purpose of urging on the members of the Scarcity Commission the necessity of affording immediate relief to the destitute unemployed poor of the district:

"That there are in this parish 100 families and upwards in great want. The failure of the potato crop, the high price of potatoes in Ennis market (5d. yesterday), the want of resident gentry to employ the people—all combine to spread distress and misery throughout this neighbourhood.

"That about 100 acres of the rich alluvial corcas land adjoining the estuary of the river Fergus have been cultivated during the past year by the labourers of this parish, the entire produce of which has been lost.

"That at the present moment there are in this parish more than 50 families in a state bordering on extreme destitution; or, in other words, that they frequently cannot procure even one meal in the 24 hours of the cheapest food, as they are without money, credit, or employment.

"That in another month we shall have an additional number of 50 families and upwards in similar destitution, and that before the 1st of next May more than the third part of the inhabitants of this parish will have to depend, in order to sustain life, on the employment afforded by public works, or the relief given by humane landlords.

"That the extensive farmers of the parish have lost almost the entire of their potatoes—hence the poor are excluded from the extensive charities hitherto given in the agricultural districts—hence likewise a great diminution of the employment heretofore afforded by the farmers to the neighbouring poor.

"That there are not in this parish provisions sufficient, at an average, to feed the inhabitants for a month."

A parish priest (the Rev. Mr. Lynch) in the county of Clare, has addressed a letter to a local paper, which gives a very gloomy account of the condition of the people in the district over which he is placed:

"The potatoes (says the rev. gentleman) are all but gone in this district, while the people have no employment, for, as there is neither resident landlord nor agent in Kilmone, they are left to their own resources. What will the public think when they are informed that in one parish (Kilmone) there are more than 12,000 acres Irish to which the hand of industry was never applied, not from any want of disposition on the part of the people, but from an unaccountable and insane apathy on the part of the landlords? What then are the people who are so neglected to do? Their food is nearly exhausted, and yet they have no employment in a district where industry is required in every form, whether it be in repairing of roads and bridges, making fences, clearing land, &c. Meetings have been called in other baronies and money applied for to meet the approaching famine, and why not hold a meeting in this barony? I would suggest the prudence of doing so, before a scene of anarchy may be acted which would be deplored by every lover of peace and religion. Principis obsta was never more applicable than at the present time. It is a very dangerous experiment to try the patience of a hungry populace."

FREE TRADE CONTAGIOUS.

(From the Spectator.)

The protectionists are probably in the right when they maintain that Foreign Governments will not take off their restrictive or prohibitive duties on English produce because we take off our restrictive or prohibitive duties on theirs. But the protectionists are wrong when they infer that restrictive or prohibitive duties on English goods will therefore remain as stringent after we have liberalised our tariff as they are at present. The Free Trade policy of England may work as an example, although foreign Governments do not reduce the duty on English cottons in order to reward Englishmen for abolishing the duty on their corn. For example—the best argument against the English Corn Law is that it creates scarcity by artificial means: it is the Corn Law that we have to thank in great part for the extent to which the potato has become a substitute for bread: under the Corn Law the food of the people has deteriorated in quality. A parallel case is at this moment engaging the attention of the French chambers. For many years the consumption of butcher-meat in France has been decreasing. In 1830, the annual consumption of meat was 124 kilogrammes per head; in 1840, it was only 11 kilogrammes: in the course of ten years the consumption of meat by the French population has diminished 11 per cent. This appears from official documents published by the Minister of Commerce in 1842. The chamber of deputies proposes to check this deterioration of the popular aliment by reforming the duties exacted by municipalities on all cattle brought into towns. While other deputies were dealing with the evil much after the fashion of our protectionists, M. de Lamartine struck at its root. He traced the increased price of meat and its decreased consumption to the duties levied at the frontier on imported cattle. M. de Lamartine has thus indissolubly associated in the public mind of France two ideas—scarcity of animal food, and duties on the importation of foreign cattle to protect French graziers. The duties on imported cattle are about to become as odious in France as the duties on imported corn in England. The example set by England in the abolition of the Corn Law will be quoted in support of the abolition of the French restrictive duties on foreign cattle. Swiss and Belgian graziers will be permitted to compete on equal terms with French graziers in French markets, and French graziers will insist upon being allowed in like manner to purchase their cattens of foreign manufacture if they can get them cheaper than at home. Not to favour England will the duty on foreign cattle be abolished in France; but its abolition will on the one hand be accelerated by the repeal of our Corn Law, and on the other it will accelerate the free introduction of our manufactures into France.

MISCELLANEOUS.

We understand that Sir Robert Peel's new sliding-scale finds very little favour in this neighbourhood, the general feeling of the farmers being that, if they are to be subjected to competition with the foreigner, the sooner the measure comes into full operation the better. They say, and with truth, that they are much more likely thus to enter into satisfactory arrangements with their landlords than if they are for the next three years to be mocked with a show of protection, which shall serve no other purpose than to afford an excuse to those who may feel a disinclination to accommodate themselves and those dependent upon them to the new state of things.—Salisbury Journal.

The Austrian Lloyd's, published at Trieste, states that three eminent engineers, of France, England, and Austria, are about to meet at Paris, to agree upon a plan for forming a canal across the Isthmus of Suez. We believe that this is entirely incorrect as relates to England, which has no interest in the formation of such a canal, though it would derive great advantage from the formation of a railway from Cairo to Suez.

The anticipated repeal of the Corn Laws does not seem to create much alarm among the owners of the soil. A parcel of copyhold arable land has just been sold at 90s. per acre, at Donington, near Boston. The quality is not very good; and the price, with the court fees, will be about 100s. per acre. The purchaser was Mr. Cragg, supposed to be for Earl Brownlow.

The cost of the French War Department this year is 325 millions of francs, or about thirteen millions sterling, so that it seems that the luxury of making razzias on the poor Arabs is rather an expensive one.

An Irish paper mentions the case of a sick man, at Thorndegate, who, in a fit of delirium, got up and ate several bank notes by way of disappointment to his expectant heirs.

A Liverpool Tory paper speaks of the Reform Bill as a measure carried by "the congregated ruffians of England." Three-fifths, at least, of the constituency of Liverpool, would have had no votes but for the measure thus denounced.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 14, 1846.

PROGRESS OF FREE TRADE ON THE CONTINENT.

The movement in favour of Free Trade in France advances with a rapidity and an enthusiasm which could hardly have been anticipated. A popular journal laments that France had not taken the initiative in the enfranchisement of commerce, which it regards as the greatest social triumph that can be obtained by a nation. Lamartine, the poet of Christianity, and the most eloquent orator in France, has vindicated his high intellectual claims by taking the lead in the attack on monopoly. In another part of our paper we have inserted the practical and sound speech of the Mayor of Bordeaux, at the Free Trade meeting in that city; but we cannot pass over some of the powerful statements of the effect of protection on French industry adduced by M. Lamartine, during the discussion of the import duties on cattle, in the Chamber of Deputies:

"Those whom legislation should favour, (he exclaimed) are the masses that suffer from hunger! Our duty is to provide the workman's morsel of meat at a low price. If the nutriment of the people, and especially meat, be bad, unwholesome, often insufficient and always dear, where lies the fault?—In our short supply of cattle and of provender, and consequently in the high price of meat in our markets. In a family consisting of a husband, a wife, and two or three children, if the wife wishes to have a bit of meat for dinner, she must expend the day's wages on its purchase.

"The source of the evil is the systematic dearth and scarcity of cattle in France, produced by your tax upon their import; in this system you must seek your remedy, when you seriously propose to raise the standard of food for the working classes.

"I believe that such questions which affect the very life of our countrymen have a right to interest you as much as political questions. But they must be themselves political questions in an assembly where the support of the working classes and the comfort of the population must ever be the most interesting of political considerations. I repeat it questions of the supply of food are questions of life and death for a legislature.

"You import about 35,000 head of cattle, which pay a duty of 50 millions of francs. What is the result? You are levying a tax of 50 millions on the labour, the wages, the comforts, the very life of your industrial population. Is this the policy of statesmen, or the policy of hucksters?

"You make bread dear, wood dear, iron dear, meat dear, when lowering their price would people your territory. Is this economy? * * *

"True political economy should have its morality; the low price of necessities for the people is its virtue—a systematic raising of prices is its crime.

"Every time that you vote a higher price for the necessities of life to producers against the poor consumers, you are voting for privation, for misery, for suffering, for nakedness, for famine, for disease, and for death itself.

"Let a unanimous League of justice and benevolence be formed against this false economy. It is when we are discussing the life, the food, and the comfort of the people that great thoughts come from the heart; and I will add, great truths also. Know you what is the truth in all those questions of taxes, duties or imposts on the dwelling, the clothing, and the food of the people? Know you what is the truth before God and man, before philosophers as well as economists, before reason as well as religion? I will tell you in one sentence—it is cheap support of life, cheap conditions of existence for the people."

We rejoice to see the greatest of living poets thus eloquently pleading the cause of the people in the sacred names of justice, humanity, and the brotherhood of nations. This is the true utility of genius; and this also is its highest glory.

Among the Free Trade pamphlets sent us from France, there is a speech delivered by the Duke d'Harcourt, in the Chamber of Peers, which has been widely circulated and justly admired by our neighbours beyond the Channel, from which we must take some striking passages:

"Providence, in its wondrous wisdom, has spread the riches of the earth's produce in different climates, to force men to go in search of them, and form intercourse with each other by mutual exchange. To restrict such exchanges is to violate the laws of Providence.

"Barbarians are barbarians only because they have no wants, and no intercourse. Free Trade, then, is civilisation; and prohibition is barbarism.

"Archimedes said, 'Give me a resting point, and I will move the world;' and we say confidently, Give us Free Trade, and we defy religious animosities, national hate, war, famine, poverty; all those evils which are the ordinary heritage of suffering humanity, to perpetuate their pernicious existence. * * *

"We have a magnificent spectacle before us in England, a parallel to which cannot be found in history; it is that of the League, which has been formed, not merely to repeal the Corn Laws, but all those duties, falsely called protective, but which should rather be called tariffs of oppression; for while they protect the few, they oppress and crush the many.

"When we reflect on the obstacles it has had to subdue and the enemies it has had to combat, it is impossible to withhold our just tribute of applause to a nation which has made such heroic efforts for the good of mankind. Statues should be erected to Mr. Cobden as a benefactor of mankind!"

We quote these passages because they show that the Free Traders of France are able to command an audience, and to enlist large sympathies in their cause. Meetings have been held to inculcate these principles in the great cities; the press has, to a great extent, abandoned the narrow prejudices which led a great number of journals to support restriction; and the newspapers devoted to the cause of monopoly in France, are almost as few and as unimportant as the Mrs. Harrises and Mrs. Gamps of England.

The progress of Free Trade in Germany is as steady, though not so rapid, as in France; in fact, the Zollverein, apparently established to support the protective system, contains in its inherent elements principles destructive of monopoly. It secures internal freedom of trade so far as its association extends. To establish perfect Free Trade is nothing more than to include the civilised world in one Zollverein. The experiment successfully tried on a small scale not only suggests such an extension, but gives an irresistible impulse to its realisation. It is gratifying to find that the Continental nations which followed England's bad example in restrictions, exhibit equal readiness to imitate her wiser policy of relaxations.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, MARCH 9.—With a short supply of wheat, both by land carriage and coastways, factors are unable to establish an advance over last Monday's prices. In the morning, 1s. to 2s. more money was asked, but buyers were unwilling to accede to the increase in price, and the market closed without alteration from last week. Fine wheat was easier to sell. There is rather more inquiry for bonded wheat, but prices continue the same as of late, without much actual business passing. Barley is in short supply, and fetches 1s. more money than last Monday for all descriptions. The arrivals of oats are also small. The vessels which brought the last large supply from Ireland are coming on demurrage; this causes inferior corn, of which the supply chiefly consisted, to be offered on late terms; but fine oats, both English and Irish, will sell readily at rather higher rates. Of beans and peas there is a fair quantity on sale; the former maintain their value, but the latter are difficult to quit.

FRIDAY, MARCH 13.—What English Wheat appears in the return arrived in time for Wednesday's market, and was nearly all sold on that day at quite the currency of Monday. To-day there is scarcely any offering; but what there is sells at the same prices as before. About 12,200 quarters of Foreign Wheat have arrived. This trade continues dull; but prices are not lower than of late. Barley has come forward sparingly, and sells on Monday's terms; there is not much life in the trade. Only one small vessel from Ireland has arrived with Oats this week. The Foreign are being landed in bond, so that the supply of corn for consumption is very small; and added to that of inferior condition. The market is bare of Oats generally, and holders are asking more money than on Monday; but it is not easy to effect sales, and quotations cannot be altered. Beans and Peas as on Monday.

THE IMPENITENT FACTION.

Monopoly shows worst as it comes nearest its end. The old sinner is impenitent to the last. Not a sign of grace, or discretion, as the death-hour visibly approaches—not a vestige of repentance, amendment, or decent and half-virtuous regret—not a trace even of the shame with which detected and disabled vice is wont to view the unrolled catalogue of the misdoings of a life-time. Landlordism's last demonstrations are its worst. Nothing but maudlin whinings over the loss of ill-gotten gains—hypocritical sympathies and crocodile tears for the lowlier victims of a dishonest and hateful system—and blind, mad endeavours to lengthen out a losing fight, whose eventful issue is as certain as is the rising of to-morrow's sun.

If the faction were purposely bent on making the very name of "protection" detestable in the ears even of the most moderate and unimpassioned classes of the community—on concentrating upon itself, its leaders, and its cause, the maximum amount of odium and contempt of which the cool and quiet British commercial public is capable—the work could not be done better. Our protectionists are not merely offending and irritating—they are sickening and disgusting—the country. Commerce is at a stand still; industry is paralysed by a baneful uncertainty as to duties and prices, which cripples both buyer and seller;—and commerce and industry perfectly well know who they are that have "done it all." That commercial and industrial activity, which is the very life of the people of these islands, has been suspended for these two months past, awaiting the fate of those legislative measures which are henceforth to be the basis of its operations and development;—yet still these men go on with their spiteful or silly obstruction of an inevitable result—debating and dividing on the minutiae of a tariff, every item of which is safe in an irresistible and irreversible majority. It is all in vain that "the great commercial houses in the city of London, almost all the merchants connected with the East India trade, and with the direction of the Bank of England," and other recognised representatives of the commerce by which England lives, urge, by their united petition, "the expediency of arriving at a decision, on account of the stagnation and embarrassment to which delay exposes so many valuable interests." What care they for the stagnation of a commerce, and the embarrassment of an industry, of which they can never speak two consecutive words without exhibiting an almost babyish ignorance—what care they, so that they may but annoy and harass a Free Trade Minister? It is in vain that they are warned of the ruinous losses which their Parliamentary sport is daily and hourly inflicting on the poor hoaxed and gulled "British farmer"—whose market they are spoiling with uncertainty and panic—who, at this moment, is actually mulcted, in hard cash, of some shillings on every quarter of corn that he is unlucky enough to be obliged to sell at those depreciated prices, for which he has to thank his "friends," and his friends' ridiculous predictions, of a chimerical "inundation" and an impossible cheapness. They heed it not, so that they may but tease "Peel," and vent their hoarded spleen on a minister who has dared to renounce his allegiance to their sordid and shabby "interest," and give it to the Queen and the people.

With Ireland in its present state, the conduct and temper of the protectionists are really horrible. Famine and pestilence are advancing in that wretched country with terrific rapidity. Already has the Home Secretary found it necessary to come down to Parliament, with the darkly ominous application for "leave to bring in a bill to make temporary provision for the treatment of destitute persons affected with FEVER in Ireland." The Minister, especially responsible for the peace, health, and life of the country, publicly avers before the representatives of the people, with the emphasis and authority of a man holding in his hands official chapter and verse for every syllable of what he utters, that a calamity of unexampled extent and awfulness is at the very door. He declares, that "distress now pervades the whole of IRELAND;" that "it is to be found in every province, in every county, in every union or more minute subdivision, almost in every parish in Ireland;" and that, as the direct consequence of this all-pervading distress, "in all the provinces, in almost every county, and in various localities of different counties, DYSENTERY, to a very formidable extent, has made its appearance, attended by FEVER in many instances,"—and justifying, in the judgment of the Lord-Lieutenant, "AN APPREHENSION THAT THE FEVER WILL BECOME GENERAL." All to no purpose. It goes in at one ear and out at the other—with no other visible result than that of confirming the faction's obstinacy in a course which, as is felicitously suggested by one of themselves, "may almost appear inhuman." If Government would only be so good as to buy their corn to feed Ireland, that would alter the case; they would then have no objection to believing in the famine—the hucksters! History will record, with indignant amazement, that in the year 1846, there were men who deemed it not unfitting the character of English Christian gentlemen, to deprecate an "inundation" of food, when four millions of people were pining in destitution, and had actually begun to die off in pestilence—and who, in the face of as hideous a calamity as ever visited these islands, whine beggar-like for "two years longer" of protection from beef and mutton, and suggest "the introduction of a sliding scale on the importation of foreign cattle," to secure them the full benefit of "the destruction caused by murrain and sheep-rot."

And there is nothing to be got by it. The protectionist opposition have not even the wretched apology of a possible success in their evil work. Not the shadow of a chance of success have they—and they know it; that is, those of them know it who are capable of knowing anything. They know that they are forsaken by the public—even by their own protected agricultural public. They know that no living statesman owns them, or their cause, any longer as his. They know that no imaginable "appeal to the people" could turn their minority into a majority. They know that not a particle of genuine unbought popular sympathy is with them. They know that they can't throw out the Bill—and that if they could, they would only throw the country into a confusion from which they and their class would never again emerge as a great power in the state. They know that the Bill will pass, and pass now—and that if it did not, the only consequence would be, that a Bill they like still less would pass by-and-bye. We don't believe they wish to throw out the Bill; if they did wish this, they would send it to the Lords without more words, where alone it possibly can be thrown out. The obstruction cannot answer any purpose—is not meant or expected to answer any purpose—but a mischievous one. It is all a piece of mere factious spite—or of mere pudding-headed stupidity and doggedness.

The League have often been reproached, by those extremely good-natured and temperate friends who love to saunter leisurely in the rear of a great popular movement, with "violence," "harsh imputation of motives," and the like. Any attempt to take off the edge of such criticism on our sayings and doings would now be a sheer work of supererogation. The world can judge—and the world does judge. The quietest, soberest, discreetest, most sedate, and least impulsive classes of the English people are now learning for themselves to scorn these men's imbecility, abhor their sordidness, and loath their canting hypocrisy. We tell the protectionist faction, that every step they take in their course of heartless and brainless resistance to a measure which the intelligence of the country approves, and which the exigencies and will of the country imperiously demand, only sinks them and their order deeper and deeper in the mire of public contempt and disgust.

IRELAND AND THE CORN LAWS.

Far be it from us to deny the purity of Mr. W. Smith O'Brien's patriotism. He has asserted it so loudly and so frequently, that there ought to be no doubt about the matter; but we may be permitted to lament that he is an Othello in his politics, and that he loves Ireland "not wisely," however he may be said to love his country "too well." To ordinary minds, import of food would seem the proper remedy for famine; but the descendant of Brian Boru is not an ordinary man; and he therefore avers that the export of provisions is the great cure for scarcity. He is quite pathetic on the horrible results that will follow from Irish wheat, oats, and barley, being kept to feed hungry peasants, instead of being sold in England to pay the rents of rapacious landlords. His remedy for distress is to send away stock, his cure for scarcity to diminish supply. The novelty of this plan deserves the praise of ingenuity, and the plainness with which it was stated has at least the merit of candour.

Lugubrious assertions in menacing tones, like a doleful ditty set to a martial air, are so ludicrous from their incongruity, that they unfortunately do not command their fair share of public attention. The lament over the probable diminution of Irish exports failed to awake the sympathies of the compassionate, or to rouse the fears of the timid. Some very obstinate people found consolation in the belief, that if Irish corn should not be sent to England, it might have some chance of being consumed at home; and they were not so deeply grieved as they ought to have been at the probability of the labourer having a loaf, even though, at this crisis, the landlord should have a trifling loss. We regret that such obduracy should be found; we are grieved that the wisdom of encouraging the export of provisions from a country where the supply is already insufficient should have appeared to a vast majority such consummate folly as not even to merit a word of refutation. The economist from the banks of the Shannon is unfortunately without honour on the banks of the Thames. In their simplicity, people here have got to believe that imports have more to say than exports with the prosperity of a country; they have got a tradesmanlike habit of looking to their incomings as well as their outgoings; but then they do not wear fools' caps, nor deliberate on the shape of their peaks in the midst of a starving population. Living in 1846, they do not see the virtue of going back to 1782; they do not believe that exploded fallacies derive any merit from antiquity, or that a mischievous system should be continued because specious sentences in its defence can be silyly taken from the writings of the eloquent deceased.

We, however, like Mr. W. Smith O'Brien, feel some anxiety about Irish exports; the sooner that Irish patriots follow O'Connell's example, and send away their fallacies of protection, their prejudices in favour of high prices, and their prizes on the export of the food for the want of which their countrymen are famishing, the better will it be for themselves and the country. From the very beginning of Free Trade agitation, O'Connell has earnestly protested against the taxing of the people's food, and has given the invaluable aid of his eloquence and his energies to hasten the liberation of commerce from its trammels. Ireland has had too many proofs of his tried sincerity, his persevering patriotism, and his experienced sagacity for us to fear that any other leader can weaken the influence of his counsels, or lessen the force of his recommendations.

FREE TRADE ABROAD.

SPEECH OF M. FREDERIC BASTIAT, AT THE FREE TRADE MEETING IN BORDEAUX.

We give insertion to M. Bastiat's speech, according to our promise, not that we exactly agree in all its views or sentiments, but simply because we are anxious to show in what light the proceedings of the League are regarded by an intelligent foreigner, whose attainments and position give his sentiments a powerful influence over the minds of his countrymen.

DISCOURS DE M. FREDERIC BASTIAT.

"Messieurs, — En présence d'une assemblée si imposante, qui réunit dans cette enceinte tant de lumières, d'esprit d'entreprise, de richesses et d'influence, vous ne serez pas surpris que j'éprouve une émotion insurmontable, et que je commence par réclamer votre indulgence. Je parais devant vous, messieurs, pour me conformer aux dispositions prises par notre honorable président. Eussions-nous à notre tête un chef moins expérimenté, il faudrait encore nous soumettre à sa direction, car mieux vaut un plan même médiocre que l'absence, ou, ce qui revient au même, la multiplicité des plans. Mais puisque l'Association a eu le bonheur de remettre la conduite de ses opérations à un de ces hommes rares, à la tête froide et au cœur chaud, qui tire plus d'autorité encore de son caractère personnel que de sa position élevée, il ne nous reste plus qu'à marcher au pas, sous sa conduite et dans un esprit de discipline volontaire, à la conquête du grand principe que nous avons inscrit sur notre bannière : La liberté des échanges !

"Messieurs, la première épreuve par laquelle est condamnée à passer toute grande entreprise, c'est le décapement qui s'attache toujours à la pensée généreuse qui cherche à se traduire en fait. Grâce au ciel, la valeur individuelle et l'ensemble imposant des noms qui figurent ce soir au bas de notre acte de société, imposent une telle vigilance. On dira bien, on a déjà dit que notre Associa-

ADDRESS OF M. FREDERIC BASTIAT.

"Gentlemen, — In the presence of so imposing an assembly, comprising so much intelligence, spirit of enterprise, wealth, and influence, you will not be surprised at my feeling insurmountable emotions, for which I claim your indulgence. I appear before you, gentlemen, in conformity with the arrangements made by our chairman. Had we met under a less experienced chief, it would still be necessary to submit to his directions, for even an imperfect system is better than the absence, or what comes to the same thing, the multiplication of plans. But since the association has had the good fortune to place its operations under the guidance of one of those rare individuals with a cool head and a warm heart, who derives more authority from his personal character than from his elevated position, it only remains for us to advance steadily and in a spirit of voluntary discipline to the establishment of the great principle which we have inscribed on our banners — FREE TRADE.

"Gentlemen, the first difficulty, through which our great enterprise is doomed to pass, is the necessity of excision from slaughter, always necessary for a generous thought about to realise itself in action. Thank Heaven, the individual value and the imposing assemblage of the names which will be subscribed to our deed of association this evening, must impose silence on malevolent insinuations. It may tion est une copie, une pâle copie de la ligne anglaise; mais, est-ce que les hommes de tous les pays qui tendent au même but ne sont pas amenés à prendre des moyens analogues? Non, nous ne copions pas la ligne, nous obéissons aux nécessités de notre situation. D'ailleurs, est-ce la première fois que Bordeaux élève la voix pour la liberté des échanges? La chambre de commerce de cette ville ne combat-elle pas, depuis longues années, pour cette cause? Cette cause n'était-elle pas un des objets de l'union vinicole qui s'est fondée dans la Gironde? Si tant de nobles efforts ont échoué jusqu'ici, c'est qu'ils s'adressent à la législation qui ne peut que suivre l'opinion publique. C'est donc pour poser la question là où elle doit être préalablement vidée, devant le public que nous nous levons aujourd'hui et en cela, si nous imitons quelqu'un, c'est notre adversaire, le monopole. Il y a longtemps qu'il fait ce que nous faisons; il y a longtemps qu'il a ses comités, ses finances, ses moyens de propagande, qu'il s'empare de l'opinion, et par elle de la loi. Nous l'imiterons en cela. Mais il y a une chose que nous ne lui emprunterons pas, c'est le mystère de son action. Il lui faut le secret, il lui faut des journaux achetés par dessous main. A nous, il nous faut l'air, le grand jour, la sincérité.

"Et puis, quand nous imitons la ligne en quelque chose! Sommes-nous dispensés de bon sens et de dévouement parce qu'il s'est rencontré du dévouement et du bon sens en Angleterre? Oh! plaise à Dieu que nous empruntons à la ligne ce qui fera sa gloire éternelle! Plaise à Dieu que nous apportions à notre œuvre la même ardeur, la même persévérance et la même abnégation; que nous sachions comme elle nous préserver de tout contact avec les partis politiques; grandir, acquiescer de l'influence, sans être tenté de la détourner à d'autres desseins, sans la mettre au service d'aucun nom propre. Et si jamais notre apostolat s'incarne dans un homme, puisse-t-il, à l'heure du triomphe, finir comme finit Cobden. Il y a deux mois, l'aristocratie anglaise, selon un usage inviolable, voulut absorber cet homme. On lui offrit un portefeuille; M. Peel est lui-même le fils d'un manufacturier, et Cobden pouvait voir, en espérance, son fils premier lord de la trésorerie. Il répondit simplement: 'Je me crois plus utile à la cause en restant son défenseur officieux.' Mais, ce n'est pas tout. Aujourd'hui que la ligne l'a placé sur un piédestal qui l'élève plus haut que l'aristocratie elle-même, aujourd'hui qu'elle a remis en ses mains des forces populaires capables de tenir en échec les whigs et les Tories, aujourd'hui que de toutes parts ses amis le pressent de faire tourner cette immense puissance à l'achèvement de quelque autre grande entreprise, aucune passion, aucune séduction ne peut l'émouvoir; il s'apprête à briser de ses mains l'instrument de son élévation, et il dit à l'aristocratie: 'Vous redoutez notre agitation, vous craignez qu'elle ne se porte sur un autre terrain; la Ligne s'est fondée pour l'abolition des monopoles. Abolissez-les ce matin, et, dès ce soir, la ligne sera dissoute.' Non, jamais, depuis dix-huit siècles, le monde n'a vu s'accomplir de plus grandes choses avec une si adorable simplicité.

"Mais si la ligne nous offre de beaux modèles, ce n'est point à dire que nous ayons à copier servilement sa stratégie. A qui fera-t-on croire que les hommes graves dont je suis entouré, des négociants rompus aux affaires et versés dans la connaissance des mœurs et des institutions des peuples, n'aient pas compris tout d'abord en be said—indeed it has been said, that our association is a copy, and a poor copy, of the English League; but are not the men of all countries who aim at the same object obliged to employ analogous means? No; we do not copy the League, we yield to the necessities of our position. Besides, is this the first time that Bordeaux has raised her voice to demand Free Trade? Has not our Chamber of Commerce laboured in the cause for many years? Was not this cause one of the objects of the union of the wine-growers founded in the Gironde? If so many noble efforts have hitherto failed, it is because they are addressed to a legislature which is impassive to public opinion. It is to moot this question where it must be primarily considered, before the public, that we come forward this day; and thus, if we imitate any one, it is our adversary—monopoly. It has long done what we are doing; it has had its committees, its finances, its means of spreading its doctrines, that it might first take hold of opinion and then of legislation. We will imitate it in this course. But there is one part of its policy which we will not borrow, its mysteriousness of action. It requires secrecy, it requires journals purchased by underhand bribes. We require publicity and sincerity.

"Even if we should imitate the League in some things, what then? Are we to abandon zeal and common sense, because zeal and common sense are found in England? God grant that we may borrow from the League that which will constitute its eternal glory. God grant that we may bring to our agitation the same ardour, the same perseverance, and the same disinterestedness; that we, like it, may avoid contact with political parties; that we may increase and gain influence without being turned aside to other designs, and without rendering ourselves servants of any individual name. And should our mission ever be incarnate in a man, may he, in the hour of triumph, end as Cobden is ending! Two months ago, according to its usual custom, the English aristocracy endeavoured to absorb this great man. He was offered office:—Peel himself is the son of a manufacturer, and Cobden might hope to see his son First Lord of the Treasury:—his simple reply was, 'I believe that I can best serve the great cause I have undertaken by remaining its official defender.' But this is not all: at this moment, when the League has placed him on a pedestal higher than the aristocracy itself; when it has placed in his hand popular power capable of holding both Whigs and Tories in check; when on all sides his friends solicit him to turn this mighty force to the achievement of some other great enterprise, no passion, no temptation, can move him: he is ready to destroy the means of his elevation; he says to the aristocracy, 'You dread our agitation, you fear that it will extend to some other field of action; the League has been founded for the overthrow of monopolies; abolish your monopolies this morning, and before night the League will be dissolved.' Never during 18 centuries has the world seen such great objects achieved with such admirable simplicity.

"But if the League offers us a noble example, we are not, therefore, bound slavishly to adopt its tactics. How could it be believed that the grave men by whom I am surrounded, merchants trained in business, and versed in the manners and institutions of nations, should not com-

"En Angleterre, le système protecteur avait deux points d'appui: l'erreur économique et la puissance féodale. On conçoit sans peine que l'aristocratie, tenant en main le privilège de faire la loi, et avec lui, pour ainsi parler, le monopole des monopoles, les avait établis principalement en sa faveur.

"Lors donc que des réformateurs véritables, non plus des Huskisson et des Baring, mais des réformateurs sortis du peuple, se sont levés contre le régime restrictif, il se sont trouvés en face d'une difficulté dont heureusement notre voix est débarrassée depuis un demi-siècle.

"Il s'agissait bien, comme chez nous, de réformer la loi, de détruire le monopole; mais leurs adversaires avaient seuls le droit, non point seulement le droit actuel, mais le droit exclusif, héréditaire, féodal, de faire la loi, de décréter la chute ou le maintien de leur propre monopole.

"Il fallait on arracher à l'aristocratie la puissance législative, c'est-à-dire faire une révolution, ou la déterminer, par la peur, à abandonner la part du lion qu'elle s'était faite à elle-même, par l'exploitation légale des tarifs.

"La ligne résolut, dès le premier jour, de rejeter les moyens révolutionnaires. Il ne lui restait donc qu'à instruire le peuple de la vérité économique, à lui faire comprendre l'injustice dont il était victime et à lui en donner un sentiment assez vif et assez pressant pour le porter jusqu'à l'extrême limite de la légalité, et pour ainsi dire jusqu'à ce degré d'irritation au-delà duquel il n'y a que convulsions sociales.

"Mais, si le poids que les ligueurs avaient à soulever était énorme, si énorme qu'on comprend à peine qu'ils n'en aient pas été effrayés, il faut dire que cette difficulté même mettait en leurs mains un puissant levier. Les mots magiques: liberté, droits de l'homme, oppression féodale, venaient naturellement se placer dans la question économique, lui enlever son hérédité et lui faire trouver le chemin de la fibre la plus vibrante du cœur humain.

On parlait aux cœurs; on parlait même aux estomacs, car, par une coïncidence qui s'explique naturellement, il arrivait que la part de l'aristocratie terrienne dans la protection pesait sur tous les aliments et principalement sur le pain.

"Cette situation étant donnée, on comprend les procédés de la ligne. Meetings monstres, souscriptions monstres, appels au peuple, éloquence passionnée, inscriptions incessantes des ouvriers sur les listes électorales, enfin toute l'agitation nécessaire pour mettre aux mains d'un seul homme, Cobden, des forces populaires capables de faire capituler la puissance réunie des whigs et des Tories. Hé bien! qu'a de commun cette situation avec la nôtre? Si, comme les Anglais, nous avons un préjugé économique à détruire, avons-nous comme eux une puissance féodale à combattre? Avons-nous 89 à montrer toujours au bout de nos efforts, comme notre ultima-ratio? Non, 89 a passé sur la France. Nous avons des pouvoirs publics qui empruntent à l'opinion la pensée de la loi; c'est donc sur l'opinion que nous devons agir, notre mission est purement enseignante; ce que nous demandons c'est ceci: Le droit de propriété est-il reconnu en France? Avons-nous ou n'avons-nous pas la propriété de nos facultés? Avons-nous ou n'avons-nous pas la propriété de notre travail? Si nous l'avons, comment se fait-il que cette chose, qui est le fruit de nos sueurs, cette chose que je puis consommer directement et détruire pour mon usage, je ne la puisse pas porter sur quelque marché prehend at once the difference between our association and the English League?

"In England the protective system had two supports, economic error and the feudal system. It is easy to conceive that the aristocracy, holding in its hands the privilege of making the laws, and with it what may be called the monopoly of monopolies, should have made laws in its own favour?

"When, therefore, the true reformers—no longer the Huskissons and the Barings—but reformers sprung from the people, rose against the restrictive system, they found themselves in the presence of difficulties from which we have been free for more than half a century.

"The reform of the law and the destruction of monopoly was their object as it is ours; but their adversaries alone had the right, not merely the actual right, but the exclusive, hereditary feudal right, to make the laws which should decree the fall or the maintenance of monopoly.

"It was necessary either to wrest legislative power from the aristocracy, that is to say, effect a revolution, or by an array of moral force to compel it to abandon the lion's share which it had arrogated to itself in the construction of the tariffs.

"The League resolved from the first to reject all revolutionary measures: its only course, therefore, was to instruct the people in economic truths; to explain the injustice of which the nation was the victim; to inspire sentiments sufficiently strong and sufficiently pressing to carry men to the extreme limits of the law; and to produce what we may describe as that degree of impatience beyond which there only remains social convulsion.

"But if the weight which the Leaguers had to raise was enormous—so enormous that we can scarcely comprehend how they were not daunted by it, we must also say that this very difficulty was a powerful leverage in their hands. The magic words, liberty, human right, feudal oppression, were naturally blended with an economic question, to deprive it of its heritage, and to make it touch the most vibratory chords of the human heart. The Leaguers addressed themselves to the hearts and even to the stomachs of their readers, for by a coincidence easily explained, it happened that the share of the landed aristocracy in protection weighed heavily on the food of the people, and especially on bread.

"This situation being understood, we can comprehend the proceedings of the League. Monster-meetings, monster-subscriptions, appeals to the people, passionate eloquence, continued registrations of operatives as electors; in fine, all the agitation necessary to place in the hands of a single man, Cobden, an amount of popular force sufficient to compel the united Whigs and Tories to capitulate. What similarity is there between this situation and ours? If, like the English, we have an economic prejudice to destroy, have we also a feudal power to combat? Have we an '89' to point to as the term of our efforts and our ultima-ratio? No, '89' has passed for France. Our public powers base their principles of law on public opinion; it is on public opinion, therefore that we must act; our mission is purely educational. What we ask is this. Is the right of property recognised in France? Have we pro-que ce soit dans le monde, pour ly troquer contre une autre chose qui est plus à ma convenance, on du moins comment se fait-il que je ne puisse pas rapporter en France cette autre chose qu'on a consenti à me donner en échange ?—Parce que, dit-on, cela nuirait au travail national.—Mais en quoi ? un cent mille toiles de ce genre peuvent-ils jamais porter atteinte au travail national, puisque tout travail étranger que je fais entrer dans le pays implique un travail national que j'en ai fait sortir ? Je sais bien que le commerce ne se compose pas ainsi de trocs directs entre le producteur immédiat et le consommateur immédiat ; mais tout ce vaste mécanisme qu'on appelle commerce, ces navires, ces banquiers, négociants, marchands, ce numéraire, peuvent-ils altérer la nature intime de l'échange qui est toujours troc de travail contre travail ? Qu'on y regarde de près, et l'on se convaincra qu'ils n'ont d'autre destination et d'autre résultat que de faciliter et multiplier à l'infini ces échanges.

"Ainsi, si nous n'avons pas le levier populaire que la ligue anglaise a mis en œuvre, il ne nous est pas nécessaire. Nous n'avons point à exalter les passions démocratiques jusqu'à les rendre menaçantes. Nous n'attaquons pas les intérêts d'un corps de législateurs héréditaires ; la seule chose que nous ayons à combattre, c'est une erreur, une fausse notion, un préjugé profondément enraciné dans les esprits, et que développe sur sa tige ce fruit empoisonné, le monopole. Nous n'attaquons pas même spécifiquement telle ou telle restriction en particulier. Comme le laboureur n'arrache pas un à un tous les joncs qui infestent sa prairie, mais il la saigne, il en détourne l'humidité malsain qui leur sert d'aliment, nous attaquons dans les intelligences le principe même de la protection qui nourrit tous les monopoles. La tâche est immense, sans doute, mais ne trouvons nous pas de puissants auxiliaires dans les faits qui s'accomplissent autour de nous ? Les États-Unis sont sur le point d'affranchir les importations. Qui n'a lu le message du président Polk et l'admirable rapport du secrétaire Walker ? Le Zollverein suspend les réunions où devait se décider l'élévation de ses tarifs. Et que dirai-je de la grande mesure de sir Robert Peel, précédée d'expériences si répétées et si décisives ? A ce propos, qu'il me soit permis d'exprimer ici le profond regret qu'on éprouve les amis de la liberté commerciale, quand ils ont vu, dans cette magnifique conception, des lacunes et des tâches contraires à l'esprit de son imposant ensemble. Comment le grand homme qui a aspiré à la gloire de cette réforme n'a-t-il pas voulu que le monde, et l'Angleterre surtout, en recueillît tout le fruit ? Pourquoi a-t-il placé dans l'exception les vins, comme pour attester qu'un moment même où il rejetait la déception de la réciprocité, il en voulait retenir quelques lambeaux ?

"Proclamons le principe de la liberté, et laissons au temps d'en tirer les conséquences. Demandons la réforme, et laissons aux monopoles le soin de la modifier. Il est des personnes qui reculent devant l'association parce qu'elles redoutent la liberté immédiate. Ah ! qu'elles se tranquillisent ! Nous ne sommes point des législateurs ; la réforme ne dépend pas de nos votes ; la lumière perçut en our natural powers ? Have we property in the work of our hands ? If so, how happens it that articles, the fruit of my toils, which I may consume directly or destroy at my pleasure, I cannot carry to any market in the world to exchange for articles which suit better my convenience ? Because, it is said, this would injure national industry. But in what way ? a hundred or a thousand exchanges of this kind could not injure national industry, for every article of foreign produce which I import, implies an article of national produce which I export. I know that commerce does not consist in the immediate barter between the direct producer and the direct consumer ; but all this vast mechanism which we call commerce—ships, bankers, merchants, shopkeepers, accounts—can these alter the very essence of commerce, which is but the barter of one product of labour for another ? Look close, and you will be convinced that they have no other destination, and no other result, than to facilitate and to multiply exchanges.

"Thus, if we have not the popular lever possessed by the English League, we do not require it. We want not to raise democratic passions until they become menacing. We attack not the interests of a body of hereditary legislators ; all that we have to combat is an error, a false notion, a prejudice profoundly rooted in the mind, and which produces in its growth the poisoned fruit of monopoly. We do not attack any special or particular restriction. As the labourer does not pluck up one by one the rushes which infest his fields, but drains off the injurious moisture which supports them, so we attack in the mind those principles of protection which are the aliment of monopolies. The task, no doubt, is immense, but do we not find powerful auxiliaries in the events which are taking place around us ? Are not the United States about to emancipate their imports ? Who has not read the message of Mr. President Polk, and the admirable report of Mr. Secretary Walker ? The Zollverein suspends the meetings held for raising its tariffs. And what shall I say of the great measure of Sir Robert Peel, resulting from such reiterated and decisive experience ? And here let me express the profound regret which the friends of commercial freedom have felt at finding in its details defects and faults adverse to the general spirit of its imposing plan. How is it that the great man who aspires to the glory of this reform has been unwilling that the world, and England in particular, should not gather all its fruits ? Why are wines an exception, as if to show that at the moment he rejected the deception of reciprocity, he wished to retain some of its fragments ?

"England, the United States, Germany, Italy itself, advance towards the new era which is opening for humanity. Shall France be content for selfish interests to remain behind other nations.

"Let us proclaim the principle of liberty, and leave time to develop the results. Let us demand reform, and leave to monopolists the care of moderating it. There are persons who shun this association because they fear immediate freedom. Let them be tranquil. We are not legislators ; reform depends not on our votes ; intelligence will not spread immediately, privilege will have sufficient time to take care of itself. This movement should be its warning, and should lead it to consider the ne se fera pas instantanément et le privilège a tout le temps de prendre ses mesures. Ce mouvement sera même un avertissement pour lui, et l'on doit le considérer comme un des moyens tant cherchés de transition.

"Je ne puis me défendre d'une profonde anxiété quand je pense à ce qui va se décider bientôt dans cette enceinte. Ce n'est pas seulement l'affranchissement du commerce qui est en question. Il s'agit de savoir si nous entrerons, enfin, dans les mœurs constitutionnelles. Il s'agit de savoir si nous savons mettre en œuvre des institutions acquises au prix de tant d'efforts et de tant de sacrifices. Il s'agit de savoir si les Français, comme on les en accuse, trouvant trop longue la route de la légalité et de la propagande, ne savent poursuivre que par des moyens violents des réformes éphémères. Il s'agit de savoir s'il y a encore parmi nous du dévouement, de l'esprit public, de la vie, ou si nous sommes une société assoupie, indifférente, léthargique, incapable d'une action suivie, et tout au plus animée encore par quelques rares et vaines convulsions. La France a les yeux sur vous, elle vous interroge, et bientôt notre honorable président proclamera votre réponse !"

SPANISH IDEAS OF FREE TRADE. (From the Madrid Eco del Comercio.)

The English League which commenced in the year 1839 with three individuals, proclaiming the freedom of trade, has gathered spolia opima. It is now generalised, and in complete and harmonious organisation throughout the United Kingdom, with funds at its command which maintain innumerable halls, public schools, and travelling orators who teach the true doctrines of political economy. The influence of these societies, and of the instruction which they have scattered, has penetrated to the very core of the English Government. Thus is explained the fact, that not only are the Reformers (Progressistas) its supporters, but the Minister, Peel, with his "Tory" Cabinet (of which no less a personage than the Duke of Wellington is a member)—or, what amounts to the same thing, those who a short time ago were the causes of commercial prohibition or restriction, are at present those who defend in Parliament and the press that freedom which we desire, but which our Government despises and disregards, without considering that the march of enlightenment and the spirit of the age develop, more quickly than it would wish, the humane doctrine which teaches mankind to create wealth, to distribute it, to circulate it properly, and to consume it by means of internal and external freedom of trade.

The Custom-house Union or Confederation of the north assembles in order to correspond with the Convocation of the English Cabinet, or rather with the opinion of the English nation. France is disposed to discuss spontaneously this most seriously important affair. At Bordeaux there has just been formed an association of capitalists, commercial men, and celebrated writers on politics and political economy, presided over by the mayor of the city, who is appointed by the Crown, and having for the result of its first meeting, or at the very moment of its establishment, a subscription exceeding 50,000*fr.* for the purpose of carrying on the preliminary labours. But let us examine, before going any further, the speech delivered by the mayor from his presidential chair, he having spoken the first, in order to make known the objects of the association.

In the most effective terms that the completion of his liberal conviction produced, he declared, that "he had accepted the presidency in order to record the sufferings of France, so long undervalued, the petitions which always remained without having any influence with the Government, the unknown general rights which resulted in no other reception than a cold disdain." Thus did this functionary declare himself, whose elevated position and nobleness of character gave to his words, at once firm and serious, a characteristic sanction, which produced the most lively sensation in the assembly. So says the Indicateur, the Progressista journal of that commercial district.

Well, then, is not this question, which so much affects our position and our finance—which is so much discussed in this unfortunate nation, and which has so often occupied our own attention and that of the Guia del Comercio—is not this question, I we ask, worthy of being brought upon the theatre of discussion ? Will it not move the trade of Madrid, the capitalists that exist in the court, and the numerous proprietors who hold immense tracts of uncultivated land, and who live on the Treasury and the rents of the Royal patrimony, because their own are not sufficient to maintain them with decency, for want of production and consumption ? Are these blind courtiers—these strenuous paladins of monopolies and privileges—perchance ignorant of the fact that freedom of trade would in a short time procure them infinite riches and more means of luxury and ostentation than many well-known princes and monarchs are able to raise ? Know they not, at the same time, that by constituting their own happiness and that of their families, they would augment the general prosperity, by insuring to the Government larger rents and receipts to the Treasury, without having to resort to ruinous expedients, to scandalous oppressions, to uncon-most desirable means of transition.

"I cannot escape from deep anxiety when I reflect on what is to be decided in this assembly. It is not merely freedom of trade which is in question. We are discussing whether we shall at length adopt constitutional habits—whether we shall give effect to the institutions acquired by such great efforts and mighty sacrifices—whether the French, as they are accused of doing, finding the path of legality and persuasion too long, seek only ephemeral reforms by violent means—whether there is still among us devotion, public spirit, energy, or whether we are a drowsy, indifferent, lethargic society, incapable of continuous action, and only to be animated by rare and vain convulsions. France has its eyes on you, it interrogates you ; and our honourable president will soon proclaim your reply."

ceived systems, and to the evil example of creating a set of idlers in order that half the Spanish people may be moved, and may be continually oppressing and plying into the status of the other half, who vainly labour to maintain themselves and the former ?

And will the Government of the country, which, one ought to suppose, is on the qui vive and alive to what is going on—which, one ought to believe, measures circumstances and events—which is acquainted with history—which is informed of facts—which has studied systems—will this Government remain, as hitherto, paralysed, acting as if it does not perceive what has taken place in the United States of America, in Holland, in the Hanseatic Towns, and in all the nations and countries that have passed by Free Trade ? Will it choose to live, as hitherto, fenced in by its prohibitions, restrictions, limitations, and monopolies, in everything resembling those barbarous Governments, which make a monopoly of everything except the air they breathe, and turning its back upon the European enlightenment which pours down like a torrent upon the nation, and infiltrates of necessity the minds and conviction of all those who are able to read and make a right use of their reasoning powers ? We shall see. Our cheeks glow with shame when we reflect that all are preceding us in the path of reform and perfection, and that the Spanish nation, after having been the first to receive the baptism of enlightenment—after having known before all the influence that is possessed by entire freedom of trade in cherishing the general wealth, whose branches constitute agricultural, industrial, and commercial produce—after so many sacrifices have been made for the idea of harmonising the necessary reforms with the firm fixing of the crown upon the brow of Isabel II.—it is sad, very sad and afflicting to think that we remain distanced, and are the constant sport of the ambitious designs of foreigners, of those same kings who, in our days, grovelled in the dust, and who were rescued from their misfortunes and persecutions by those who now write these lines, and those who like us made heroic sacrifices and shed rivers of blood, in order that they may now abuse us, bind us hand and foot, and hinder us from being happy and independent. Ah ! we cannot forget how the Journal des Débats (the reputed organ of Louis Philippe) would have insulted us (General Narvaez and MM. Mon and Martinez de la Rosa being in the Cabinet) with the disgusting, filthy, and repugnant words we are about to quote, and which it published with impunity :—"In Spain" (said the ribald writer) "there is nothing established but robbery." Shame ! shame ! a thousand times shame upon those who then ruled us !

We shall return to this all-important question, and prove that immediately an attempt is made to traverse Spain by internal communications for the conveyance of produce and goods from one extreme of one sea to that of another, Spain will be the richest nation of the world by adopting absolute freedom of trade.

The Courrier de Marseilles has the following remarks on the restrictions on French commerce :—

"The principles of commercial liberty have at last outstepped the limits of theory, and entered into practical existence ; confined till now within scientific bounds, to-day they occupy the first place in political debates. Commercial liberty ! This cry, uttered in a corner of England, was caught up from mouth to mouth, and the universal shout resounded in the councils of the crown ; a great statesman chose it as the motto of a new system of policy, under which are ranked the better part of the British Parliament.

"England reduces her tariffs, lessens her entrance duties, and suppresses them almost entirely on raw materials. Is not the position evident at first sight, which this state of things will assign to British commerce over all the markets of the world, when it meets concurrence from the commerce of other nations ? English commerce, by combining the prices of buying and selling, need not let any customs duties enter into its calculations ; French commerce will have to calculate 10, 15, 25, and even 50 per cent. on merchandise entering France ; the former, therefore, can bid higher prices than the latter, and, therefore, command the market, choose the best quality and those best adapted to their wants, and thus maintain and increase their supremacy.

"This motive is enough of itself to force all the nations of the globe to walk in the path that England has marked out.

"Our tariffs pretend to favour our mercantile navy, and their first step is to prohibit foreign bottoms ; they thus refuse the principal element of success to all commercial enterprise, cheap materials. Not content with obliging the owners to build their own vessels in France, the duty on the different articles necessary to their equipment, such as ropes, chains, anchors, &c., is so heavy that it almost amounts to a prohibition ; and they do not stop here, for they impose a heavy duty on the materials of which these articles are composed, such as hemp, cotton, iron, brass, &c. Thus our tariffs tie down our mercantile navy in the very cradle ; but, if in spite of them, it yet breathes a little, and, with hands and feet tied, still exists, our laws say—weigh anchor and we will protect you. And then those boasted protections in favour of the mercantile navy appear, consisting in taxes so heavy, that they most completely hinder a vessel leaving a French port unless she is certain of a return cargo ; and if the voyage does not answer the expectations of the owner, his vessel lies idle, paralysed by the competition of foreign vessels, until the chances of commerce procure him a modest freight to enable him to steer homewards.

"This is all that can be derived in the way of benefit from the navigation taxes. And of this profit, who pays the expenses ? It is French industry, as they are obliged by law to import the raw materials in French vessels, paying double freight to what a foreign vessel would ask, or even a French vessel, if she was not tied down from her very birth by our tariffs, which alone are the cause of her inferior station. And what is the result ? That the produce of our manufactures is dearer, and the consumption restricted both at home and abroad, that less materials are in requisition, and navigation lags ; and thus protection proves a bar to our activity.

"Is it not the same in the whole system of French industry ? Would our woollen tissues require protection duties if the raw materials were not cut to the very core by enormous duties ?

"The same may be said as regards our sugars.

"It is thus that the protection laws, deriving one from the other, are noxious to the interests they are meant to protect, and tend to retard industry, and the prosperity of the country."

The Courrier Français observes, that "It is now a long time since political economists told their Government, if they granted liberty of commerce to their subjects, that they would guarantee in return the disappearance of every motive of trouble and disturbance, and that they would establish a golden age and a reign of peace. Those political economists were regarded as Utopians, but events are now beginning to demonstrate that they were right. War retreats in face of commercial liberty. We have this day received accounts from America, in which political economists will find an admirable confirmation of the excellence of their principles, and in which they will see the announcement of a signal victory which the application of those principles is on the point of giving to the cause of peace. The announcement in America of that great measure which put an end to the old system of political economy in England, and inaugurated in the world the era of commercial liberty, caused a real revolution in public opinion both at Washington and at New York. Warlike ideas were immediately laid aside, even by the most ardent adversaries of England. The language of the press, previously so menacing, became completely pacific. The affair of the Oregon may consequently be considered, if not arranged, at least in a fair course of settlement. That, we repeat, is a victory of which the friends of commercial liberty may justly be proud. For our part, we find in those great events which have arisen on our Continent an additional reason to rejoice at this victory gained in America by commercial liberty.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Ninth Week, ending Saturday, March 21.

The conduct of the protectionists is as little to be calculated on as the results of a protective law. After behaving, last week, with something like a show of deference to public opinion, they commenced, on Friday last, a new course of obstruction, which has had the effect of delaying the whole public business of the country. If the section "under the gangway" were composed of men having weight, character, and influence, it would be as indecorous as absurd to complain of pertinacious opposition. This is one of the "prerogatives" of a representative assembly; and it is frequently one of the last resorts, when liberty is struggling with despotism. But to justify an unavailing pertinacious opposition, certain important elements are requisite. There must be MIND and CHARACTER; reason must be able to point to a future, when its influence will predominate over mere numbers; and FAITH must assert its power, declaring that though now the car of a political juggernaut may pass over the bodies of its victims, a time is coming when the idol shall "bite the dust," and the car supply materials for its own self-sacrifice.

Nothing of this sort animates the opposition of the protectionists. Go where you will—at No. 17, Old Bond-street, or the Carlton Club, in the lobbies of the house—the language is, if protection be removed now, it is removed for ever. This, as Mr. CORDEN told them, indicates in the protectionists a sad lack of faith in their principles. If, like the Free Traders, they had faith, even as a grain of mustard seed, they would submit to the passing of the present measures, in the confident hope that truth and reason will produce their natural reaction. But they have no such faith—no such hope. Their characters and their arguments have a common sympathy, and a natural relation.

For, after all, who are the leaders of the opposition to the measures of the Government? Lord George Bentinck is the only conspicuous member, connected with the aristocracy, who resists pertinaciously. Yet the public character of Lord George Bentinck, correct and respectable as it is, has nothing about it to conciliate public regard. He is favourably estimated in clubs and coteries; and he is admitted to have done something towards purifying the turf from associations as disreputable as unprofitable. All men who keep betting books owe a debt of gratitude to the noble lord, who has sedulously laboured for years to elevate gambling into scientific process. And though, after eighteen years of silence in Parliament, he has only now found his tongue, it only confirms the popular opinion that no man, at any period of his life, need despair of becoming noticed and noticeable. Lord George Bentinck is, in fact, a living type of protection; the great principle of which is, obtain adventurous advantages by any means you can, and assert your right to 80s. or to 58s., by law, as sturdily as you urge the necessity of honourably acquitting obligations at Tattersall's.

Who else of the aristocracy take a lead in opposition? Mr. Miles, wealthy as he is, respectable as he is, belongs not to the aristocracy. He is an off-shoot of the commercial interest, more especially connected with the West India trade, when law sanctioned a free importation of blacks from the coast of Africa, and rendered traffic in bodies and souls, blood and tears, a legitimate source of commercial profit. Mr. Miles is not himself a bad man—by no means; he is kindly, worthy, and respectable. Yet he occupies a leading position as one of the "FOODMETERS" of the House of Commons; he begrudges the free admission of Indian corn, lest it should lower rents, and give the people too many puddings. Then again we have Mr. Stafford O'Brien, a really clever young man. There are a number of "O'Briens" in the House of Commons, all more or less related; and who, in the true spirit of western or southern Irish feeling trace their origin to some king of the "O'Brien" tribe, who used to leap over the bogs with bare legs. This foolish adherence to "descent" is one of the absurdities of aristocracy—shared, as Pope, laughed at in painting by Hogarth, and ridiculed by every man of common sense. Yet "descent" is an important element in character—all other elements being present. Of Mr. Stafford O'Brien, we can only say that he is a clever, smart young man, very gentlemanly in his manner, and very intelligent in his mode of expression, but all of whose speeches betray a latent conviction that, so far as protection is concerned, he feels himself on the wrong side of the box!

Who else have we on the side of protection? The great Mr. Peter Borthwick; the clever Mr. Benjamin D'Israeli; the amusing Colonel Sibthorp; and lastly, the droll Sir John Tyrrell? Nay, we have Mr. Bankes, who can perform the feat of speaking for two hours, without saying anything. Who else? Lord John Manners, whose "dream of life" is the abolition of the laws of mortmain, the change of monasteries for manufactories, the revival of the "Book of Sports," and the substitution of cricket for composure on Sundays. And, not to speak of Mr. Newdegate or the Marquis of Granby—darkling scintillations of protectionist light—we have Mr. Spooner, whose somniferous face is the brightest reflection of his colleague's beard, and whose incessant advocacy, in public and in private, of the currency crotchet, proves that the biggest bore in England may be made of "Brummagem" brass.

Mr. Spooner was the lion of Friday night week. The resolutions which had passed through committee had to be reported—a process which, on ordinary occasions, is but the work of a few minutes. The chairman of committees appears at the bar; he reports that certain resolutions have been passed in committee, which he has been ordered to report to the house; and then the clerk at the table reads the resolutions seriatim, which are usually affirmed, without a word of remark. But the protectionists have taken the somewhat unusual course of objecting to the report of almost every resolution. Mr. Spooner led the way on Friday night week. His object, however, was merely to make that currency crotchet speech, which the house, on a former occasion, had unceremoniously "burked." Mr. Spooner is one of those men to whom Shakespeare's phrase of "most forcible feeble" strictly applies. His manner is intensely energetic and redundant; his matter the most unimpressive and inconsequential that can be conceived. Mr. Muntz, his colleague, always receives far better attention in the house. Part of this is owing to his long beard, and his eccentric manner: but the greater part to a sort of sturdy honesty which seems to tower over even a gross deficiency in logic. The discussion on Friday night turned on "bronzes," "buttons," "cheese," and "manufactured cottons;" and in the repeated divisions the Government were steadily supported by large majorities.

Before the business was commenced on Friday night, Sir James Graham obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide, temporarily, against the fever, a consequence of famine, now breaking out in Ireland.

So little progress having been made on Friday night, the second reading of the Corn Bill was postponed, and ultimately fixed for Monday next, in order to allow the tariff to be proceeded with. The best way of exhibiting the nature of the opposition will be a selection of the "points" which have been raised during the debate.

On Monday night, Lord George Bentinck, with a somewhat sarcastic view, inquired if the Government could reduce to any great extent the Custom House establishment, as a consequence of the reduction of duties. Sir R. Peel made an important reply:

"I hold in my hand (said he) an account, applicable to some of the principal ports of the empire, of the number of ships with cargoes from abroad arriving and entered. I am so desirous of affording every information, that I should rather wish to move for an account, applicable to all our ports, of the number of ships arrived and cargoes entered in different years; but at present I must content myself with the result in a few of the ports; and I will state what has taken place contemporaneously with repeal and reduction of customs' duties. The comparison is between the years 1842 and 1845, and it will be seen, that, both in the number of ships and the entries, there has been a considerable increase in the following six ports of the empire:

Ports.	Years.	Ships with Cargoes from Foreign Ports.	Number of entries.
	1845	7521	567,000
	1842	3285	188,000
Liverpool ..	1845	3900	220,000
	1842	612	22,000
	1842	261	21,700
	1842	312	7,700
Dundee	1845	415	9,600
	1842	280	22,000

My noble friend will see, therefore, that there has been an immense increase in the foreign trade of the country (loud cheers); that a much larger number of ships have arrived, and that there has been a vast addition to the entries. That circumstance alone, as I remarked, would prevent any decrease in the establishment of the custom-house, because the greater the number of vessels the greater must necessarily be the superintendence. Therefore, though we may not have the same advantage in the customs as in the excise, there has, in fact, been a corresponding advantage of a more important description" (much cheering).

Mr. Plumptre raised a debate on the reduction of the duty on hops, which terminated in the following manner:

For the resolution	91
Against it	44

The next important item on which a debate of consequence arose was that of SILK. Mr. Bankes, the Dorsetshire Tory, and Mr. Brocklehurst, the Macclesfield Whig, combined on this occasion. There were, of course, a few jokes—such as they were. Mr. Wynn Ellis taxed Mr. Brocklehurst with smuggling; Mr. Brocklehurst regretted that he was unable to convert a shoemaker into a milliner. Mr. Newdegate, in his usual somniferous tone, declared that if anything could rouse him it would be the wrongs of the silk weavers. These are the principal faceties. But the facts speak for themselves. In the following years these were the quantities of raw, waste, and thrown silk imported into the United Kingdom, in lbs.:

	Raw.	Waste Knobs and Husks.	Thrown.	Total.
1821 ..	1,864,513	105,047	360,248	2,329,808
1822 ..	1,993,764	64,921	382,278	2,441,563
1823 ..	2,051,895	62,302	363,864	2,488,121

The duty then being on raw silk, not the production of the British territories in the East Indies, 5s. 6d. per lb.; waste silk, 4s. per lb.; thrown silk, not dyed, 14s. 8d.; thrown silk, dyed, 2l. 5s. 6d. But in the years, 1842, 1843, 1844, when the duty was reduced as follows:—On raw silk, 1 l. 20; waste silk from foreign countries, 1s. 3-5d.; thrown silk, not dyed, ditto, 1s. 3-5d.; thrown silk, dyed, ditto, 2s. 1 l. 5d.—the quantities stand as follow:

	Raw.	Waste Knobs and Husks.	Thrown.	Total.
1842 ..	3,936,714	1,434,093	363,997	5,735,804
1843 ..	3,649,747	1,495,457	334,835	5,480,039
1844 ..	4,021,808	1,775,855	410,358	6,208,021

It was upon these figures that the protectionists endeavoured to show that the silk trade had been injured since the modification of the duties. But, further, we not only now export large quantities of silks, but it is important to mark the countries to which we export them. France will be found, for a large amount, amongst the number. Although it be true that we import manufactured silks largely and progressively, yet this cannot thrust aside the evidence derived from the almost incredible increase in the quantity of raw silk imported. The truth is, that the imports consist chiefly of fancy goods from France or India, which have some peculiar quality of taste or design to recommend them, and even of these a large proportion (especially of Indian bandannas after being printed in this country) is re-exported. These facts may be left to speak for themselves.

The only important speakers on the question of silk, were Sir George Clerk and Sir Robert Peel. Sir George Clerk, in answer to Mr. Bankes and Mr. Brocklehurst, pointed out that the silk weavers have from time to time been distressed; but is this true only of silk weavers? In 1812, in 1816, under the protective system, were not their sufferings tenfold greater than at present? Mr. Bankes had made a most unfair comparison between the rate of wages now and formerly; because silk weavers are paid by the piece, and beyond all doubt the labour required to produce a yard of silk now is trifling in comparison to what it used to be, when the weavers employed the same description of loom as had been in use amongst the French refugees—therefore you must not measure the wages of the operative by this standard. Sir G. Clerk found, by the report of the factory commissioners for 1843, that there were loud complaints of the mill-owners for want of hands. When labour, then, was in such request, could it be ill-remunerated? Mr. Powell again states that a sufficient number of workmen cannot be found to do the necessary work.

Sir Robert Peel enforced similar views; and he was followed by that rather extraordinary person, Mr. D'Israeli, whose reputation is certainly not advanced by dabbling in statistics. Perhaps the most powerful answer which could be made to the speech of Mr. D'Israeli, is the following extract from the conclusion of that speech, followed as it is by the results of the division:

"The manufacturers had made no complaint—had found no fault with the measures of the Minister, for the very same reason that honourable gentlemen opposite were equally indulgent. They wanted the bill for the repeal of the Corn Laws to pass (loud cries of "hear, hear"). He trusted, however, that the manufacturers of England, and honourable gentlemen opposite, would show to the right honourable baronet that there was yet some sympathy with the working classes of this country, and that economical blunders would not pass without criticisms when there was not some great object to prevent persons from being critical (laughter and cheers)."

The house divided—

For the amendment 114

Against it 220

Majority against the amendment .. —106

On Tuesday night the protracted proceedings were resumed—not, however, without an ebullition from Mr. Stafford O'Brien, unworthy of his intellect and of his position. It so happened, that on Tuesday, Sir Robert Peel was not in the house by 20 minutes to six, although five o'clock is his usual hour. Mr. Stafford O'Brien got up, and with an air which is certainly not common with him, complained that the Government were not introducing their "other" measures, which were to "accompany" the repeal of the Corn Law. It would seem that the honourable member for Northamptonshire wishes Sir Robert Peel to introduce the bills for the relief of the agricultural interest which are to accompany the Corn Bill, before the house is called upon to decide upon the great measure. He is in doubt, forsooth, as to the latitude which is to be allowed to the word "accompany." So then, the commerce of Great Britain is to be kept in perpetual embarrassment on account of the word "accompany." This special pleading appears worthy of an Old Bailey barrister of a very low stamp, rather than of a member of the House of Commons. Surely the Government have announced, and the majority have over and over again pledged themselves to accept, their scheme in all its bearings. Now Mr. Stafford O'Brien complains that only one section of the great measure has been submitted to the house. Why, if his real wish be—which it is not—to arrive at the second and third sections, he has but to abstain from throwing needless embarrassment in the progress of the first through the house. It is physically impossible for the Premier to proceed with three measures at once, unless, like Cerberus, he had three heads. It is a pity that so clever a man as Mr. Stafford O'Brien should be degraded to a service like this. If Mr. Peter Borthwick had the pluck, it would better suit his position.

The first of the petty divisions of Tuesday night took place on the article of French brandy. We have always watched with deep anxiety the reduction of the duties on articles of French produce, as it is our firm conviction that there are few national objects of such deep importance as binding the two countries together by the ties of mutual interest. The insensible and gradual extension of commercial intercourse between the two countries is of more value than all the parchment treaties that have ever been signed by the diplomatic agents of France and Great Britain respectively. Connect Lyons and Manchester, Bordeaux and Liverpool, Marseilles and Bristol, by the indissoluble chain of "the ledger," and war-parties and jealousies will be heard of no more, or only heard of to be laughed back into oblivion. Mr. Cardwell gave the statistics to the house of our export trade to France. They run:

The extension of such a trade as this, and its beneficial effect on both countries, is not a mere financial move; it is a political measure of the deepest importance. It means such a union of the two mightiest nations in the world as will enable them to dictate peace, civilisation, and good order to the rest of mankind. The ministerial measure was carried by 64 to 35.

The rest of the ministerial measures might have been expected to pass without opposition. But, no! on foreign cattle Mr. William Miles, as a matter of course, stood up to oppose the remission of the 1*l.* duty. Colonel Sibthorp seconded the amendment, and took the opportunity of bringing the question of his jocosé proposition to Sir Robert Peel to send Mr. Gladstone down to Lincoln to contest the city against him (Colonel Sibthorp) under the notice of the house, as immediately bearing on the topic under discussion. Sir R. Peel rose to demonstrate the fallacy of all these apprehensions of an inundation of foreign cattle. The right honourable baronet recalled to the recollection of the house the predictions that had been hazarded on the subject of salt pork, when it was calculated, at the time of the tariff of 1842, that 100 sows in the Mississippi provinces would produce, in the course of a given number of years, 232,000,000 of pigs. Now, in the teeth of this it was found that the contract price of salt-pork per tierce of 320 lbs., which, in 1843, was 3*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, was in the present year 6*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* Was it not probable, looking at the result of the last three years, that a continuance and increase of the prosperity of the country would increase the demand, and therefore the price of meat? Considering, moreover, the advantages which the agriculturists would have in the increased facilities for fattening cattle, he felt bound to adhere to his original proposition. A solemn charge was made by Sir John Tyrrell against the Premier, proceeding by implication, perhaps, but still a charge; it was to the effect, that Sir Robert had been the cause of the disease which had affected the cattle of Great Britain for the last three years.

Mr. Peter Allix, one of the members for Cambridgeshire, made a most vigorous defence of the duty on clover seed. The measures of the Government, according to him, were to abolish the 50*l.* electors, to banish the rural gentry from their paternal mansions, and to extinguish the sun of England. It was impossible to witness a respectable-looking gentleman like Mr. Allix making such a speech, without a touch of sympathy for the idle fear, and a consideration for the stupid apprehension. Of all classes of men, country gentlemen are perhaps the most imbecile; and we have to humour some of them, just as a mother does a sick child who has the measles, or the scarlet fever. Yet in all these, discussions, it is impossible not to feel that there is a certain class of members in the house, who, when they come forward, affect us with feelings precisely similar to those with which we see a mummy neatly unrolled by Mr. Pettigrew, before the Asiatic Society. They are things of a bygone day, crustaceous formations of a preliminary era; they have nothing to do with the present, most assuredly will never be heard of in the future—they belong to the past. Of this class are Mr. Buck, Sir Charles Knightley, and some few others. Sir Charles Knightley, the representative of an ancient family, came forward on Tuesday night to inform the house that an iron steam-boat company was in process of formation, to establish a cattle traffic between London and St. Petersburg. St. Petersburg and Moscow were to be connected by a railway—branches of course were to be run into Central Asia, and the sheep and cows from the steppes and the wall of China, were to be conveyed bleating, lowing, and recalcitrating, to our markets, to the utter confusion of the British farmer.

All the talk on ruin proved useless—the division on foreign cattle was for Government—111, against 72; majority 39.

Tanned hides were the next article upon which it was thought advisable to divide the house. Mr. Lawson, the "other" member for Knaresborough, was the bold, bad man who did the deed. Sir John Tyrrell seconded the motion. The honourable baronet, in the course of his speech, possessed the house of a pitiable calamity which had befallen ten aged men. These unfortunate individuals, it would appear, had been in the employment of a carrier—if we understood Sir John Tyrrell aright—and recently, in consequence of Sir Robert Peel's proposed alteration in tanned hides, had been dismissed from their employment. They had all and several attained an advanced period of life far beyond the usual span which is allotted to mortals; indeed, when they had reached the three score years and ten of the Psalmist, they must have been in the full vigour of middle age, for they were now, all of them, "upwards of one hundred years old." A very remarkable case of longevity; more remarkable still is it, that they should have met by accident in the service of the same carrier.

Now, however, they were cast on the world, and, as Sir John Tyrrell feelingly remarked, at that advanced age it was scarcely probable that they could turn their thoughts to the acquisition of any fresh skill. However, their longevity could not save them from the ruthless Premier. The division on tanned hides was for Ministers—130, against 74; majority 56.

The next question was that of timber. Mr. Mitchell proposed and withdrew an amendment on the subject. This is, however, merely preparatory to a six hours' debate on the subject, which is to come off on Friday, as Sir Robert Peel has arranged matters. Then the Premier will be able to fix the debate on the second reading of the Corn Bill for Monday. "Of course," said Sir Robert, "all this with the understanding that the speeches of the honourable members would be so shortened as—"

The remainder of the Premier's sentence was drowned in shouts of laughter. No wonder: the talk has been the most inexorable thing ever known. But a noticeable speech from Lord George Bentinck deserves attention. He broke out with a threat that the House of Lords will not pass the Government measures:

"As far as he (Lord G. Bentinck) was informed, there was just ground for hoping, that whatever might be the conduct of hon. members on that (the Ministerial) side of the House of Commons, however much they might abandon their principles and desert their party (hear, hear), there was another House of Parliament which would not so disgrace itself (cheers from the protection benches). If the other house should reject this measure, and there should be an appeal to the country, then, judging from the results in Gloucestershire and Northamptonshire, and, above all, in his own native county (renewed cheers), the party that had honestly stood by its pledges, and not broken faith with the constituency, nor taken part in breaking the faith of Parliament, would come back to the house greatly strengthened by that constituency, which had been so betrayed in the present session (hear, hear)."

Then again Mr. Villiers spoke, with his usual terseness and ability.

Mr. VILLIERS said that the honourable baronet (Sir John Tyrrell) certainly was innocent of having produced the panic of which he complained when the last tariff was passed, for if he remembered rightly, the honourable baronet had addressed his constituents on the occasion, giving them the benefit of his practical knowledge on the subject, which was certainly calculated to allay their fears, for he assured them that he knew that American sheep were of that description that anybody could read the newspapers clearly through them (a laugh), and that more than half the pork would be choked on the voyage (a laugh). Now as they had not much benefit as yet from the tariff, he was not prepared to say that the hon. baronet's information was not correct (laughter); if such was the case, why should he be so much alarmed now (hear, hear)? and if the panic was such an evil, why should he endeavour to produce it? and if it did exist, he asked who had produced it (hear, hear)? Why, he did not hesitate to say the honourable gentlemen opposite; it was just such speeches as they had heard from the honourable member for Somerset and the honourable baronet that produced it (hear, hear). This was a matter worthy of notice; for if it was impossible to draw their attention to the great interest the people had in the abundance of the necessities of life, and if nothing could induce them to withdraw their opposition on that ground—let them reflect upon the injury they were inflicting on the very interest which they pretended to represent (hear, hear). What is the effect of predicting every calamity to follow from this measure? Why, that it depreciates the produce of the articles in question (hear, hear), and at this moment there is not the least doubt that prices are kept down by the delay that is occasioned by the motions and speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite (cheers and "oh, oh"). Hon. gentlemen opposite may cry "Oh," but the fact was as he represented it; and he knew on the authority of persons in the trade, that a serious loss is being sustained by them owing to this measure being suspended (Oh). Well, honourable gentlemen will have the opportunity of knowing the fact soon, and it will be seen whether he or they were right (hear, hear). They knew perfectly well that the measure would pass (hear, hear), and it will be seen then whether the price of foreign wheat would not rise higher than it was at this moment (hear, hear); he put it to the honourable member for Somerset, who treats every appeal on the score of general interest with indifference, to look at the enormous injury he is inflicting upon the farmers, and the dealers whose interests he affects to represent (hear, hear). He was bound to say that the honourable gentleman, the member for Somerset, puts the interest of the consumer entirely out of consideration, for he treats the measure as one of gratuitous mischief wantonly inflicted upon the producer, and assumes that there are no interests, no wants to be consulted or satisfied by its passing. Throughout his and the speech of the hon. member for Essex, not one syllable has been said as to whether the poor had access to meat now, or whether the reduction of duty might not give it to them (hear, hear), and that in face of the complaint throughout the agricultural districts, that the poor hardly ever touch meat from one year's end to the other (hear, hear). He did not mean that they did not have bacon, still they paid a dear price for it; and that was especially enumerated by the honourable member for Somerset as one of the articles that in future would be too cheap (hear, hear); and this is the year, too, that we have heard the labourers complaining that for 40 years they have never touched a morsel of meat owing to its price (cheers and cries of "oh, oh"). Why it is notorious that the agricultural labourers cannot consume meat in their families (hear, hear); and if it was not, the rate of their wages would show that it was impossible; and yet here they were endeavouring to make this food dear and scarce (hear, hear). He really knew nothing more astounding than to sit here in what was called a Christian assembly—an assembly of gentlemen, who are not apt to underrate their own benevolence, and whose kind care for the poor nobody was allowed to question (hear, hear); and to hear one after the other depicting the horrors of plenty, and endeavouring to raise the price of subsistence to the poor (cheers). Who could have supposed, after all the display of feeling last night about milliners and dressmakers, and the night before about the poor framework-knitters, who were said to be starving, that to-night the same gentlemen would be using the same exertions to deprive them of wholesome food; and if their wages were low, thereby to make their sufferings more intense (hear, hear)? Their condition was described to be actually bad, and had been so for years. To prevent food being cheap, therefore, was a positive evil to them as they were (hear). Really to hear the hon. member for Cambridge and the hon. member for Somerset, last night, one would suppose that the poor depended for life upon clover, and never desired to eat bacon (hear, hear). The honourable member for Essex was quite pathetic about protecting clover on account of the poor, and the honourable member for Somerset is horrified at the abundance of bacon that might be poured into this country from America (hear, hear). He believed that the hon. gentlemen were confounding themselves with the poor when they talked about clover. It was they that were always living in clover (a laugh)—while the poor would be happy to exchange all the clover they had for all the bacon they could get (hear). The hon. member for Rutlandshire said he expected to have fair play as the head of Free Traders, and he (Mr. Villiers) hoped the hon. member would give them credit also for common humanity, for that was their reason for advocating a change of system, to enable the poor to escape at least from scarcity of food (hear). The hon. member for Rutlandshire had turned to this side, to have his fears about this measure allayed; but really his own political economy ought to have done that for him without their help (hear, hear)—for when is the time that he says he apprehends this danger from removing the duty? Why, when the prices are low here—that is the time, he says, when swarms of cattle will come in, that is, when the market is bad; he does not want a duty when the price is high—only when it is lower than in other countries. Surely the honourable gentleman's own sense could assure him that unless the price was higher here than in other parts of the world, the cattle would not come here at all (hear, hear). The honourable gentleman the other night wanted to know what would be the price of his wheat if the Corn Law was repealed, and now he wants to know what his cattle will fetch. Surely it is enough to console him for to-night when he reflects that if the worst happen, it must be higher here than in any other part of the world, for its being so is the inducement for it to come (hear, hear). This, however, is particularly the time that the honourable member apprehends danger from the change, and why? Because he says the cattle have had the murrain, because mutton is unusually scarce, because people have less in this country than usual; this is the time, he says, that the consumer should be especially precluded from getting it elsewhere (hear, hear). Really do let the honourable gentleman reflect upon the chance he would have of satisfying the consuming public of the justice of such a reason; and now, having, with his friends, eased their consciences by raising their voice against a plentiful supply, he did hope, for the credit of the house, that they would not press this singular motion to a division (hear, hear).

TRADE OF THE PAST AND PRESENT YEAR.

(From the Economist.)

The general result of the official tables of trade and navigation show that the commerce of the country in 1845 far exceeded that of any other year on record, not even excepting 1844. The consumption of all the great articles of importation has considerably increased; and the amount of our exports, though not much in excess of 1844, shows a great increase on previous years. Our foreign shipping shows an increase of no less than 792,274 tons inward, and 629,131 tons outward, even when compared with the trade of 1844.

The comparison which these tables furnish for the last three years of the quantities of the chief articles of trade consumed in each year is as follows:

The comparison of the total value of the chief articles of manufacture exported is as follows:

1845	5,023,598	4,220,197

Such are the general outlines of the results furnished by these annual accounts—results which have fully confirmed the hopes entertained at the beginning of last year. In summing up the prospects then before us, there appeared an unusual combination of circumstances to contribute to our prosperity, without any one important disturbing element. We regret that it is not now in our power to congratulate the country on similar prospects.

Abroad, as well as at home, there are many circumstances which cannot fail to exercise an injurious effect upon our general trade, and upon the employment of at least some portion of our people.

In the first place, the failure of the last harvest, and the consequent high prices of provisions throughout Europe, have already been found to exercise a most injurious effect upon the consumption of all other articles. Upon those Continental markets we are dependent for the consumption of between forty and fifty per cent. of our whole exports. In 1844, out of the entire amount of 58,584,292*l.*, which our exports reached, our Continental trade took no less than to the value of 25,000,000*l.* Of cotton goods and yarn alone, our exports to the Continent are equal to 12,000,000*l.* a year—being nearly one-half of the whole of our foreign trade in those goods. It is impossible, then, that any material cause of depression should exist in those countries, without being immediately and injuriously felt in our manufacturing districts. If, then, we look to our great markets in the East, the prospects are not much more promising. In British India, the enormous expenditure which must attend the war into which we have entered, has already cut off from that branch of our commerce a considerable portion of its pecuniary dependence. In China, the same complaint still exists, and even in a more aggravated form of the inadequacy of returns for our shipments; and the heavy losses now being sustained on the limited imports from that market, being in reality a reduction of the profits apparently made on our exports, will at least offer no inducement to extend transactions to that market. Again, in the important markets of South America, our prospects are by no means more encouraging. The war which has so long interrupted our trade in the La Plata, still continues. Our relations with Brazil are more unsatisfactory than ever, with no chance whatever of an improvement as long as we pursue our present policy. We say it, on the best possible authority, that no treaty either of amity or commerce will be concluded with that Government as long as we persist in maintaining the Act passed at the close of last session, assuming for our Courts of Admiralty a jurisdiction over Brazilian subjects and ships, and as long as we persist in the exclusion of their sugar. Again: those markets are so dependent upon the Continent of Europe for the consumption of their produce, that they cannot but be affected by the depression which, less or more, is felt in every Continental country. The United States and British America alone offer to us at present any good prospect of an increased trade. The former market will, however, be in some measure unfavourably affected by the greater or lesser probability of hostilities. At present we are not disposed to consider that an important element in the business of this year. The probability of a modification in their tariff, of which we elsewhere give an outline, appears to us a full set-off against that risk. The great demand for American produce, for European consumption, cannot fail to induce a larger import of goods in return; and this being generally their cheapest market, we may reasonably expect an increase of our exports to that quarter.

The activity and prospects in the British American timber trade, must, if not suspended by the deferred operations of the new proposed timber duties, lead to an increase of our exports in that quarter.

Turning from our foreign to our home markets, we find matters little more encouraging. Ireland is a large market for the manufactures of England, and the failure of their potato crop and the high price of food must materially reduce their demand, not only for clothing but also for other articles of consumption. All these causes acting together, cannot but diminish demand in our manufacturing districts, and the employment of large classes of our own people, which diminished employment must again act prejudicially upon our own internal consumption. But the circumstance at home, which in our estimation most threatens to interfere with our recent prosperity, is the disturbance which has already been created in the capital of the country, for the present and future construction of railways, and which every day, for an indefinite period, must rather aggravate than ameliorate. This is by far the most alarming feature in our future prospects, and one which we freely admit it is extremely difficult to deal with. The rapid conversion of the floating capital now available for the trade of the country into fixed capital in railways, and that for a considerable period, entirely unproductive even of interest, must cause its abstraction from other pursuits to an extent which we frankly own to be the subject of the greatest solicitude. We think there can be no doubt that the inconvenience recently experienced in all branches of commerce, even with regard to money matters, has been greatly aggravated by the suspension of transactions since the proposed changes in the tariff were known. And it is to be expected that a favourable reaction will take place, as soon as these measures have been so far passed as to enable business to be resumed at the new rate of duty, which we hope may be the case before this reaches our readers. For some time, at least, an unusual activity may be expected, while exhausted stocks are being replenished, and provision made for the spring trade.

We must not, however, lose sight of the fact, that at this time we are committed to an expenditure of capital to the amount of nearly seventy millions for the construction of railways, independent of the numerous schemes now before Parliament;—that an absorption of capital in this one channel is at this moment going on, at the rate of little less than two millions in each month—all of which must remain unproductive for a considerable time to come. That a large portion of the schemes at present before Parliament will pass in the course of the session, there appears little doubt. The struggle then which will take place among all these undertakings, to obtain the requisite capital to carry them into operation,—the attempts to raise by loan a portion of their capital, and the repeated calls, month after month, from the shareholders, who, having embarked so much, will make the greatest efforts to continue their payments to avoid the sacrifice of those already made; all these circumstances present an amount of future embarrassment, which we own it difficult to see the end of.

Suppose that for three years consecutively we received no returns for one-half of our exports, what would be the consequence? We all know what effect was produced, in 1837, by the interruption to the regular returns for the credits given to the United States. The abstraction of floating capital from other purposes, for the construction of railways now in prosecution, will be about equal in amount to the half of our exports in three years. But then the common reply is, that the one is expended in the country—the other out. Such is not the case. If one man manufactures goods to the amount of one hundred thousand pounds, the whole of their cost is, in the first instance, expended in wages and in other ways in the country; if he exports those goods, and his capital is not replaced by remittances, it is so much entirely abstracted from the available capital of the country, notwithstanding their whole cost went in the payment of wages and otherwise. So, precisely, if another man expends a similar sum in the construction of a railway, the whole money is expended in wages and materials in the country; but the capital itself is never replaced to the country. The most that can be said, even after it is paying a good dividend, is, that so much floating capital has been converted into so much fixed capital. The same, however, might be said if the manufactured goods which had been exported were sold in Brazil, and the money invested there in a mine, yielding a revenue to its owner in England. As regards the effect upon the available capital of the country, there is not the slightest difference between making a railway at home, or exporting manufactured goods, selling them in a foreign country, and there investing the money in some security bearing interest to the owner at home.

There can, therefore, be no doubt that capital must become scarce, and the rate of interest higher during a considerable period to come; and that the general trade of the country must feel the inconvenience which must necessarily attend such circumstances. There is every reason to believe that imports generally will be received on a considerable scale during the year, and therefore the circumstances to which we have adverted, will probably be felt rather in producing low and unremunerating prices than in any very great diminution of the extent of the trade.

The present measures which are before Parliament, will, no doubt, lay the foundation for great future prosperity, and they will have an important effect, even in the present year, in assisting to avert other obvious dangers to which we are exposed; but we must not expect their full benefits for some time to come.

NEW DUTIES.—The House of Commons having passed the following resolution, substituting new rates of duty on the articles therein expressed, viz.—Resolved, that in lieu of the duties of Customs now chargeable on the articles undermentioned, imported into the United Kingdom, the following duties shall be charged—viz., buckwheat, the quarter, 1*s.*; maize or Indian corn, the quarter, 1*s.*; meal, the cwt., 4*s.*; rice, the cwt., 1*s.*; ditto of and from a British possession, the cwt., 6*d.*; ditto rough and in the husk, the quarter 1*s.*; ditto, rough and in the husk, of and from a British possession, the quarter 1*d.*; the Commissioners of the Customs' Department have received intimation from Mr. Cardwell, secretary to the Treasury, stating that he has been commanded by the Lord Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, to desire that they will admit the said articles at the new rates of duty specified in the said resolution, until the 1st day of August next, or until Parliament shall otherwise determine; taking, in each case, bond from the importers, to pay the duties hereafter chargeable, in the event of the duties imposed by the said resolution not being sanctioned by Parliament. This communication, accompanied by a copy of the order of the Government, has been transmitted to the principal officers of the revenue at every port throughout the kingdom, with instructions to take care that the directions contained therein be duly obeyed. The new duties, subject to the provisions mentioned, will be put into operation forthwith, or are even now in force throughout the united empire, with respect to the articles specified. The following is the copy of the new form of bond arranged for the purpose:—"Know all men by these presents, that we (parties' names) are held and firmly bound unto our Sovereign Lady Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen Defender of the Faith, in the sum of (double the amount of the difference of duty) pounds of good and lawful money of Great Britain, to be paid unto our said Lady the Queen, her heirs and successors, to which payment, well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, and every of us, jointly and severally, for and in the whole, our heirs, executors, and administrators, and every of them, firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals, dated this — day of —, in the ninth year of the reign of Her Majesty, and in the year of our Lord 1846. Whereas, by an act of Parliament made and passed in a session of Parliament holden in the 5th and 6th years of the reign of her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intitled "An Act to Amend the Laws for the Importation of Corn," it was amongst other things enacted that there should be raised, levied, and paid, to her said Majesty, upon all corn, meal, or flour, entered for home consumption in the United Kingdom, from parts beyond the seas, the several duties specified and set forth in the table annexed to that act, which said duties by the act of the 8th and 9th Victoria, chapter 90, section 3, are to be raised, levied, collected, and paid, in such and the same manner in all respects, as the several duties of customs mentioned in the said act are directed to be raised, levied, collected, and paid. And whereas, a resolution of the House of Commons was passed in the month of March 1846, that in lieu of the duties of customs now chargeable on the articles undermentioned, imported into the United Kingdom, the following duties shall be charged (the general rates above mentioned are here specified, and need not be repeated). And whereas the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, by Mr. Cardwell's letter, have directed the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs to admit the said articles at the new rates of duty specified in the said resolution, until the first day of August next, or until Parliament shall otherwise determine, taking, in each case, bond from the importers to pay the duties heretofore chargeable, in the event of the duties imposed by the said resolution not being sanctioned by Parliament. And whereas (quantity) quarters of (article, with each particular of importation, &c., specified) have been imported, which said (quantity again) quarters of (articles again) the said (parties' names) intend to enter for home consumption, upon payment of duty, under the said resolution, upon bond being entered into, with the condition hereinafter mentioned. Now the condition of this obligation is such, that if there shall be, on demand, paid to the collector and controller of Customs, at the port of —, the difference of duty between the duty charged by the said act of the 5th and 6th Victoria, chap. 14, and the duty paid under the said resolution, or the difference of duty charged by the said act and the duty which Parliament may otherwise direct to be levied upon the said articles, then this obligation to be void, otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue." The bond then concludes in the usual form.—Times, March 16.

COLONEL THOMPSON.—It is now certain that Mr. Leader will sit for Westminster only until the end of the present Parliament. We earnestly trust that Westminster will again right itself in public opinion. Some electors, we believe, entertain thoughts of Colonel Thompson. We could earnestly wish to see him returned as member for that ancient constituency. As the father of the Free Trade movement—as a consistent Radical Reformer—as a man of high integrity, indefatigable energy, and great political sagacity—he would confer honour upon any borough, and deserves to be returned by the most influential in the empire. We would not peril his prospects in any other place; but it certainly strikes us most forcibly that Westminster is the proper post for Col. Thompson; and that Colonel Thompson is the right man for Westminster.—Nonconformist.

LIVERPOOL ANTI-MONOPOLY ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of the members and friends of the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association was held on Monday evening, 9th inst., at the Concert-hall, Lord Nelson-st. The chair was occupied by William Brown, Esq. The hall was well filled, and upon the platform we observed the following gentlemen:—C. Holland, Esq., E. E. Rawlins, jun., Esq., James Mellor, Esq., Thomas Bolton, Esq., Richard Shell, Esq., Daniel Mather, Esq., John Finch, jun., Esq., G. Crossfield, Esq., Charles Robertson, Esq., Samuel Tomkinson, Esq., F. Boulton, jun., Esq., Samuel Bulley, Esq., Isaac B. Cooke, Esq., John Taylor Crook, Esq., Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., the Rev. John Robberds, and C. E. Rawlins, Esq.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the business of the evening, said it was usual with the council of the association once a year to make a report to those gentlemen who supported that association, and to state to them what their proceedings had been for the past year. It had been delayed on that occasion rather later than usual, in consequence of the great quantity of labour that had devolved on the officers of the society in attending to the registration through the months of December, January, and February, and that must be the excuse to the members for not bringing before them the report at an earlier period. It would not probably be out of place for him (the Chairman) to take a short review of passing events since they last met. They then had great sources of congratulation; but on the present occasion they had still greater sources of congratulation in the measures which had been laid before the country and before the world by the Prime Minister (cheers). He and his Cabinet had placed before the world, in the fullest sense of the word, a full and unqualified adhesion to freedom of trade. It required no little moral courage on the part of Sir R. Peel to perform that duty to his country and to mankind, when the consequence was that it threw from him many of those old friends who had been his supporters for years—when it shivered a party at one time all but omnipotent, and when he ventured to throw himself on the mercy of his opponents (applause). To their immortal honour, instead of seeking to embarrass his measures by petty struggles or vexatious divisions, they came boldly and fearlessly to his rescue. It was incumbent on them not to forego their principles, and therefore Mr. Villiers found it necessary to bring forward his annual motion for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. Seventy-eight of their friends supported him on that occasion; but others, not less sincere, were afraid of periling the great measures of the administration by leaving Sir Robert Peel in the minority; the consequence was that they voted with the Premier, and enabled him, by a large majority, to carry the first stages of his measure. It must be a matter of very serious regret to them all, that instead of the House of Commons being an arena for the discussion of the affairs of the nation, it had been made an arena for vituperating and abusing the Minister, who honestly and conscientiously did his duty to his country (loud applause). Nothing but honest and conscientious motives could have induced him to place himself in the perilous situation in which he had, and therefore they ought to give him credit for sincerity and truth (hear, hear). It was understood that, although he was perfectly safe as regarded his measures in the Commons, he might be defeated in the Lords; but before he alluded to the Lords, he (the chairman) would just allude to what had been said by one of their former representatives, who had been quoted as an authority by their opponents. Mr. Huskisson was advocating one of his Free Trade measures, and there was a great deal of opposition to it, when Canning got up, with all that eloquence, and all that force of reasoning of which he was capable, and said, "Is it not doctrines and aspirit such as yours, which have, at all times, been at work to stay public advancement, and roll back the tide of civilisation—a doctrine and a spirit actuating the little minds of men, who, incapable of reaching those heights from which alone an extended view of human nature can be taken, console and revenge themselves by calumniating and misrepresenting those who have toiled to those heights for the benefit of mankind?" He (the chairman) had adverted to the sentiments of Mr. Canning, and he might probably advert to what Mr. Huskisson had said amongst the last words of his life. He said, "It was his unalterable conviction that they could not uphold the existing Corn Laws with the existing taxation, and increase the national prosperity, or preserve public contentment; but that those laws might be repealed without affecting the landed interests, whilst the people would be relieved from their distress he never had any doubt whatever." He (the chairman) was the more disposed to bring this under the observation of the meeting, because Mr. Huskisson had been arrayed against them as a protectionist. Now, he begged to ask them if there was one word of protection in what he had just quoted, or rather if there were not the very condemnation of it. It was said that when the Government measure was sent up to the House of Lords, various amendments were to be proposed. One, that they should have a permanent and fixed duty; another, that they were to have a permanent and fixed duty, but the proceed to go towards the payment of the poor-rates with the view of relieving the landed interest of part of their mistaken burdens (cheers). Another, that the present sliding scale, as proposed by the Prime Minister, should be made permanent. Another, that they would pass the present intended law, on condition that the subject should be taken up again three years hence and discussed. He (the chairman) was quite sure that not an individual who heard him would be willing to submit to any such conditions. It therefore behoved them, in public and in private, and by every means in their power, to convince the Lords, and to show Sir Robert Peel, that if they did attempt to force such measures on the country they would gain nothing by the movement. For the sake of peace and harmony they might submit to the Corn Laws being repealed for three years, but if they must have a new Parliament, those culprits would be led to instant execution (loud cheers). A reverend gentleman of the name of Yateman—the Rev. H. Yateman—made a flowery speech the other day in Dorsetshire, where the high sheriff took the chair. He (the chairman) was willing to suppose that the press must either have misrepresented or misunderstood the reverend gentleman, for he could not suppose that one of his cloth could endeavour to mislead the public. He stated that the United States produced fifteen millions of quarters of wheat, that the consumption of the country was only five millions, and that they could overwhelm us immediately with sending us ten millions of quarters. Why, the consumption of the United Kingdom was only twenty millions of quarters! Such statements, so put forth, would be believed by men who would not inquire into the facts, and it was unjustifiable for a reverend gentleman to send forth such statements to the public. Well, what would he (the chairman) would say, "I hope the policy of this country ever will be an extended and liberal commercial policy with all, but entangling tariffs with none." The effect of their Free Trade measure had caused the German confederation—the Zollverein—to pause in making any alteration in their tariff unfavourable to England; France was establishing Free Trade clubs, and Russia, who contemplated some rise in her duties, had been arrested in her progress, and the evident tendency now was downwards (applause). Before he sat down he begged permission to correct an error which he made on the last occasion that he addressed them—an error, however, which made altogether against his own argument. He stated that the North American colonies and the British West India Islands had a commerce more important than they really had. Instead of the exports to these places being 9,400,000, and falling off to 8,500,000, the exports in 1835 were 6,500,000, and had fallen off to 5,500,000, being one million in favour of what their opponents seemed to value so much—protection (loud cheers). The chairman then called upon the honorary secretary to read the report.
